

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

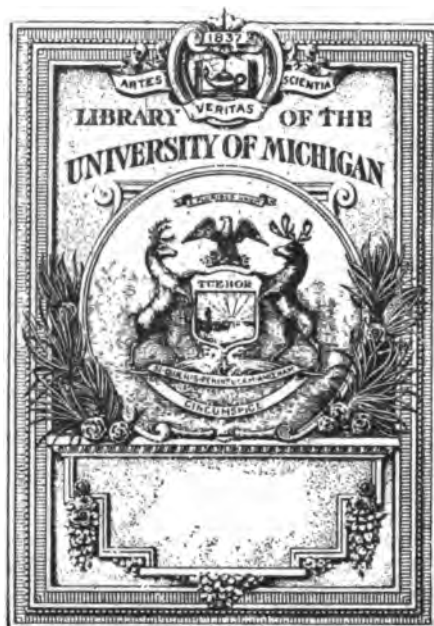

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

THE GIFT OF
Mrs. Cyrus H. McCormick

MUSIC
ML
1
198
V. 9-11

DWIGHT'S
JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, EDITOR.

VOLS. IX. AND X.

BOSTON:
PRINTED BY EDWARD L. BALCH, No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.
1857.

INDEX.

- 13.107

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 209.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 1.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 232 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I. "
" C. BREUNING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
" G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O. "

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by
JOHN S. DWIGHT, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court
of the District of Massachusetts.]

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Translated from the French of Madame Dubezant, for the Journal of Music.

CHAPTER I.

THE YOUNG MOTHER.

Before reaching that part of my life which forms the subject of my story, I must relate in a few words who I am.

I am the son of a poor Italian tenor singer and a beautiful French lady. My father's name was Tealdo Soavi; I shall not name my mother, as I was never owned by her, which did not prevent her from being always kind and generous to me. I shall only say that I was brought up in the family of the Marchioness of — at Turin and at Paris, under a false name.

The marchioness admired artists, without loving Art. She understood nothing about it; a waltz by Strauss or a fugue of Bach's pleased her alike. In painting she had a weakness for green and golden draperies, and could not endure a badly framed picture. Gay and charming, she danced at forty like a sylph, and smoked cigarettes with a grace which I have only seen in her. She had no remorse at having yielded to the temptations of her youth, and although she made no secret of it, would have thought it in bad taste to proclaim it. She had by her husband a son, whom I never called my brother, but who has always been to me a kind comrade and a pleasant friend.

I was brought up as it pleased God; money was not spared upon me. The marchioness was rich, and although she took no interest in my abilities nor in my progress, she considered it a duty to refuse me no means of development. If she had really been only my distant relation and my benefactress, as she seemed to be, I should have been the happiest and most grateful of orphans; but the servants had too much part in my early education to let me remain long ignorant of the secret of my birth. As soon as I left their hands I strove to forget the grief and terror which their indiscretion had caused me. My mother allowed me to see the world by her side, and I perceived from the levity of her character, and from the little care that she gave her other son, that I had no reason to complain. So I treasured no bitterness against her, as I never could have done fairly; but there was in the depths of my soul, early and forever, a shade of melancholy, united to a great deal of patience, outward forbearance, and deep resolution.

At times I felt a strong desire to love and embrace my mother. She granted me a smile in passing, a caress by stealth. She consulted me in the choice of her jewels and her horses; she congratulated me upon having taste, praised my instincts of savoir-vivre, and never scolded me in my life; neither did she ever understand my need of sympathy with her. The only motherly words which escaped her were in asking me one day, when she observed my sadness, if I was jealous of her son, or if I did not think myself as well treated as the heir of the house. Now, except the empty pleasure of a name, and the false pleasure of a position in the world fitted only for idleness, my brother really was no better off than I. I understood, once for all, at rather a tender age, that any feeling of envy or spite would be mean and ungrateful on my part. I perceived that my mother loved me as much as she was capable of loving, more, perhaps, than she loved my brother; for I was the child of her love, and my face pleased her more than the image of her husband in his heir.

I strove then to please her by applying myself more closely than he to the lessons, for which she paid with the same liberality and the same insouciance for both. She noticed one day that I had profited by them, and that I was capable of getting along through the world. "And my son," said she, with a smile, "he is in great danger of being ignorant and lazy, is he not?" Then she added, naively: "See how fortunate it is that these children should have each understood their position." She kissed my forehead, and all was said. My brother thought it no reproach to him. Thanks to her delicate instincts, without suspecting it, she had destroyed in us all leaven of emulation, and it is easy to be seen, that between a legitimate and an illegitimate son emulation might easily be changed into hatred and jealousy.

I worked then on my own account, and I could devote myself, without anxiety or morbid self-love, to the pleasure which I naturally found in knowledge. Surrounded by artists and people of the world, my choice was also naturally made. I felt myself an artist, and had been badly treated by those who were not. I might have pressed forward in my career with a morose and haughty eagerness. But there was none of that. All my mother's friends encouraged me with their good wishes; and feeling in no ways hurt, I entered into the path which seemed to be mine with the calmness and serenity of a soul that freely takes possession of its high estate. I gave all my faculties to the study of painting, without restlessness, irritation, or impatience. Not until I was twenty-five did I feel that my powers had reached the first degree of development, and it would then have been too late to regret any waverings.

My mother was no longer living. She had forgotten me in her will, but she died in dictating for me a very graceful note, congratulating me upon my first successes, and in signing a check to her banker for the payment of my brother's first debts. She had done as much for me as for him, since she had put us both in the way to become men. I reached the goal first; I only relied upon my courage and my intelligence. My brother relied upon his fortune and his manners; and I would not have exchanged my fate for his.

For the past few years I had rarely seen my mother. I wrote to her but seldom. It pained me to call her, as she desired, "my kind protectress." Her letters gave me a sad delight, for they only contained questions of essential detail and offers of money corresponding to my work. "It seems to me," wrote she, "that it is some time since you have asked anything of me, and I implore you not to get into debt, for my purse is always at your disposal. Treat me in such matters as your true friend."

No doubt all this was kind and generous, but it wounded me every time more and more. She had not noticed that for several years I had cost her nothing, without getting into debt. When I lost her, I regretted most the hope I had eagerly cherished, that she might love me some day. I wept at the thought that I might have loved her passionately if she had wished it. In short, I mourned that I could not more truly mourn for my mother.

What I have now related has no connection with the episode of my life which I am about to retrace. There is no bond between my early youth and the adventures which follow. So I might have dispensed with this explanation; but it seemed necessary to me. A narrator is a passive being, who tires when he does not relate all the facts which concern his own peculiar character. I have always detested stories in which the I predominates, and if I do not relate mine in the third person, it is because I feel myself capable of rendering an account of myself, and of being, if not the principal hero, at least an active sharer in the events whose remembrance I here recall.

I give this little drama the name of a place where my life was revealed and unfolded. My own name, or rather that which was given me at my birth, was Adorno Salentini. I do not know why I was not called Soavi like my father. That might not have been his real name. One thing is certain—he died before I was born. My mother, frightened and surprised, had hidden from him the result of their liaison, that she might break it off the more thoroughly.

From such causes as these, feeling myself twice an orphan, I became used to relying solely upon myself. I cultivated habits of discretion and reserve, in consideration of those instincts of courage and pride which I carefully cherished within.

Two years after the death of my mother, when I was twenty-seven years old, I was already free and independent according to my ideas, for I earned a little money, and my wants were few. I had reached a certain reputation without the annoyance of too many patrons, a certain excellence without dreading or courting the opinion of any, and the inward satisfaction of a sure progress, and the distinct vision of my artistic future. I felt growing within me all I then wanted, and I awaited its fulfilment with a secret joy which sustained me, and a calm behavior which prevented me from having any enemies. No one had foreseen in me a fearful rival; and as for me, I was troubled by no fatal competition. No professional glory made me fear. I smiled to myself in seeing men, more uneasy and impatient than myself, become dazzled by any slight success. Quiet and easy in my life, I could see in myself a strength of patience of which I knew those more violent natures, carried away around me like leaves by the stormy wind, wholly incapable. Hence I offered to the eye of Him who sees all, that which I hid from the dim and dangerous glance of mankind: the contrast of a peaceful temper, a lively imagination and a firm will.

At twenty-seven I had never loved, and certainly it was for no lack of love in my blood and in my head, but my heart was still my own. I knew it so well that I blushed at a favor as if it was a weakness, and I almost reproached myself for what others would have considered good fortune. Why did my heart refuse to share the intoxication of my youth? I cannot tell. There is no man who can so explain himself as not to be at times a mystery to himself. Neither can I explain my inward coldness except by inference. Perhaps my desires bore too strongly towards my art. Perhaps I was too proud to give up myself before I was understood. Perhaps indeed—and it seems to me that in my distant memories I can recall such a feeling—perhaps I had in mind an ideal woman whom I did not yet consider myself worthy of possessing, and for whom I wished to keep myself pure from all stain.

But my day drew near. As the expression of my life became easier to me in painting, the outburst of my concealed power was preparing within me with an increasing restlessness. At Vienna, during a severe winter, I became acquainted with the Duchess de ———, a noble Italian, beautiful as an antique cameo, a dazzling woman of the world, and dilettante in every kind of art. She chanced to see a picture of mine, and understood it better than the others who surrounded it. She spoke of me in terms which flattered my vanity. I saw that she placed me higher than did the public, and that she exerted herself for my fame for the sake of Art, without knowing the artist. I was flattered by it; gratitude began to melt my pride. I sought an introduction, and was received even better than I had expected. My face and manner of speaking seemed to please her, and she told me almost at our first meeting, that the man in me was superior to the painter. I felt myself more impressed by her grace, her elegance, and her beauty, than I had ever before been by any other woman.

One thing only troubled me: a certain indolent manner, measured phrases of approval, and certain forms of sympathy and encouragement, reminded me of the mild, generous and thoughtless woman whose child and protégé I had been. At times I tried to persuade myself that it was one reason more for my attachment to her; but again I trembled lest I might find under such a charming exterior a woman of the world, that frivolous and cold being, skilled in trifles, out of her sphere in serious things, generous in her acts, without being it intentionally, delighting in the happiness of others when it does not endanger her own.

I loved, doubted, and suffered. She had not a decided reputation for austerity, although her failings had never excited scandal. I had every hope of inspiring her with a caprice. That did not intoxicate me; I was not child enough to be flattered by a caprice; I was enough of a man to aspire to be the object of a passion. I burned with a secret fire too long suppressed to hide from myself that I was almost the prey of a violent passion; but when I almost yielded, I trembled at the thought of giving so much for so little—perhaps nothing. I was afraid, not exactly of being one more victim—what of that, when the evil is sweet and deep?—but for fear of wasting my soul, my moral strength, my artist future, in a struggle full of error and anguish. I was afraid of not being enough deceived never to dread the return of my fast-escaping penetration.

One night we went to the theatre together. I had not seen her for several days. She had been ill, or at least her door had not been open to me, and her features were slightly changed. She had given me a place in her box, to be present with her and another friend, a sort of convenient nobody, at the début of a young opera singer.

During the real or feigned illness of the duchess, I had worked with great ardor and a sort of feverish spite. I had not left my atelier and had seen no one, so that I was not in the way of hearing the gossip of the town.

"Who is to make his début to-night?" I asked her just before the overture.

"Is it possible that you do not know?" she asked, with a fond smile, which seemed to thank me for my indifference to anything not belonging to her.

Then she continued, with an air of indifference:

"It is a very young man, from whom much is hoped. He boasts a name celebrated on the stage; that of Celio Floriani."

"Any relation," asked I, "of the famous Lucrezia Floriani, who died two or three years ago?"

"Her own son," replied the duchess; "a youth of twenty-four, beautiful and intelligent as his mother."

I thought this praise too strong; jealousy was rising within me. I thought the duchess too hasty in praising youthful talent, without remembering how grateful I should have been to her on my own account.

"Do you know him?" I asked her, with as much outward calm as I felt inward emotion.

"Yes, slightly," she replied, unfolding her fan; "I have heard him twice since his arrival."

I made no further remark, but changed our conversation, to see if I could not get out of her, unsuspected, the acknowledgment which I dreaded. After five minutes' seemingly aimless talk, I learned that the duchess had heard young Celio Floriani twice in her own salon, while the door had been closed upon me, for he had been in Vienna but five days.

I concealed my anger, but it was guessed at, and the duchess smoothed it over as well as she could. I was not yet sufficiently intimate with her to claim an explanation. But she made a tolerably sufficient one, and my bitterness gave way to gratitude. She had known the great Floriani intimately, and had first seen her son with her. He came, as a matter of course, to pay his respects to her upon his arrival, and, although ill and confined to her room, she consented to receive and hear him, thinking it her duty to grant him her aid and patronage. He had sung to her before her physician and at his advice. "I do not know whether I was weary of being alone," she added, languidly, "or whether my nerves were unstrung by my diet; but I am sure that he pleased me, and I hoped for a great deal at his début. He has a superb voice, fine execution, and a charming person; but what will he be on the stage? It is so different to hear a virtuoso in private. I dread for the poor child the terrible ordeal of the public. The name he bears is a heavy burden for him; much will be expected; noblesse oblige."

"It is cruel, madame," said the Marquis R., who was seated behind us. "The public is stupid; they ought to know that the children of geniuses are always inferior. It is a law of nature."

"I am happy in believing you mistaken, or rather in thinking that nature is not always so foolish," replied the duchess with a quizzical look. "Your daughter is a charming and sensible person." Then, as if she sought to weaken the disagreeable effect which such a hasty repartée might have had upon me, she whispered behind her fan:

"I chose the marquis for my cavalier to-night because he is the stupidest of all my friends."

I knew also that the marquis invariably went to sleep when the curtain rose; and I felt pleased and full of good wishes for the young debutante.

"What sort of a voice has he?" I asked.

"Who? the marquis?" asked she, smiling.

"No, your protégé."

"Primo basso cantante; he ventures in a difficult rôle to-night. Hush! they are beginning; he comes on the stage. Only look ! Poor child ! how he must tremble !”

She waved her fan. A slight applause greeted the entrance of Celio. She joined in it so eagerly with the faint noise of her little hands, that her fan fell. “Come,” said she, as I picked it up, “applaud the name of Floriani ; it is a great and honored name in Italy, and we Italians must sustain it, for she was one of our greatest glories.”

“I heard her in my childhood,” answered I. “Why, you must have known her after she left the stage, for you are too young——”

There was then no time to find out by round-about talk whether the duchess had seen the Floriani once or twenty times in her life. I learned later that she had never seen her except from her box, and that Celio was simply introduced to her by the Count Albani. I learned other things too—but Celio began his recitative, and the duchess coughed too much to answer me. She had such a bad cold !

CHAPTER II. THE GLOW-WORM.

At that time there was at the imperial theatre a cantatrice who would have impressed me had not the Duchess de —— victoriously filled all my thought. This singer was neither very beautiful, very young, nor of the first order of talent. Her name was Cecilia Boccaferri. She was thirty years old ; her features wore a slight shade of weariness ; she had a fine figure, distinction, and a voice rather sweet and sympathetic than powerful ; she filled quietly, without dispute on the part of the public, the place of a seconda donna.

Without dazzling me, she pleased me more in private than on the stage. I had met her sometimes at the house of a professor of singing, who was my friend and her former teacher, and also in a few drawing rooms, where she had sung with great stars. She was said to live discreetly, and to support her old father, an artist, lazy and irregular in his habits. She was a calm and modest person, who was everywhere received with respect, although in society no one troubled himself about her.

She entered with Celio, and although she never busied herself with the public when she sang her rôle, she turned her eyes towards the box where we were sitting. There was something that struck me in her hasty and stolen glance. It disposed me to be on my guard that night.

Celio Floriani was a youth of twenty-four or five, and of wonderful beauty. He was said to be the image of his mother, who was the most beautiful woman of her age. He was tall, without being too much so ; slender, but not lank. His unconstrained limbs were full of elegance, and his large, full chest showed great strength. His head was small as that of a beautiful antique statue ; his features pure and delicate, with a lively expression and marked color ; his eyes black and sparkling ; his hair thick and waved, and parted naturally upon his forehead according to the rules of the Italian art ; his nose was straight, his nostrils clear and dilated, his eyebrows distinct as the trace of a pencil, his mouth vermilion and finely chiselled, his moustache silky and surrounding his upper lip with a natural wave full of coquettish grace ; the contour of his cheek was faultless, his ear small, his neck free, round, white and strong, his hands and feet well formed, his teeth dazzlingly white ; his smile was satirical, and his glance very bold. I looked at the duchess. I could observe her much better, as she did not mind me, so much was she absorbed by the entrance of the debutant.

Celio's voice was superb, and that he knew how to sing was evident from his first notes. His beauty could not injure him ; and yet when I looked from the duchess to the actor, he became insupportable. At first I thought it a jealous prejudice, and was ashamed of it. I applauded him and encouraged him with one of those low bravos which the actor hears so plainly upon the stage. Then I met the glance of Signora Boccaferri fastened upon the duchess and myself. This preoccupation was unlike her, for her carriage had always been remarkably grave and conscientious.

But it was in vain for me to assume indifference. On one hand I saw the duchess, disturbed by a strange trouble, an emotion which she could not hide, or which she did not even try to conceal ; on the other I saw the handsome Celio, in spite of his boldness and his resources, fast approaching one of those falls from which one so seldom rises, or at least towards such a fiasco as is followed by years of discouragement and powerlessness.

Really, this young man presented himself with a coolness which bordered upon insolence. It seemed as if he had written his great name upon his forehead, to be greeted and worshipped without examining his own individual merits. It seemed as if his beauty should make even men abashed. Nevertheless, he had talent and undisputed power ; he did not act badly, and he sang well ; but his soul was insolent, and that shone from every pore of his body. The manner in which he received the first applause displeased the public. In his bow and in his eyes this modest mental soliloquy was easily read : “Crowd of fools that you are, you will soon be obliged to applaud me more. I scorn the feeble tribute of your indulgence ; I claim tempests of admiration.”

During two acts he kept up this disdainful hauteur, and the uncertain public generously forgave his pride, wishing to see if he could justify it and if it was his lawful right or an impertinent presumption. I could not tell myself which it was, for I listened to him with bitter interest, since I could no longer doubt the infatuation of my companion for him. I told her so, bluntly enough, but without offending her, without diverting her ; she only awaited a moment of signal triumph for Celio, to tell me that I was a fool, and that she had never given me a thought. This moment of triumph upon which both counted was a duet with Boccaferri in the third act. That good creature seemed to enter into it with good grace, and to wish herself forgotten in the success of the debutant. Celio had saved his powers for that ; he reached the grand point, sure of carrying it.

But what passed between the public and himself so suddenly ? No one could explain it, while all felt it. There he stood like a magnetizer, striving to get power over his patient, undiscouraged by the slowness of the action. The public was like the patient, waif and doubtful, who only waited to confess or to deny the spell, to say : “He is a prophet or a charlatan.” And yet Celio did not sing badly ; his voice did not fail him. Perhaps he wished to increase the effect by a trick that was too palpable ; was it a false gesture, a doubtful note, or a ridiculous attitude ? I cannot say. I saw the duchess ready to faint, while the sinister coldness spread over the audience, and a ghastly smile glimmered on every face. When the aria was finished, a few friends tried to applaud ; two or three distinct hisses, against which no one dared protest, made deep silence ; the fiasco was accomplished.

The duchess was pale as death, but it was only for a moment. Recovering her self-possession with wonderful tact, she turned towards me, smiling and braving my glance as if nothing had changed between us : “Allons ! that singer needs three years more of study. The stage is a very different test from the private auditory, preposessed in his favor. But I did believe he would get through it better. Poor Floriani ! how she would have suffered had she been living ! But what ails you, Salentini ? I should not think you were so much interested in the début as to be stunned by the failure.”

“I was not thinking of it, madame,” answered I ; “I was observing and listening to Mademoiselle Boccaferri, who has just sung a simple sentence wonderfully well.”

“Ah ! bah ! you are listening to Boccaferri, are you ? I don't honor her so much, and don't really know whether she sings well or badly.”

“I do not believe you, madame ; for you are too good a musician and too much of an artist, not to have observed that she sings like an angel.”

“Anything but that. But what do you mean, Salentini ? Are you really speaking of Boccaferri ? I must have misunderstood.”

“You have understood me perfectly, madame. Cecilia Boccaferri is an accomplished person and an artist of great merit. It is your doubt that surprises me.”

“Indeed ! you are facetious to-day,” answered the duchess, not at all disconcerted.

She was charmed at what she supposed was my malice ; she was far from believing me calm and entirely freed from her, or anywhere near it.

“No, madame,” answered I, “I am not joking. I have always admired those souls who respect themselves, and who keep whatever place the public assigns them, without envy, disgust, or foolish ambition. Signora Boccaferri is a person of such pure and modest talent, that she has no need of applause or garlands to keep her in the right path. Her voice lacks brilliancy, but her singing never lacks roundness. Her timbre, rather veiled, has a charm which strikes me. Many prima donnas now in fashion, have no more fulness nor freshness in their throats. There are enough who have none at all. Then they call artifice, which is falsehood, to their aid, instead of art. They make an artificial voice, a peculiar method, which consists in escaping the faulty parts of their register, to show off certain notes, screamed, shaken, sobbed, smothered ones, which they have at their disposal. This pretended learned and dramatic style is mere sleight of hand, an awkward juggling, an imposture which only deceives the ignorant ; but surely it is not singing—it is not music. What becomes of the composer's idea, the sense of the melody, the genius of the rôle, when, instead of a natural declamation, which is only true and pathetic when it has its changing shades of passion and of calm, of sadness and of rapture, the cantatrice, incapable of saying or singing anything, screams, sighs and shrieks through her part, from one end to another? Besides, what coloring, what expression, what sense can a song have written for the voice, when, instead of a human, living voice, the worn-out performer uses a shriek, a grating, a continual choking. One might as well sing Mozart with Punch's whistle between his lips; one might as well listen to the groans of epilepsy. It is art no longer—it is a positive reality."

"Bravo, sir painter!" said the duchess with a fond and cunning smile; "I did not know you were so learned and subtle in musical matters. Why is this the first time you have talked so well? I should always have been of your opinion, theoretically that is, for your application is bad. Poor Boccaferri has exactly one of those worn and used voices that can sing no more."

"And yet," said I, firmly, "she always does sing, and never does anything but sing; she never screams or sobs, and that is why the frivolous public never notice her. Do you believe her so unskilled as to be incapable of aiming at effect like everybody else, and of substituting artifice for art, if she should deign at any moment to lower her soul and her knowledge to that point? If to-morrow she should grow tired of being unnoticed, and should wish to act upon the nerves of her audience, she could eclipse her rivals, I am sure. Her voice, habitually veiled, is just one of those which would clear itself by a physical effort, and would vibrate powerfully when the possessor wishes to sacrifice pleasing to wonder, truth to effect."

"But then, agree with me, what remains to her if she has neither the courage nor the wish to produce effect by artifice, nor that health of organ which possesses a natural charm? She neither acts upon a mistaken imagination nor upon an accomplished ear, poor girl! She sings properly what is written for her; she never shocks, she never disturbs. She is a good musician, I must own, and useful in the ensemble; but alone she is nothing. Whether she enters or whether she goes out, the theatre is always empty when she glides through it with the morsels of her rôle and her little pearly phrases."

"I deny that, and for my part, I feel that she not only fills the theatre with her presence, but that she penetrates and enlivens the whole opera with her intelligence. I also deny that the absence of fulness in her voice takes away all charm; for it is not a weak voice; it is a delicate one, just as the beauty of Mademoiselle Boccaferri is not a faded, but a veiled beauty. That gentle beauty and sweet voice were never made for the gross tastes of the public; but the artist who understands them guesses at the truth which lies under that subdued expression, where the soul always reserves more than it promises, and never exhausts itself because it is not lavishly thrown away."

"O, a thousand times pardon, my dear Salentini," cried the duchess, laughing and stretching out her hand with a kind and merry air; "I did not know you were in love with the Boccaferri; if I had suspected it I should not have vexed you in speaking ill of her. Are you offended with me? Now, really, I did not know it."

I watched the duchess carefully. Had she been sincere in her kindness, I should have loved her again; but she could not bear my gaze, and the diabolic light gleamed stealthily from her eyes.

"Madame," said I, without kissing the hand I pressed so feebly, "you never need apologize for awkwardness, for I never was in love with Mademoiselle Boccaferri before to-night, and am beginning to understand her for the first time."

"And I have doubtless brought you to this discovery."

"No, madame, it was Celio Floriani."

The duchess shuddered, but I continued, calmly:

"It was in seeing how little conscience that youth had that I felt the value of it in painting and the other arts."

"Explain that to me," said the duchess, pretending to defend Celio. "I did not see that the handsome fellow lacked conscience; he lacked success; that was all."

"He missed everything that is most sacred," answered I, coldly; "he lacked love and respect for his art. He deserved to be punished by the public, although the public has rarely such instincts of justice and pride. Comfort yourself however, madame; his success only hung by a thread; and in proceeding always with boldness and self-satisfaction, an artist may be applauded, make dupes and find his victims; but I, who can see clearly and impartially through the matter, understand that the absence of charm and power in this young man is owing to his vanity, his desire for admiration, and the little love he felt for what he sang—to his lack of respect for the spirit and traditions of his part. I am sure that he has always been brought up with the idea that he could not fail, and that he had the gift of making an impression. Probably he is a spoiled child. He is pretty, bright and graceful. His mother, very likely, was his slave, and all his lady friends doubtless elate him with indulgence. That of praise is the most fatal of all. So he presents himself to the public, like a daring coquette, who dashes triumphantly by, spattering with mud the poor world from her high equipage. No one can deny that Celio is young, handsome and brilliant; but they have begun to hate him, because there is something coquettish in his manner. Yes, coquettish is the word. Do you know what a coquette is, madame la duchesse?"

"I have no idea, Signor Salentini, but you can tell me, doubtless."

"A coquette," answered I, undisturbed by her disdain, "a coquette is a woman who sells herself for vanity, as a courtesan for avarice. She assumes boldness to hide her own weakness; she pretends to despise all, that she may rid herself of the heavy weight of public scorn; she tries to crush the crowd, that others may forget how she bows and cringes in the dust to every one; she is a mixture of boldness and meanness, of rash bravado and secret terror. God forbid that I should apply this portrait to any of your friends! To Celio himself I do not apply it without great qualification. But I do say that almost every artist who labors for success without conscience and holy meditation, follows a little in the steps of the prostitute without knowing it. They affect to despise the good opinion of others, while they have labored all their lives to obtain it. They are angry at failing to triumph, because that triumph was their only aim. If they were in love with Art itself, they would be more calm, and would not trust their progress to a little praise or blame. Courtesans affect to despise the virtue which they envy. These artists of whom I speak affect self-satisfaction because they are so ill at ease. Celio Floriani is the son of a great and true artist. He would not follow the traditions of his mother, and he is cruelly punished for it. God grant that he may profit by this lesson, and not fall back, but put himself to the work without anger or disgust. Shall I go and find him, madame, and invite him to sup with us after the play? He needs consolation, and it would be generous in you to cheer him in his misfortune. We are at the finale. I have a pass to go behind the scenes, and I will go and bring him here."

"No," answered the duchess, "I did not intend to sup to-night, and if you wish to prolong your evening, come and take tea with me and the marquis, whose obstinate sleepiness will leave the field free for our talk, and it seems that we have much to say to each other—that is, on the subject of Celio Floriani; so he would be de trop as much for me as for you."

She accompanied these words by an expression full of languor and passion, and rose to take my arm, but I waived the honor in placing myself behind the marquis. This woman, who only petted youthful talent when it was successful, and could abandon it so easily when it failed in public, suddenly became hateful to me. She affected me like those ugly and stupid children who chase a glow-worm through the grass, seize it, fondle it, and admire it while the phosphor brightens it, and then crush it, when the touch of their rude hands has quenched its light. Sometimes they torture it to reanimate it, but it grows dimmer and dimmer. At last they kill it, for it gives no more light, it shines no longer, it is utterly worthless. "Poor Celio," thought I, "where is your phosphor? Crawl into the ground for fear of being crushed. But I certainly will not profit by the tête-à-tête prepared for your triumph. I have a little light left, and I had rather keep it."

"Very well," said the duchess, imperiously; "then you are not coming?"

"Pardon me, madame," answered I; "I am going to congratulate Mademoiselle Boccaferri in her box. She has not succeeded better to-night than at other times, and she will sing as well to-morrow. I like to pay the feeble tribute of my admiration to those unknown and unappreciated talents who respect themselves, and console their hearts for the indifference of the public by the sympathy of their friends, and the inward certainty of their powers. If I meet Celio Floriani I shall seek his acquaintance. May I use your name? We are both your protégés."

The duchess crushed her fan and left the box without answering me. I felt that her suffering wounded me; but it was the last thrill of my heart for her. I sprang forward into the passages which led to the stage, resolved really to pay my homage to Cecilia Boccaferri.

[To be continued.]

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

THE MUSICAL VILLAGE.

FROM THE GERMAN OF AUERSPERG.

There is, in Bohemia, a village to see,
Where each living thing a musician will be,
Like swallows reversed, in spring time flying,
In autumn you see them homeward hieing.

You think the nightingales all the world round
Must here, in one bush, together be found;
You think a thousand fountains gushing
In one melodious stream must be rushing.

Hark! with what rapture, in yonder inn,
An amateur twangs his violin!
The countries round are waiting to cheer it,
And you, lucky creature, already hear it!

But frightfully now, from a dwelling near,
The thumping kettle-drum stuns your ear,
As when, the miner's ear-drum smashing,
An avalanche down in the shaft comes crashing.

Hark! dulcet flute-tones, across the street,
Lull you to dreamy slumber sweet.
But here the trumpets, the whole air shaking,
Secure, with their din, your speedy waking.

Hark! voices of maidens! what lovely notes!
Your ear on a sea of harmony floats!
But alas! the bass-viol a neighbor pleases;
Your skiff, in the tempest, is shattered to pieces.

Hark! the wild bugle! magnificent sound!
The fragrant green-woods rustle around;
But yonder bagpipe's buzzing and humming
Warn you that bears to the woods are coming!

Here whispers the tender guitar the bliss
Of bowers of rose and the stolen kiss;
But a din of bassoons from yon house is sounding,
Like a gang of drunkards your sense confounding.

One practises on the clarionet,
Another his heart on the hautboy has set,
While down from the window comes harmony shattered,
Like a suicide's limbs on the pavement spattered.

Each single tone sounds pure and true,
And yet no concord will ever ensue,
As the chopped-up joints of snakes forever
Wind in and out, reuniting never.

And so it howls and whimpers and moans,
And screams and buzzes and mutters and groans,
As if the spirits of discord in choir
Were playing, with Satan to lead and inspire.

You fly to the door, a refuge to find,
And you feel that the birds are of just your mind,
The storks and swallows, who fled, on learning
That the crowd of musicians were homeward returning.

But when the snow is melted in spring,
Then forth from the village each living thing!
Man, woman and child, where fancy takes them,
North, South, East, West, or fortune directs them.

United now, as divided at home,
In couples, in trios, in bands they roam,
As the spirit of harmony garland-wise strings them,
And through the countries like flowers flings them.

All comes right in the village then,
The tribe of Larks make music again,
And back comes Lady Swallow flying,
And Master Stork is homeward hieing.

The players greet many a distant land,
Well-known and welcomed on every hand,
Find open ears and arms in all places,
And foaming tankards and smiling faces.

And now every bush has its nightingale,
And its waterfall every rocky vale;
In all the woodlands birds are singing,
Through all the valleys fountains are springing.

C. T. B.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 5, 1856.

CONCERTS.

COMPLIMENTARY TO—our Journal of Music!—The bantling has received a hearty God-speed upon entering its fifth year. On the very evening of the last publication day, which marked the completion of the first lustrum, or Olympiad rather, of its busy little life, we found it our first pleasant duty (by way of prologue, as it were, to another round of musical reportship,) to attend a concert given to the child—our four-year-old-er, which has been on its feet and practising its parts of speech now long enough to answer for itself. Therefore please understand, dear reader, that it is the bantling itself that speaks, and that the parental editorial "we" is not after all entrapped into any personal self-reference.

The compliment proceeded in the first instance from the HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION, a society of amateurs, with which from its first formation on the basis of a little college musical club, about the time of our graduation, many of our pleasantest musical experiences and aims have been connected; a society of liberally educated men who have simply sought to elevate the character of music (in a land where it was but a pastime or a trade,) by bringing it somewhat into recognized relations with all serious and true gentlemanly culture, and by inducing possibly our Alma Mater to adopt and honor the divine vagabond and foundling; a Society which, claiming no place among the professors of the Art, (although it does not abandon the hope of counting among its other fruits some day a real live Professor of Music in the University at Cambridge,) has yet exerted not a little influence on the musical growth of this community: for instance, in founding the first musical library; in setting the first example of classical chamber concerts in this city; in initiating and placing beyond a peradventure the movement from which sprang our noble Boston Music Hall; and finally, in first welcoming into the world with its substantial sympathy this very Journal of Music, which it now cheers and encourages again, lest it should faint in the unceasing battle with the prosaic apathy, the open utilitarian hostility, the vulgar glittering counterfeits, the pretentious services of merely speculating and self-seeking allies, all conspiring to strangle the true life of Art in this so prosperous and rapidly expanding nation. Our Journal therefore has almost a filial tie with the Harvard Musical Association, and at the concert on Saturday evening we felt as if these first and best friends of the child had invited themselves there, with gifts in their hands, to celebrate its birth-day.

The compliment proceeded secondly, and equally, from the accomplished artists who so warmly testified their sense of social duty to an organ which with its humble means endeavors to uphold the true ideal of their Art, by furnishing the fine music of the occasion,—as well as from not a few besides of our best artists, vocal, and instrumental, who cordially offered their services to the committee. With great regret these offers had to be declined, in deference to the indispensable unity and limitations of a chamber concert. The will is as good as the deed.—And thirdly, acknowledgments are due also to the large, intelligent and sympathizing audience assembled in the lecture room of the Music Hall that night, drawn, we are sure, as much by interest in the Journal which has been so long a familiar guest in their houses, as by the exquisite music which so well illustrated the artistic spirit which it is our common aspiration to possess and cultivate.

The concert itself was truly one of the most beautiful of the season, and gave general delight. All the selections were of the choicest. We never heard our friends of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB play more finely than they did in the Allegro and Andante of that delightful Quartet in B flat (No. 3) by Mozart. The Allegro is the most joyful, childlike, genial thing imaginable, and sounded like the most delicate and sure harbinger of Spring, singing, "Why, now comes in the sweet 'o the year." It confirmed all in the best humor, which the Adagio (as — is wont to say) "carried up to ecstasy." The only regret was that we could not have the other movements. MR. KREISSMANN, who in point of true artistic style and feeling is unsurpassed by any singer that we have among us, and who is perhaps our best interpreter of the best types of German song, sang first from Mozart,—not from the Così fan tutte, as set down in the programme, but from the Entführung aus dem Serail, that beautiful song in which the lover is full of hope and longing on the point of again seeing his mistress. Gieb, Liebe, mir nun Freuden, und bringe mich zum Ziel, (Give me, O Love, the long promised joys, and bring me to the goal). On these last words, repeatedly, the voice lifts itself by semitones through long sustained high notes in a manner most expressive of the ardent yearning, and the singer, so far as his voice enabled, did it with the utmost skill and feeling. OTTO DRESEL played but once, but that was a piece and a performance not to be forgotten. With a quintet accompaniment of muted strings, fit mystical background for such delicately dreamy, spiritual confessions of the tone-poet, he played most exquisitely the Romance (Adagio) from the first Concerto of Chopin. He was applauded and recalled most vehemently, but simply bowed acknowledgments, and would not volunteer the little gems of solos which everybody hoped to hear, knowing too well the danger of expanding the first part of a programme till the mind becomes too full, too weary for the last. MRS. J. H. LONG's first selection was most admirable, that best perhaps of the "Soirées Musicales" of Rossini, the barcarole, La Gita in Gondola, with the exquisite accompaniment played by Mr. Dresel, and of which we have before spoken as reminding us of the freshness and richness of the music in the opening of "William Tell." For so difficult a piece it was sung remarkably well, but should be heard more than once to be quite appreciated by an audience.

Part II. opened with the Adagio ("God save the Emperor") and variations, from Haydn's 77th Quartet, finely played by the Quintette Club. Then came three of the fresh and original songs of the great song genius of our day, ROBERT FRANZ, admirably sung by Mr. Kreissmann, and accompanied (in these songs as delicate and as essential a matter as the singing) by Mr. Dresel. All three songs were extremely seasonable; all fresh and fragrant with the coming in of Spring: the first a "Welcome to the Woods;" the second, entitled Im Frühling, tells how the new songs come with the earth's awakening and bursting its icy chains; the third, Frühlingsgedränge, sings the glad wild impulses and sad mysterious longings which revisit the poetic soul when Spring returns. MRS. LONG surpassed herself in rendering the dear old gem of melody, Porgi amor, from Mozart's Figaro. The whole closed with the richest and grandest thing it would be possible to find in the whole category of instrumental chamber music, the B flat Trio of Beethoven, for piano, violin, and 'cello. MR. TRENKLE played the piano forte in a way that called forth general enthusiasm, and the brothers FRIES came in for a full share of the applause. With Otto Dresel turning over the leaves for his younger brother pianist, the whole thing had a truly artistic look, and Beethoven again spake to us, and was glorified in a true heart's homage.

The concert seemed as short as it was beautiful. We can only return sincere thanks to all who were so generously concerned in it, and to all who would have been had there been room for them. And we thank them the more that we may thus make this report and this acknowledgment save us the trouble of all other trumpet-blowing that might have been incumbent on us at this beginning of another volume. Let "these presents" signify that the Journal of Music has not failed to win friends and acquire a certain recognized value among music-lovers, even in its day of small things; and may this encourage others to subscribe and read, that it may have the means of doing greater things!

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS.—The second of these orchestral entertainments drew out a crowd worthy of the music, and of the sweetest, sunniest Spring day we have yet had. Indeed nearly every seat in the Music Hall had its contented occupant, and the scene itself, without the music, was well worth the admission price. The Symphony was that charming one of MOZART, in E flat, which ranks only next to the "Jupiter" and the G minor. We know not when we ever have enjoyed a work of Mozart more. It was in perfect harmony with that sunny Spring day. Each of the four movements is unspeakably beautiful, so that we could hardly tell which we liked best; indeed they form an indivisible and perfect whole. The rich, majestic introduction commands and fills the mind at once; you give yourself up in glad, unquestioning faith to a guide who cannot mistake the way of beauty and of inspiration; and the Allegro is a glorious fulfilment of the promise. The Andante breathes the pure ecstasy of love, modulating anon into darker moods and shadowy terrors of the infinite, only to measure the height of so much bliss. It is one of the loveliest of Mozart's slow movements, exquisite in every detail, and leaving a most harmonious and profound impression. The naive, happy little Minuetto, which has recently become so familiar hereabouts in piano arrangements by SATTER and others, was intensely relished; and the Finale, so quaint and Haydn-like in its merry rondo theme, but interrupted by, or rather insensibly yielding to that purely Mozartean sigh of too much happiness, seemed quite as much an inspiration as all the rest. To describe the delicious instrumentation, the manner in which the strings, the reeds, and the sparingly used brass, conspire to perfect clearness and unity with never ceasing variety of utterance, would be to enter again into an analysis of the wonderful art of Mozart, which M. OULIBICHEFF has done for us better than we could do. Mr. ZERRAHN's orchestra were remarkably successful in the rendering of every part of it; it evidently took effect upon the general audience; we did not feel our own enjoyment interfered with by the suspicion even of unsympathetic or apathetic presences. We believe a proposition for the repeating of the whole would have commanded a pretty large vote. Gungl's "Dreams on the Ocean" had perhaps more attraction to the younger audience; but he never dreamed anything so fine as Mozart always lived and realized; indeed we fear his dreams, on the ocean or elsewhere, have been more of dollars than of divine beauty. Yet it was well after a solid symphony and overture to gratify the lighter tastes with Gungl, and the "Brightest Eyes Galop"; and to recall a touch of the dear Italian opera by the Lucia finale for those who find luxury in tears, and the MEYERBEER "Coronation March" for those who delight in pomp and celebration.

But before these various sweet-meats came the overture to Tannhäuser. Nothing could sound more utterly unlike the symphony by Mozart. Here was music altogether of another nature; somewhat hard, ungenial perhaps in contrast with the symphony, and yet music of decided power, music that shows imagination, that quickens imagination in the hearer; music in which the modern art of instrumentation is carried to a rare pitch of splendor and effect. Perhaps it was the influence of the Mozart music, but our ears were more sensitive than usual to the screaminess of those high violin passages, and to the jarring roughness of the trombones, and to the too literal pandemonium of the tamborine and cymbals. But we cannot resist the mighty progress of the piece, and the finale is indeed most powerfully worked up. Bating a certain roughness in some parts, the overture was clearly and effectively played, and the applause was hearty and emphatic.

GUSTAV SATTER'S PHILHARMONIC SOIREE'S. The third and last of these soirées filled the spacious room of Messrs. Hallett & Davis to overflowing. The programme was as follows:

- PART I.
1. Overture: "Coriolanus." Beethoven
For two Grand Pianos.
Messrs. Gustav Satter and B. J. Lang.
 2. Adagio and Finale, Quartette in D. Haydn
Mendelssohn Quintette Club.
 3. a "Bachlein, lass dein Hauschen sein" Haertel
b The Bard Slicher
August Kreissmann and Club.
 4. Duo Concertante, Benedict & David
For Piano and Violin.
Messrs. A. Fries and G. Satter.
 5. Andante and Finale, of the Quintette. Mozart
Mendelssohn Quintette Club.
- PART II.
6. Quartette, F Minor. Mendelssohn
Messrs. A. & W. Fries, Ryan, and Satter.
 7. Ronde et Barcarolle "Northstar," Satter
Miss Eliza Josselyn.
 8. a Praise of Song Maurer
b Serenade Marschner
A. Kreissmann and Club.
 9. Overture: "Egmont," Beethoven
For two Grand Pianos
Messrs. Satter and B. J. Lang.
 10. Overture to "William Tell," (by general request,) Rossini Gustav Satter.

Certainly a very rich programme, but too long. Several items in it might have been retrenched to advantage, both in respect to quantity and unity. The two overtures by BEETHOVEN are two of his best, both intensely dramatic, full of rapid, concentrated fire, the counterparts to one another, yet essentially distinct creations. Nothing have we more longed for some years to hear our orchestras play than the overture to "Coriolanus." It embodies all the fire and spirit of the Shakspearian tragedy, as its companion piece does that of "Egmont." To hear it, to hear both well played upon two grand pianos, was next to the coveted satisfaction. Mr. SATTER and his young friend, Mr. LANG, played them with precision, force and brilliancy, and the effect was quite imposing. The Duo Concertante was on well-known themes from "Oberon," a very ingenious and pleasing variation piece, in which Mr. Satter displayed all his wonderful facility, equality and clearness of finger in the most difficult and liquid running passages. MENDELSSOHN's piano quartet in F minor produced a great impression; it is a superb work; but some of the strong passages, especially the conclusion of the finale, were brought out with rather too much furore by the pianist. Mr. Satter's little Barcarole, &c., (from L'Etoile du Nord.) was creditably played by the young lady, whom we take to be his pupil; but considering the length of the programme, it could have been spared.

The contributions of the Quintette Club were of their best. That Adagio and Finale by HAYDN are always a luxury to hear; and those two movements from the Clarinet Quintet of MOZART are luscious as a golden pear. Nothing, however, in the evening gave us a fresher pleasure than the German four-part songs sung by Mr. KREISSMANN and a selection of voices from the Männerchor. The pieces were fine in themselves, and were sung with most admirable blending of parts, and observance of light and shade and all the points of expression. One or two of the voices, especially among the basses, were of quite a rich and refined quality; and the whole was really a model of male four-part singing.

We did not stay to hear the overture to "Tell," of which we had before heard Mr. Satter's wonderful piano-forte reproduction. After the "Egmont" it was too much; we renounced it contentedly, as we did gladly the "National Airs" promised in a note at the bottom of the programme, in answer to the "urgent solicitation of many."

Musical Correspondence.

WORCESTER, MASS., April 4. I have taken the liberty to send you a programme of choice music performed at a private concert in Worcester last evening. This most agreeable entertainment, generously provided by our talented fellow-citizen, Mr. B. D. ALLEN, assisted by eminent instrumental performers and by vocal talent of a high order, was listened to with undivided attention and even musical appreciation, and the performance as a whole was entirely worthy of so excellent a programme.

- PART I.
1. Piano-Forte Duet. Sonata in F Mozart.
Allegro di molto.—Andante.—Allegro.
Miss Bacon and B. D. Allen.
 2. Four-Part Songs. Mendelssohn.
(a) O fly with me. (b) The hoar-frost fell. (c) Over the Grave.
Hauptman Club.
 3. Piano-forte. Andante Favori. Beethoven.
B. D. Allen.
 4. Four-Part Song. "Vale of Rest" Mendelssohn.
Hauptman Club.
- PART II.
5. Piano-Forte and Violin Sonata in G. No. 5. Mozart.
Adagio.—Allegro Molto.—Tema con Variazioni.
Messrs. Burt and B. D. Allen.
 6. Songs. (a) The Summer's Call. (b) The Baby. B. D. Allen.
Miss Fiske.
 7. Piano-Forte. Rondau. Op. 16. Chopin.
Miss Bacon.
 8. Four-Part Songs. Mendelssohn.
(a) Passage of Spring. (b) The Primrose. (c) Festival of Spring.
Hauptman Club.
 9. Piano-Forte Duet. Schubert.
Marche caractéristique. Op. 121. No. 1.
Miss Bacon and B. D. Allen.

The rendering of Mendelssohn's "Four-part Songs," by the Hauptman Club, a private "Sängerbund" of twelve members, three for each part, under the very able direction of Mr. EDWARD HAMILTON of this city, formed one of the most noticeable and novel features of the evening's entertainment. The piano selections from Mozart, Beethoven, Chopin and Schubert, performed by Mr. B. D. ALLEN and Miss BACON, were, as usual, unexceptionable in character and interpretation, and the Violin Solo from Mozart, executed by Mr. BURT, with accompaniment, was highly creditable and pleasing. Without allowing ourselves any further comment or criticism, may we not hope for "many happy returns?"

W. S. B.

NEW YORK, April 2. I will just mention an interesting affair at which I was present last week, as an item of musical intelligence. Mad. LAGRANGE, MORELLI, and BRIGNOLI sang for the pupils of the Blind Asylum at a private matinée on Thursday afternoon. They did it with a hearty good will and with an obvious interest in the poor unfortunates that was very gratifying. Mad. Lagrange surpassed herself. She sang "Qui la voce," her own waltz, a Trio from Verdi's I Lombardi, with Morelli and Brignoli, and the Inflammatus from the Stabat Mater, with the chorus by the pupils, thus showing a variety of styles. Morelli sang the "Pro peccatis," also from the Stabat Mater, but was hoarse, and Brignoli "Com e gentil" and "La Donna e mobile," very finely. These pieces were interspersed with choruses by the blind, sung with a correctness and precision that did great credit to their teacher, Mr. LASAR, and among which two or three of Mendelssohn's Quartets were conspicuous. It was altogether a very agreeable occasion, but at the same time deeply touching. Several of the pupils, particularly the boys, could hardly restrain their delight, and will probably long remember their great enjoyment.

Musical Chat-Chat.

OTTO DRESEL's fourth and last Soirée is unavoidably postponed. We misunderstood the nature of the Complimentary Concert which has been tendered to him; it is to be altogether a private affair. The HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY gave a good performance of "Moses in Egypt" before a large audience last Sunday evening. The chorus seats were very full, (the many among singers love to sing this brilliant music as the larger many love to hear it), and both the choruses and accompaniments, under Mr. ZERRAHN's direction, sounded finely. The part of the queen was sung, for the first time, by Mrs. HARWOOD, with a brilliant telling voice, with spirit, and considerable execution, although there is room yet for artistic cultivation. The other solos, quartets, &c., were sustained by Mrs. WENTWORTH, Mrs. HILL, Mr. ARTHURSON, Mr. WETHERBEE, Mr. BALL, and Mr. ADAMS, with their usual ability. It is to be repeated to-morrow evening.

The next Wednesday Afternoon Concert offers an uncommonly fine programme. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, and the overture to Freyschütz are good enough for any classicist; Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" scarcely less so; it is as poetic as it is brilliant. The "Zanetta" is among the best of the light overtures, and that "vagabond" Polka ought to "comprehend all vagrants" for whom the rest is too good. The few opportunities still left for hearing this fine orchestra must not slip through our fingers.

A concert is to be given in the Tremont Temple next Tuesday evening, for the benefit of the Church of Rev. Mr. GRIMES, the devoted pastor of the colored people in this city. The object is to liquidate a debt of $4,000 which rests on the church; $1,000 has been subscribed on condition that the whole shall be raised. Mr. and Mrs. MOZART, Miss TWICHELL, and Mr. J. R. ADAMS will sing, and Mr. B. J. LANG will play upon the piano; the programme is various and popular; the object certainly most worthy.... The concert for the German Benevolent Society, next Saturday evening, offers rare attractions; with the best overtures of Mozart, Weber, and Wagner, and the Andante of the Fifth Symphony, played by Mr. ZERRAHN's orchestra; choruses by the German "Orpheus," led by Mr.

KREISSMANN, and solos by Mr. SATTER and Mr. SCHULTZE, it will be as good as one more "Orchestral Concert."

Worse than the "old clothes concerts," which hang their huge bonnet banners upon every wall, "Gift Concerts" still infest the musical atmosphere. One is announced in Portsmouth, N. H., in which Mr. Satter, the pianist, is to play; the gifts range from sleeve buttons to a horse and buggy. A friend, in sending us the programme, says upon the margin: "What a pity that Art's high priests are found serving in menageries!"

Sig. ARDITI's opera, La Spia, has run five times, and the season at the Academy was to close last night. Most of the New York critics complain of this cutting short; they agree that La Spia has in it the elements of success, and ought to draw for months.... At the third Sunday evening concert of BERGMANN's orchestra, a Symphony by Schumann (new in America), Beethoven's Septet, Mendelssohn's Hebriden overture, and an original overture by Mr. Bergmann, which was received with much favor. A march from Tannhäuser was encored. Miss BEHREND sang, among other things, the Ave Maria of Franz, with orchestral accompaniment.... The New Orleans Picayune learns that Signora ELISE OSTINELLI BISCACCANTI has been engaged for next winter at the Italian Opera in Paris.... The German papers in this country contain the call for the next great festival of the "Sängerbund," to be held in Cincinnati on the 7th, 8th and 9th of June next.

Some concerts have taken place in Lawrence, Mass., during the past month, which speak well for the progress of taste. In two of them Mr. L. H. SOUTHARD of this city conducted; overtures were played by a local orchestra, leader Mr. N. FITZ. Other overtures for four hands, among them that to Egmont, were played by Messrs. FITZ and G. W. COLBY, of Lowell. Each concert commenced with copious extracts from Handel's oratorio of "Samson," and a goodly variety of songs, glees, piano solos, &c., made out the remainder.

At a Charity Concert, too, given in one of the churches on a Sunday evening, the following was the programme:

1. Fugue for Organ.....Righini.
2. Kyrie, Gloria and Agnus Dei, 7th Mass. . .Mozart.
3. "If with all your hearts," (Elijah)....Mendelssohn.
4. "Where are thy bowers, O Canaan?".....Rossini.
5. Flute Concerto for Organ.....Rink.
6. Offertorium: "O Gloriosa Domina"....Lambillotte.
7. "I know that my Redeemer liveth".....Handel.
8. Kyrie, 1st Mass.....Haydn.
9. Offertorium: "Alma Virgo".....Hummel.

The concert given in London by Mme. GOLDSCHMIDT and her husband in aid of the Nightingale Fund was crowded to excess. The programme contained a mass of good things, solid English measure, to wit:

Part I.—Symphony (G minor). Mozart; hymn for soprano, chorus and organ, "Hear my prayer, O God!" Mme. Jenny Goldschmidt, Mendelssohn Bartholdy; air, "Ah me di tanti affanni," Mr. Swift, (Davidde Penitente), Mozart; choral fantasia, pianoforte, orchestra, and chorus, pianoforte, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, Beethoven; the 130th Psalm, and other passages of Scripture paraphrased, for soprano solo, chorus and orchestra, Otto Goldschmidt.

Part II.—Overture to Shakespeare's play of the Tempest, Benedict: aria and chorus. "Squallida veste e bruna," (Il Turco in Italia) Mme. Jenny Goldschmidt, Rossini; concertstück, for pianoforte, with orchestra, pianoforte, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, Weber; trio, for soprano and two flutes (camp of Silesia) Mme. Jenny Goldschmidt, flutes, Messrs. R. Sidney Pratten and Rémusat, Meyerbeer; part-song, "When the West with Evening glows," Mendelssohn; finale, "Alziam gli evviva" (Euryanthe), soprano part by Mme. Jenny Goldschmidt, C. M. v Weber; march and chorus, from the Ruins of Athens, Beethoven.....Conductor—Mr. Benedict.

We clip the following from the London Athenæum:—

We had occasion not long ago, to express our surprise at the few good and real street songs which the American collections display. Yet there is no want of poets and tune-makers in the "Land of Promise": its drawing-rooms seem to be as liberally provided with namby-pamby as our own; and the art of recommendation has rarely been more sweetly practised, and with more ingenuity, than in the following Advertisement, which caught attention in the columns of the New York Musical Review:—

"The 'Juniata Ballads,' by Marion Dix Sullivan—This work is a collection of original Ballads, intended for the use of Schools, and particularly adapted to the wants of little singers. They will be found very interesting and pretty. We give the Author's Preface:—'To my friends of the forest and the mountain, the river, the lake, and the sea-shore—of the poor—of the laboring—and to every child, the 'Juniata Ballads' are affectionately and respectfully dedicated. They are to be sung to the oar, the loom, and the plow—through the forest, over the prairie, and in the small log-cabin by the light of a pine-knot. They are written as they came to the mind of the composer, often unsought and undesired: the melody and the words together. The latter may not be poetical, but they at least harmonize with the former. Most of them commemorate in the mind of the writer some event, or place, or circumstance. 'The Blue Juniata,' [not inserted in this book, as it is not now my property,] was a wave of memory, bearing to my mind the beautiful river, with its voices, its color, and its wild surroundings. 'The Field of Monterey,' [not now in my possession,] commemorates the death of a brave young officer who fell in the streets of that city. 'Lightly on' was written as I riding along in the forest-land of Gen. J. J. Jackson, of Virginia, and its movement is the precise musical step of my brave and beautiful horse, Selim. The song is not now in my possession. Every one which the book contains is now published for the first time. The 'Surf-Song' was composed on the Pavilion Rocks in Gloucester, amid the shouts of the bathers and the coming-in of the flood-tide. The 'Evening Hymn to the Savior' was first written upon a broken shell with a pencil, in a small boat, coming across the harbor of Plymouth, near sunset. If I knew which were the heavy and uninteresting songs in this collection, I would leave them all out; but as I do not, I will trust those to whom it is frankly offered, to do that favor for me, and to their kindness it is cheerfully confided. M. D. S."

The New Yorker, a new paper, serves up musical matters in that city in the most original manner. It appreciates Gottschalk with a vengeance:

Of all the soloists, singers, harpists, violinists, flutists, guitarists, violincellists, or pianists, our own American pet, GOTTSCHALK, is the greatest rage. The long hidden, modest, unassuming, mysterious Gottschalk. The accomplished gentleman, the ardent student, the for so long a time "poetical myth," of whom vague and curious accounts used to come to our ears, as being a monster with ten fingers on each hand, &c., has appeared among us bodily, and, whether considered as a pianist, musician, linguist, gentleman, or scholar, must hold a rank attained, to equal perfection, only by the favored few in any single one of these various departments.

Let us consider him here as merely a pianist. What is so god-like in any art as perfection? His piano performance is perfection personified. How, therefore can our admiration for him fall much short of worship? O wonderful, electric, fascinating GOTTSCHALK! we can scarcely wonder that the ancients, ignorant of the Christian religion, and the existence and divine attributes of an ever-living God, bowed down to the glory of the Sun and the beauty of the Moon; but if thou hadst appeared amongst them, we firmly believe their adoration would have been quickly changed to thee, as soon as the dazzling effulgence of thine overpowering superiority began to unfold itself to the wondering gaze and open ears of those benighted nations!

There, let us take breath! Does not that beat all the high-falutin' puffs you ever read? But is the writer really in earnest? we are led to ask by finding in another portion of his article the following:

As to GOTTSCHALK's solos, what more can we say than has been said about this terrific, and yet semi-celestial pianist? As to his compositions, his melodies certainly are built upon a framework of fundamental chords which renders them very much alike, and though each piece of his is a gem alone, yet when two or three of them are played in succession, the idea of something spelt in very much the same way that sameness is spelt naturally occurs to one's mind.

Advertisements.

PROGRAMME
OF THE
THIRD AFTERNOON CONCERT,
AT THE
BOSTON MUSIC HALL,
Wednesday, April 9th, 1856.

1. Symphony: A minor (Scotch).....Mendelssohn.
2. Overture: Zanetta.....Auber.
3. Invitation to the Dance.....Weber.
4. Vagabond Polka.....Gungl.
5. Overture: Der Freyschütz.....Weber.

Concert to commence at 3½ o'clock.—Package of six tickets, to be used at pleasure, $1. Single tickets 25 cents.
The Fourth Concert will be given Wednesday, April 16th.

Advertisements.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

MOSES IN EGYPT,

A GRAND ORATORIO BY ROSSINI,

Will be repeated at the Music Hall on SUNDAY EVENING, April 6th, assisted, as at the first performance, by Mrs. E. A. WENTWORTH,

Mrs. S. E. HARWOOD,
Mrs. F. A. HILL,
Mr. A. ARTHURSON,
Mr. J. Q. WETHERBER,
Mr. S. B. BALL,
Mr. J. W. ADAMS.

CARL ZERRAHN, Conductor..... F. F. MUELLER, Organist.

Tickets at 50 cents each, may be obtained at the principal Music Stores and Hotels, and at the Hall on the evening of the Concert.

Doors open at 6½; to commence at 7½ o'clock.

H. L. HAZELTON, Secretary.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERT,

In aid of the GERMAN BENEVOLENT SOCIETY, at the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, on SATURDAY EVENING, April 12th, when will be performed the Overtures to the "Freischütz," "Magic Flute," and "Tannhäuser," and the Andante of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, by a full Orchestra, led by Mr. ZERRAHN. — Four Choruses by the German Singing Club, "ORPHEUS," under direction of Mr. KRISMANN. — Solos by Mr. SATTER on the Piano, and Mr. WM. SCHULTZ on the Violin. All the gentlemen have kindly volunteered their services. Tickets 50 cents each, to be had at the Music Stores, and of the undersigned Committee.

C. H. F. MORING, 89 Commercial Wharf.
B. ROELKER, 89 Court Street.
F. A. HIRSCH, 18 Doane Street.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S

Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,

19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

AFTERNOON CONCERTS
AT THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

A Series of SIX WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS will be given at the Boston Music Hall, commencing March 26th, under the direction of CARL ZERRAHN. The Orchestra will be the same which has given so much satisfaction at the series of Orchestral Concerts just terminated. The selections will be of a character suited to all the various tastes of the community, consisting of Symphonies, Overtures, Arrangements from popular Operas, Waltzes, &c.

The managers pledge themselves to make these Concerts worthy of the liberal support of the community.

Packages of six tickets, to be used at pleasure, $1. Single tickets 25 cts. For sale at the Music Stores and at the door. The Concerts will commence at 3½ o'clock.

CHOICE MUSICAL WORKS.

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS, complete in two large quarto volumes, printed from engraved plates, and pronounced the most elegant specimen of music typography ever executed. Bound in cloth, embossed and lettered. — Price of a single vol. $7.50; of both volumes, $12.

MENDELSSOHN'S SONGS WITHOUT WORDS complete in one vol. quarto, bound in cloth, embossed and lettered. Price $3.

MENDELSSOHN'S FOUR-PART SONGS. Text in German and English. The latter by J. C. D. PARKER. — In cloth, $1.50; boards $1.25

DITSON'S STANDARD OPERAS, 6 vols. Norma, Lucia, Sonnambula, Lucrezia, Ernani. English and Italian text, each, $2. Don Giovanni, Piano Solo, $1.50.

ORATORIOS. Creation, $1.25. Messiah, $1.25. Moses in Egypt, $1.50.

MASSSES. Mozart's Requiem, $1; Mozart's 12th Mass, $1; Beethoven's Mass in C, 75 cents; Haydn's 84 Mass, 75 cts.; Rossini's Stabat Mater, Latin and English words, $1.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

The Latest Publications of

J. A. NOVELLO.

ORIGINAL LONDON EDITIONS.

Novello's Complete Folio Edition.

RINK'S PRACTICAL ORGAN SCHOOL,

Op. 55. Carefully revised and corrected; with the German directions and terms translated into English. Price $3.75; or in Six Parts, 75 cents each.

PREFACE.

Nos. 1 to 12. Short and easy pieces in two parts.
" 13 to 24. " " three parts.
" 25 to 36. " " four parts.
" 37 to 66. Preludiums, in various keys, for soft or loud stops.

PART II, price 75c., contains—

Nos. 67 to 132. Exercises for the pedals.
" 133 to 144. Twelve Chorales, or well-known German Psalm Tunes, with variations.

PART III, price 75c., contains—

Nos. 145 to 159. Fifteen easy Postludes, or Concluding Voluntaries, in the Fugue style.

PART IV, price 75c., contains—

Nos. 160 to 174. Fifteen Postludes, or Concluding Voluntaries for alternate manuals, in the Fugue style.

PART V, price 75c., contains—

Nos. 175 to 181. Seven Preludes and Fugues.
No. 182. The Flute Concerto.
" 183. Variations on "Heil dir Sieges Kranz," or, "God save the Queen."

PART VI, price 75c., contains—

Nos. 184 to 192. Nine Preludes and Fugues.
" 193 to 194. Fantasia and Fugue.

Please to order Novello's Edition, and quote the prices.

MENDELSSOHN'S

SIX GRAND SONATAS FOR THE ORGAN.

New Edition, complete in one Book, $1.75, or singly, as follows:

No. 1. Price 44c.	No. 4. Price 88c.
2. " 25c.	5. " 25c.
3. " 25c.	6. " 31c.

Composed and dedicated to Dr. F. SCHLEMMER, by FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY. Op. 65.
J. Alfred Novello, London and New York.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY

FOR THE DIFFUSION OF

MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

Vol. 8. Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition with the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering. (Former price $5.25c.) In paper wrappers, $1.18c. By mail—$1.20c.

Volumes of this series already issued.

- Vol. 1. Cherubim's Counterpoint and Fugue, $1.68c.
- " 2. Dr. Marx' General Musical Instruction, 1 63.
- " 3. Fêtes on Choir and Chorus Singing, 39.
- " 4. Mozart's succinct Thoro' Bass School, 21.
- " 5. Catech's Treatise on Harmony, 68.
- " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected writings on Thoro' Bass, Harmony and Composition for self-instruction. Vol. 1. Harmony and Thoro' Bass, price 88c. Vols. 2 and 3. Guide to Composition, 88c., each. Three vols. bound in one complete, Cloth Boards—$2 63c.

J. A. NOVELLO,

Sacred Music Store, 389 Broadway, New York.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 18 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

APR 29 BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

ED. B. ROBINSON,
PIANO-FORTE TUNER.

Orders received at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington Street.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER,

Will be happy to give instruction in Piano-forte and Organ playing, and the Theory of Music. Address:—No. 8 Hayward Place. May 26. 17

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,

RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

J. TRENKLE,

TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.

Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

Mlle GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE

—OPIES—

INSTRUCTION on the PIANO-FORTE,
And may be addressed at her residence, 55 Hancock St.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 232 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,

TEACHER OF MUSIC,

205 Washington Street, Boston.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,

Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,

U. S. HOTEL.

Communications can be left at Mr. Ditson's music store.

C. H. CLARKE,
TEACHER OF MUSIC, 265 Washington St.
RESIDENCE... 13 SHAWMUT STREET, BOSTON.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. [Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
do do each subsequent.....$6 00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 210.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 12, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 2.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
O. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by
JOHN S. DWIGHT, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court
of the District of Massachusetts.]

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Translated from the French of Madame de Staël, for the Journal of Music.

CHAPTER III.

CECILIA.

But it was written in the book of my destiny that I should meet Celio on my way. I reached Cecilia's box, knocked, and some one opened; instead of the sweet and sad face of the cantatrice, I saw the angry visage of the debutant, who received me with a scornful glance and these insolent words: "What do you want, sir?"

"I thought I knocked at Signora Boccaferri's door," answered I; "has she changed her box?"

"No, no, this is it!" cried Cecilia from within. "Come in, Signor Salentini, I am very glad to see you."

I entered; she was changing her costume behind a screen. Celio sat down upon the sofa; without speaking to me, and even without deigning to pay the least attention to my presence, he resumed the conversation where I had interrupted it. To tell the truth, it was rather a monologue than a conversation. He went on with his exclamations and his curses, sending to the devil the dull and stupid pit of Germans, tipplers as cold as their beer, as pale as their coffee. The box-holders were no better used—"I know that I sang badly and acted worse," said he to Boccaferri, as if in reply to a remark she had made before I came in; "but who could be inspired before three rows of diplomatic asses and frightful dowagers? Cursed be the thought that made me choose Vienna for my debut! Nowhere are the women so ugly, the air so close, life so dull, and men so stupid. Below, brutes freeze you, above, monsters frighten you. There are devils everywhere. I was like my audience, insipid and detestable!"

The naïveté of this tirade reconciled me to Celio. I told him that as an Italian and his countryman, I proclaimed against his sentence, and said I had not listened coldly, but protested against the severity of the public.

At these advances, he raised his head, looked me full in the face and came to me with outstretched hand: "Ah! yes!" said he, "you were in one of the stage boxes, with the Duchess de — You sustained me, I noticed that; Cecilia Boccaferri, my kind companion, observed it too. That jade of a duchess deserted me too! but you struggled till the last moment. Well, give me your hand; I thank you. It seems that you also are an artist, that you have talent and success. It is a good thing to wish to assure and console the fallen! it will bring you good fortune."

He spoke so quickly, with such a firm accent, and so free a cordiality, that, although shocked by the harsh expression which he applied to the duchess, so lately my love, I could not resist his advances, or remain unmoved by the pressure of his hand. I have always judged people by this sign. A cold hand annoys me, a damp hand disgusts me, a dry pressure irritates me, a hand which only touches the tips of my fingers frightens me; but a hand soft and warm, which knows how to press mine without hurting it, and which does not hesitate to give its whole palm to a manly hand, inspires me with confidence and quick sympathy. Some observers of the human race judge by the expression, some by the shape of the forehead, some by the voice, others by the smile, others by the handwriting, &c. But I believe that the man shines through every detail of his being, and that every action is an index to his character. So that if one has time, all is to be examined; but from the very first, I own that I am won or repulsed by the first shake of the hand.

I sat down by Celio, and strove to console him for his disappointment, in speaking to him of his resources and his sure talents. "Do not flatter me, do not spare me," cried he frankly; "I was bad and deserved a fall; but do not judge me, I beseech you, by this miserable début. I am better than that. Only I am not old enough to be self-possessed in the cold. I need an audience that inspires me; and I found one to-night, that, from the very first, could only tolerate me. I felt wounded and vexed, before the trial; when I came on the stage I was chilled and struck by a gloomy presentiment. Anger is good sometimes, but it must act with the will. Mine was not sufficiently cooled, neither was it hot enough; and I sank under it. O my poor mother! if you had been there, you would have inspired me by your presence, and I should have been worthy to bear your name! Sleep well, under the cypress, dear saint! This is the first time that I ever rejoiced that your eyes are forever closed upon me!"

A great tear ran down Celio's glowing cheek. This sincerity, this enthusiasm towards his mother, and his expansion before me, effaced all the bad effects of his appearance on the stage. I was softened, and felt that I loved him. Then, in seeing how truly beautiful he was, how thrilling his tones and sympathetic his expression, I forgave the duchess for loving him two days; I could not forgive her for loving him no longer.

It remained for me to find out whether he was loved also by Cecilia Boccaferri. She left her dressing room and sat down between us, taking us both by the hand, and turning to me, she said: "It is the first time that I press your hand, but it is with all my heart. You have come to console my poor Celio, the friend of my childhood, the son of my benefactress, almost my brother. But it is easy for you; I know you are a noble soul, and that true talent possesses kindness and frankness. Listen, Celio," said she, as if struck by a sudden idea; "go and change your costume; it is high time. I have a few words to say to Monsieur Salentini. You will come back after me, so that we can all go home together."

Celio went without hesitation and with perfect confidence. Was he then so sure of her fidelity to him? or was he not Cecilia's lover? And why should he be? Why should I have thought of it, when perhaps they never had?

All this passed quickly and confusedly through my mind. I still held Cecilia's hand in mine; I had kept it there, and she did not seem to dislike it. I questioned the mysterious fibres of that little hand, rather strong, slightly warm, and very calm, while I plunged into the depths of the large and grave eyes of the cantatrice; but a woman's eyes and hands are not so easily read as a man's. My skill in observing and my delicacy of perception have often enlightened or betrayed me according to the sex.

By a very natural movement to draw up her shawl, the Boccaferri withdrew her hand as soon as we were alone, without turning her eyes away from me.

"Monsieur Salentini," said she, "you are attentive to the Duchess de X—, and you were jealous of Celio to-night, but you are so no longer? Am I not right? You see you have no reason to be so."

"I am not sure but that I might have been jealous of Celio had I been paying my court to the duchess," replied I, drawing near to the Boccaferri; "but I swear to you that I am not jealous, for she is not the woman I love."

Cecilia lowered her eyes, but with an expression of dignity and not uneasiness.

"I do not question your secrets," said she; "I am not so indiscreet. They cannot excite my curiosity; but I speak frankly. I would give my life for Celio. I know that some women of the world are very dangerous, and it has pained me to see him visit some of them. I foresaw that his beauty would be fatal to him, and perhaps his misfortune of-night is the result of intrigue and jealousy. You know the world better than I; I go into it sometimes to sing and observe without seeming to. Well, I saw Celio hissed to-night by people who promised their plaudits this morning, and I believe I understood some little dramas in the boxes near us. I also observed your generosity, and it touched me deeply. Celio, even during his short stay in Vienna, has made enemies. I am not in a position to save him from them; but when I have an opportunity of making and keeping a noble friendship for him, I must not neglect it. Celio did not aspire to please the duchess; that is all I had to say to you, Signor Salentini, and I can affirm that upon my honor, for Celio has no secrets from me, and I questioned him about that before you came in."

Every one knows the figure he makes when he finds the place occupied which he dreamed of conquering. I did my best to hide my disappointment.

"Kind Cecilia," answered I, "I assure you I do not care, and I give Celio permission to be or not to be the lover of the duchess, without changing my sympathy for him in the least, my impartiality as a critic, or my zeal as a friend. Yes, I will be his friend from the bottom of my heart, since he is yours, for you are one of those persons whom I esteem most highly. You understand it so, since you have so frankly told me the secret of your heart, and I thank you for it."

"The secret of my heart!" cried the Boccaferri, with a sincere tone which amazed me. "What secret?"

"Are you then so absorbed as to have told me without knowing it of your love for Celio, or have you already forgotten it?"

Boccaferri began to laugh. I had never seen her laugh before, and a laugh also is a sign to study. Her grave and reserved face seemed hardly made for gaiety, and yet that ray of mirth lit it up with a beauty I did not know to be hers. It was the fresh, harmonious laugh of a kind and merry little girl.

"Yes, yes," said she, "I have been very absent-minded to have talked as I did about Celio, without knowing that you must have supposed me to be in love with him; but what of it? It would be pedantic in me to defend myself, for it must seem very natural to you, and at all events very indifferent to you."

"Very natural, possibly—very indifferent—that too may be possible; but I beg you to explain yourself;" and I caught hold of Cecilia's arm with an involuntary brusquerie which I regretted in a moment, for she looked at me with astonishment, as if I had brushed away a spider or saved her from a burn. So I calmed myself and added: "I long to know if I am enough of a friend to be confided in, or only so little of a friend that you care not to be known by me."

"Neither the one nor the other," answered she. "If I had such a secret, I must say that I should not confide it to you without knowing you and proving you better; but as I have no such secret, I am willing you should know me as I am. I will explain my devotion to Celio, and first will tell you that Celio has two sisters and a little brother, for whom I would devote myself even more, because they may need a woman's protection more than he. O yes, if I were independent, I would consecrate myself to filling the place of Floriani to her children; for the being that I love with passion and enthusiasm is a name, a departed woman, a holy souvenir, the great and good Lucrezia Floriani!"

The thought crossed me that an hour ago the duchess had charged her fondness to Celio upon an old friendship with his mother. The duchess was thirty years old, like the Boccaferri. The Floriani died at forty, having left the stage some twelve or fourteen years before.—Had these women known her so very much? I do not know why it seemed so improbable to me. I feared lest the name of Floriani served Celio better with women than with the public.

I do not know whether my doubt was visible in my face, or if Cecilia naturally anticipated my objection, for she said without changing: "And yet I never saw her more than five or six times in my life, and our longest intimacy was but a fortnight long, when I was still a child."

She paused; I did not break the silence; I watched her. A doubtful embarrassment came over her, but she soon continued: "It pains me to tell you why my heart is devoted to the worship of this woman, but I presume I shall tell you nothing new. My father, you know, is an excellent man, of ardent, generous soul and superior intelligence—or, perhaps you do not know that; and you only know with the rest of the world, that he has always lived in disorder, carelessness and want. He was too agreeable not to have a great many friends; he made new ones every day, because he pleased, but he never kept any, for he was incorrigible, and their aid could never cure his imprudence or his delusions. The list of those to whom we are indebted would be long indeed; but only one person has a right to our eternal adoration. Only one among the others, one only in the world never wearied of saving us every day, sometimes oftener. Inexhaustible in patience, in forbearance, in understanding and in her generosity, the great Floriani never despised my father, and never humiliated him by her pity or her reproach. Never did these cruel and bitter words escape her lips: 'That poor man had talent, but poverty has degraded him.' No! Floriani said: 'Jacopo Boccaferri may do his best, he can never be anything but a genius!' and it was true; but to see that, one must be his daughter or the great artist Lucrezia."

For twenty years, from the day she first saw him to the day she died, she treated him with the confidence of a friend who never doubts. She knew, at the bottom of her heart, that her gifts would not enrich him, and that every enormous debt which she paid, would lead to others. But she never stopped. My father only had to write her one word, and the money came immediately, and with the money came consolation, the soul's delight, a few lines beautiful and good! I have kept all those precious notes, like so many relics. The last one said: 'Courage, my friend, this time fortune will smile upon your efforts, I am sure. Kiss Cecilia for me, and rely always upon your old friend.'

"Only see what delicacy and knowledge of life! It was the hundredth time she had so spoken. She always encouraged him to begin some new work. It never lasted, and made matters worse; but without that, he would have died in misery, long ago, and now he is alive, and may yet save himself. Yes, yes, Floriani bequeathed me her courage—without her I too might have doubted my father, but I have always faith in him, thanks to her! He is old, but not ruined. His wisdom and pride have lost none of their strength. I cannot make him as rich as a person of his imagination should be, but I can keep him from poverty and depression. He shall not fall; for I am strong!"

She spoke with wonderful zeal, although it was subdued by the calm dignity of her manner.

She was transfigured in my eyes, or rather, she revealed to me those treasures of soul, which I always imagined hers. I took her hand frankly this time and kissed it without reserve.

"You are a noble being," said I to her, "and I am proud of the effort which you have made to confess to me that nobleness which you hide from the world, as others hide the shame of their baseness. Speak on, I beg you; you cannot know the good you do me, to me, who was born to trust and love, but whom the world always saddens and alarms."

"But I have nothing more to say, my friend. Floriani is dead, but she still lives in my heart. Her oldest son is beginning life, and treads the path of his destiny with a venturesome foot. Shall I doubt him? Ah, if he is ambitious, imprudent, even powerless in his art, if he should be mistaken a thousand times and be guilty towards himself, I shall love and serve him like his mother. I can do but a very little, almost nothing; but whatever I am, I am willing it should be the stepping-stone to his glory, since in glory he seeks his happiness. You can see plainly, Signor Salentini, that it is not love I think of. My mind and heart are necessarily serious; I have no time to lose or strength to waste upon my own fancies."

"Ah yes! I understand you," cried I; "yours is a life of sacrifice and devotion! You are not on the stage to please yourself. You do not like the theatre, that is easily seen; you do not aim at success. You disdain glory; you labor for others."

"I work for my father," answered she, "and thanks to Floriani that I can thus work. Without her aid, I should still have been a poor needlewoman, gaining hardly a piece of bread all the day to keep my father from begging through the streets in our dark days. But she once chanced to hear me, and liked my voice. She told me that I might sing in drawing-rooms and even on the stage, in the second parts. She gave me a fine teacher; I did my best. I was no longer young; I was twenty-six years old, and had suffered a great deal; but as I did not aspire to the first rank, I rapidly reached the second. I dreaded the theatre. My father worked there as actor, decorator, and even as prompter, as his fortune rose or fell. I well knew, early in life, that mass of impurity in which no maiden can keep from stain without martyrdom. I hesitated a long time; I gave lessons, and sang in concerts; but nothing was sure. I needed boldness, and could not intrigue. My patronage, from the first very modest and limited, lessened day by day. Floriani died almost suddenly. I felt that my father had no support but me. I leaped the boundary, conquered my aversion for that contact with the public, which wounds the purity of the soul, and dishonors the sacredness of thought. I have been an actress for three or four years, and shall remain one as long as it pleases God. I tell no one what I suffer by this concealment of my tastes, this wrong done to my best instincts. What good would complaining do? has not every one their burden? I am strong enough to bear mine: I follow my profession with conscience. I love my art. I should not say true, if I did not own that I love it passionately; but I wish I could have cultivated it under other auspices. I was born to play the organ in a convent, and to chant the evening prayer among the deep and mysterious echoes of a cloister. But what difference does it make? Let us talk of myself no longer; it is too much for me!"

Cecilia hastily wiped away a struggling tear, and held out her hand to me in smiling. I was beside myself. My hour had come: I was in love!

[To be continued.]

(From the New York Musical Times.)

Sketch of the Conservatory of Paris.

PART I.

Prior to the Revolution of 1789, no public musical institution existed in France. The only schools for music then in vogue, were the maitries, or chapels (attached, mainly, to the metropolitan churches), in which ten or twelve boys were trained for Divine worship. Received in the chapel at the age of eight or nine years, they left at sixteen or seventeen, the period of change in the male voice. Their musical acquirements were limited to singing and reading at sight, no instrument being taught them, except, perhaps, the organ, occasionally, or some other instrument with which the master of the chapel chanced to be acquainted. As the voice alone was cultivated, these boys devoted themselves for the most part to operatic pursuits. The revolution having monopolized all the funds belonging to the clergy, and closed most of the religious buildings, the chapels, or maitries, fell, with the corporations which supported them. And now music, with the other fine arts, seemed sunk in the waves of the revolution. This, however, was not the case.

About the year 1794, there was living in Paris a man whose name was unknown to fame. He was not even a musician; but nature had endowed him with taste and love for music; he was also a friend of learning and belles lettres, had travelled through Germany, and held intercourse with the greatest artists there. Fond of the fine arts generally, as he was, Italy attracted also his attention. He went to Rome, where he found the celebrated Zingarelli, then master of the Pope's chapel. Thence he repaired to Naples, where he met the illustrious and unfortunate Cimarosa. He also examined, with the closest care, the Musical Conservatory of this last-named city, as well as those of Milan and Florence. This man's name was SARETTE, the founder of the French Conservatory of Music.

Not to anticipate, however—on his return to Paris, Sarette found that civil disturbances were not yet settled, and the government being engaged in war with almost all the nations of Europe, it was difficult to see whence the money was to come for the enterprise he now had in view. Sarette, nevertheless, was not easily disheartened. He had frequent interviews with members of the National Convention, before whom he laid his plans, which received their approbation. However, it was not until the year 1795 that the establishment of a National Conservatory of France was sanctioned by the decree of the Convention. The decree read thus:—That a National Conservatory of Music is about to be founded in the city of Paris, the expenses of which will be paid by the public treasury. The same decree appointed M. Sarette director of the establishment, with a fixed salary, the amount of which at that time I am not able to state. The present director's salary is 6000 francs, (1200 dollars). A building was also purchased in the Rue du Faubourg Poissonniere, which still continues to be the locality of the Conservatory. The passer by reads on a large stone over the door, the words:—Conservatoire National de Musique et de Declamation. The reason of the word Declamation in the inscription will hereafter be given. The Conservatory continued in the same condition until the period of Napoleon's consulship, 1800: at which time he fully developed the institution, regulated the subjects of study, determined the several departments, and enlarged the building. Sarette continued director of the Conservatory till the overthrow of the Empire, in 1814, when he was discharged, and CHERUBINI made director in his stead. Under this great man, the institution now became, and has since remained, the first musical school of the world. But we will now enter upon a detailed account of the interior regulations of the Conservatory, as they exist at the present day.

Though formed after the model of the Italian Conservatories, the Conservatoire of Paris differs very much from these schools. The Italian Conservatories are devoted mainly to the cultivation of the voice. Instrumentation may not wholly be excluded, but no great instrumental performer who has graduated from these schools, has been heard, I believe, in Paris, and the orchestras of the Italian theatres are admitted to be the poorest in Europe. Such is not the case in the Conservatory of France; not only particular care is given to the cultivation of the voice, but all instruments, from the violin down to the contrabass, from the flute down to the piccolo, from the sweet, melancholy horn, down to the shrill-sounding trombone, are taught in classes, by the most distinguished practical performers of the capital. Among the professors of singing, the Conservatory will always boast of Ellevion, Garat, Martin, Garcia, Bordogni, Ponchard, Duprez, and Mme. Cinti-Damoreau. In the instrumental department, the memory of the celebrated Baillot and Habeneck will never die. As professors of musical composition, counterpoint, and fugue, who knows not the names of Mehul, Gossec, Lesueur, Berton, Cherubini, Herold, Paer, Reicha, Catel, Fétis, Halevy and Auber? Of all these stars of song, some have disappeared from the heaven of harmony, some shine yet, and charm the world by their melodious strains.

The scheme of the Conservatory is not confined to musical matters. The main object of its founders in appointing classes of singing, and securing for them the most distinguished teachers in that branch of the art, was not to form mere singers, but they aimed also at furnishing the French stage with the most accomplished elocutionists, and they created, therefore, classes for the art of delivery, called classes of declamation. Thus, individuals of both sexes who have followed daily the several branches appertaining to the stage, are either able actors, or accomplished singers. Fencing and dancing have also been considered as accomplishments necessary for pupils destined to scenical pursuits.

The Conservatory of Paris, as regulated by Cherubini, indeed, is a model of its kind. It is an immutable rule for those who apply for admission as professors, to compete for their post. Should a performer of unquestionable talent seek a professorship in some instrumental department, and ask Cherubini to be excused from a competition, he would invariably answer:—"Sir, you must compete; I have made the rule, and can't break it." The same course holds with those who want to be admitted into any class whatever. They must submit to the severest examination.

I have stated that the Conservatory was created to impart musical knowledge to the youth of both sexes. But the pupils are not promiscuously thrust into classes suited to their capacity. Girls are instructed in a separate part of the house, and by female teachers. The boys cannot have any intercourse with them. Good morals demanded the adoption of this measure. Cherubini watched with the utmost care this particular point. If he caught a young man conversing with a girl, or loitering with her about the yards, corridors, or any other parts of the building, he would look at them with a stern and angry face, and give them a severe admonition; if found transgressing a second time, they were sent home, and without any hope for a second admission.

The first department of instruction is the sol-feggio, or solmization for the young people of both sexes. They remain in that class two or three years or more, till they are found ready to begin with some instrument, or make their first trials in singing. Most of the pupils in the Conservatory attend this class with the greatest assiduity; they are trained to sing the most difficult exercises written in all keys, moods, and measures, singing them in their original form, and transposing them into all the keys. It is not unusual, in the public competition for prizes which closes the year's studies, to see a pupil transpose extemporaneously an exercise for the piano from one key to another. Those who possess an accurate notion of the instrument, will have an idea of the difficulty of such an attempt. The palm is given to the young performer who accomplishes the task most successfully.

All the students of the piano, both male and female, are obliged to have attended a course of harmony for two years. None are received, in any class of the piano, unless they have fulfilled this condition.

The length of study, in every department, is three years. The pupils who have not been judged worthy of the first or second prize during that period, are obliged to withdraw from the class. Whether their failing be attributed to their negligence, or to their deficiency of ability, they are thought unworthy to remain in the same class. I should say, that, in order to be admitted to any instrumental or singing class whatever, it is not necessary to have learned music in the Conservatory. Whoever has received at home, or elsewhere, a sufficient musical training to undergo the examination required, has a chance for admission.

This admission is anxiously sought, particularly by the middling orders of the people of Paris; who see in it a means to secure a lucrative employment, and sometimes a glorious career for their children. (The Conservatory being supported by government, the instruction is of course given gratuitously.) Hence, to fill the place of a single pupil who has left, numberless applicants come to compete. This is especially the case with the piano, for which very often the choice is between a hundred rivals; who, in view of so many competitors and so strict an examination, have practised their instrument previously; and a place in the piano class is often given to a person who would be considered a consummate performer in a saloon. Hence it happens in many instances, that a pupil gains the first premium the very same year in which he has been admitted.

After the piano, the classes for the violin are the most crowded. These two classes, (piano and violin) have furnished France, and especially the city of Paris, with the most admirable professors and performers of the world. To the violin class thanks must be rendered for those unrivalled orchestres, which so marvellously perform the great works of Beethoven, Mozart, and other celebrated masters. One who has never heard the inimitable orchestra of the Conservatoire, can hardly boast of having ever heard instrumental music. This is the peculiar glory of the French Conservatory, a glory in which no other institution whatever shares.

Violin performers from the Conservatory earn considerable money both in Paris and the provinces. Piano players, although shut out from orchestras, have abundant occupation, on account of the popularity of the instrument. The violoncello and contrabass classes of the Conservatory have not so many applicants, and yet they produce a good number of able performers. The classes for wind and brass instruments are also not very numerous attended, as persons who play at all on these instruments, find it easy to secure good situations for themselves in orchestras, or ball and military bands. As teachers they would hardly be able to secure a livelihood for themselves and families. Therefore, instruction on these instruments is hardly to be found, out of the Conservatory.

Every quarter the pupils of each department have to submit to an examination. There recurs a circumstance to me in which I myself was concerned, and which may serve to illustrate, somewhat, the character of Cherubini. The pupils in Reicha's department of counterpoint were being examined, and the examiners were Lesueur, Berton, and Cherubini himself: for he considered it a duty to be present at all examinations. The pupils of the class were twelve in number, including myself. Lesueur and Berton had read through my exercises without making an observation. I considered them irreproachable. But I was greatly mistaken. Cherubini took my exercises and ran through them in the twinkling of an eye. I observed that he frowned at a certain point. After he had finished the exercise, which was a four-part fugue with 8vo counterpoint, he placed it before him, crossed his arms over his breast, and turning to me slowly, said: "Well, Sir, did you really learn harmony?"—"I believe so, Sir," I replied (a little nettled at the insinuation). "Take your exercise Sir," resumed Cherubini, "and look at the seventh measure of the last staff of your work." I took the manuscript and looked at the point indicated. "Sir," answered I, "I look, but can see no mistake in it." Lesueur, Berton, Reicha, and all the others present had their eyes bent on me, increasing my confusion and rendering it impossible for me to discover the mistake which had caught the eye of Cherubini. "As you are unable to discover your own blunders," said he, "give me the exercise again." But, at that very instant I perceived that there was indeed a hidden fifth (quinte cachée) between soprano and alto. "Excuse me, Sir," I remarked; "another time I will try to be more cautious." Cherubini smiled, turned his eyes to another side, and the examination went on.

This little incident will give some slight idea of the scholastic severity, and the keen perception of the great contrapuntist.

SCHUBERT AND MENDELSSOHN.—No one can fail to recognize a good deal of truth in the following contrast drawn between the two most admired German composers after Beethoven, by the Musical Review.

While yet Mozart and Haydn were scarcely dead, and Beethoven was in his full power of genius, there lived in Vienna, the very place where all this musical grandeur and splendor was displayed, a young man of the name of FRANZ SCHUBERT. He composed songs, trios, quartets, symphonies, some of them as good as anything which has been written, without, however, eliciting much praise from the public. He composed for his own pleasure, and for that of his friends; lived mostly in his miserable lodging or in some wine-cellar, and passed by as unnoticed as a second or third-rate music-teacher in our own city would do. He lived a poor, miserable, neglected life for some thirty years. His death was like his life—a modest death, known, noticed only by the few, and regretted only by the few.

Some few years later, when Germany, in a general dearth of genius and talent, lived only in its former musical grandeur, a young man started up in Berlin, who was suddenly proclaimed as the lawful inheritor of the powers of the golden classical epoch of music. Born of rich parents, surrounded from his childhood by eminent literary men, educated with the utmost care, and endowed besides with a very good ear, very good memory, fine taste and talent, the young man of the name of MENDELSSOHN very soon made his way even beyond the boundaries of his native country. His works were performed, praised, and largely paid for. Being himself in an eminent social position, he very soon attained a musical one in Leipzig, as conductor of the celebrated Gewandhaus Concerts, and held for a long time artistic supremacy in Germany as well as in England. When he died, his fame was universal and his funeral a stately one, attended with all that pomp which is called forth on such occasions. Now, supposing Mendelssohn had lived at the time of Mozart and Beethoven, in the same miserable circumstances as poor Schubert, and the latter had occupied his cradle in Berlin, what would have been the present fate of both? Would we have Mendelssohn, and no Schubert, Festivals?

We thought of this, when we heard, at Messrs. Mason and Bergmann's Matinée, first the trio of Schubert, and then the quintet of Mendelssohn; and having said this, our criticism upon both men and their works is said. Schubert had not the neat miniature details of Mendelssohn; he is often careless, but he has grand ideas; almost every measure is fresh and original; and as to modulations and knowledge of the carrying out his ideas, he stands nearer to Beethoven than any body else, Schumann perhaps excepted. The lives and fate of both men is a very curious subject, which has not yet been treated sufficiently.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

Two new operas have been exciting some interest. The first, by SCRIBE and AUVER, was produced at the Opera Comique in the last week in February. The correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune thus describes it:

Its title is Manon Lescaut—it might just as well have been anything else, for M. Scribe never more abused the license of the dramatist than when he gave the title of the Abbé Provost's immortal story to this new comedy-opera. It is really curious to see how M. Scribe has contrived his plot. Manon is a young country seamstress, rich in beauty and youth, who has come up to Paris to get work, and soon forms a friendship with another grisette, who has a lover who is merely discounting his future happiness, which will be duly honored by the law and religion when the "good time" comes. Manon discounts the love of the Chevalier Desgrieux, and at once engages him (who has little fortune) to sell his last jewel for 690 livres that they may enjoy a merry dinner. Manon's youth and beauty have tangled the eyes of a colonel, who posts a boor (who happens to be a cousin of Manon) to keep him acquainted with Manon's proceedings. While Manon and Desgrieux are dining, this boor goes to a neighboring "hell" and loses all his money; he returns and borrows all Manon has, and she has Desgrieux's purse, so that when "Rabelais quarter of an hour" comes, neither can pay for the dinner, whereupon they are grossly insulted and menaced with the gaol. Manon takes a guitar, and singing on the boulevard, soon gathers a good deal of money; after paying her debt she goes after Desgrieux, and finds that he has enlisted in the regiment of the colonel who is in love with her. His misconduct soon places him under arrest, and she goes to crave the colonel's pardon for him. The colonel gives his consent very willingly, but he insists on one condition—which Manon cannot accept. She next hears that Desgrieux has broken from his prison after soundly beating his gaolers, and consequently has incurred capital punishment. She again appeals to the colonel, who consents to pardon Desgrieux, provided Manon promises never to see the latter again, and sup with him, the colonel. She consents, and the colonel is called out. Desgrieux appears; he reproaches Manon for her infidelity; she justifies herself by avowing unabated love and engaging him to eat the colonel's supper. They have scarcely commenced the attack on the supper when the colonel reappears. There is a duel between him and Desgrieux, in which he falls, and as he dies he tears up the engagement of Desgrieux, which releases the latter from the army. But Manon is instantly arrested for robbery (she is innocent, her cousin being the culprit) and is condemned to transportation. We see her in the third act in Louisiana. Desgrieux immediately rejoins her; he spends his last louis to fee the gaoler to allow them to meet; they escape from gaol and wander from bayou to bayou until they fall exhausted; as she is dying, messengers come to announce that her innocence is recognized, and that she is freed from prison.

This opera was interesting—apart from the very great attention paid to every production from MM. Scribe and Auber—as being the piece in which Mme. MARIE CABEL appeared there. This songstress has long been the idol of the Théâtre Lyrique, but a good many persons thought she would not be very successful at the Opera Comique. These were mistaken. She is perhaps the most charming and brilliant comedy opera songstress in Paris. M. Auber was never younger, gayer, clearer, more elegant than in this piece.

The other is "The Siege of Florence," by the great contrabassist, Sig. BOTTESINI, in whose doings our readers will of course be interested. The Musical World (London) says of it:

The scene of L'Assedio di Firenze is laid in the beginning of the 16th century. The reader of Italian history will remember the siege of Florence, which commenced in October, 1529, and lasted for eleven months, during which the inhabitants suffered all the tortures of prolonged famine. It is related that more than twenty thousand citizens and soldiers perished in that time. An episode in the history of the siege has furnished the story of the opera. The youthful Ludovico Martelli, on the side of the Republic, sent a challenge to Giovanni Bandini, in the army of the Emperor, Charles V. Bandini accepted the challenge. The combatants met, with two seconds, in presence of the Florentine and Imperial armies, and fought, the seconds engaging at the same time. The second of Martelli, named Dante di Castiglione, slew his opponent; but Martelli was so seriously wounded by Bandini, that he was forced to yield himself vanquished, and died shortly afterwards. The records of the period hinted that patriotism alone was not the cause of the duel, and that there was a lady in the case. It was this hint which inspired the poet, or rather the romancist. The lady was Maria di Ricci, wife of Signor Nicolo Beninetti. M. CORGI, the reputed author of the libretto, merely altered the original book, which was written at New York, by M. MARETTA, who took his story from L'Assedio di Firenze, a romance by F. D. Guerrazzi. The librettist has interpolated the character of Michael Angelo Buonarroti, who figures largely in the poem.

While differences of opinion exist as to the special merits of the music, all agree in proclaiming Signor Bottesini a thoroughly accomplished musician, and his opera a very able work. The choruses are universally praised for their vigor and character; and the orchestration for its richness and variety. A chorus of women in the first act has been particularly noticed for its grace and elegance, and is by some considered the capital morceau of the opera. A cavatina for Michael Angelo in the second act also produced a great effect. A scene in the third act, where Bandini and Ludovico meet Maria in presence of Michael Angelo, and sing a quartet, is said to recall the second finale of Lucia. Signor Bottesini, however, has not availed himself of Donizetti's ideas, but has treated the situation in a novel manner, and with dramatic power. This scene was greatly applauded. The opening chorus of this act, more especially the ritournelle, is said to be beautiful. The fourth and last act—as is too often the case in modern opera—is described as not so suggestive in situations, nor so rich in musical illustrations. The final scene, where Ludovico enters wounded and dies on the stage, again reminds some critics of the last scene of Lucia. Here, however, the musician appears once more to have displayed originality in his manner of treating the subject, and has nothing in common with his predecessor.

The reception accorded to the new opera must have been flattering to the composer. The execution was entrusted to Mme. PENCO (Maria), Signors MARIO (Ludovico Martelli), GRAZIANI (Bandini), and ANGELINI (Michael Angelo). Mme. Penco sang delightfully, and Signors Graziani and Angelini acquitted themselves in their parts with excellent effect. As for Mario—a first performance being nothing more than a rehearsal—little need be said. He was not himself—he never is entirely himself on a first night. The public should wait until the second, third, or fourth. Mario, in all probability, will then be himself—that is something beyond comparison. The directors have spared no expense in the scenic decorations and dresses. The "getting up" of the Assedio di Firenze indeed, is praised by all the authorities as splendid and complete.

M. AMANDI has appeared at the Grand Opera as Robert in Robert le Diable. His voice and singing are praised, but his acting criticized. The change in the direction of the Théâtre Lyrique has at last taken place. M. Carvalho has been nominated in lieu of M. Pellegrin. A new opera, in one act, called En venant de Pointoise, has been produced at the Bouffes-Parisiens, and introduced Mlle. CLAIRE COURTOISE. Both piece and artist were successful.

M. Calzado, determined that the "Italiens" should wind up the season with éclat, engaged Mme. GRISI for six performances. Mme. Grisi had not been heard in Paris since 1848, when her first part was Semiramide (Alboni making her début on the Parisian stage as Arsace). The opera on Monday week was again Semiramide, with Mme. Borghi-Mamo as Arsace, and Signor Everardi as Assur. Mme. Grisi carried away all the enthusiasm, and was recalled several times in the course of the evening. It was as Semiramide that, twenty-three years ago, she made her début before a Parisian audience, and as Semiramide that, nine years ago, she appeared on the opening night of the unfortunate Royal Italian Opera—April 6, 1847. It is not surprising, therefore, that she should regard it with something approaching to superstition as a lucky part. She has since appeared twice in Norma.

London.

The destruction of the Covent Garden Theatre has made the chances of Italian Opera this season somewhat doubtful. Mr. Gye had engaged all his singers, but there are difficulties in the way of his going either to Her Majesty's Theatre, or to Drury Lane; besides, the latter is too small for such expensive opera as the London fashionables have been used to have. There may be a chance for Lumley. Gye, having made all his engagements, must "play or pay," or both. All he wants is a house. There may now be a chance to see how far Opera is a genuine passion with the English; let it now show its recuperative vitality, if it be more than fashion....JENNY and OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT are to perform both in the Old and the New Philharmonic concerts. ERNST is to accompany them on a provincial tour of some six weeks....Mr. G. A. MACFARREN has composed a new concert overture, entitled Hamlet....Mr. ELIA is delivering lectures on Melody, Harmony and Counterpoint to crowded audiences at the London Institution....Sig. PICCO, the famous player on the "Tibia Pastorale," or common whistle, has created a furore at the Hanover Square rooms. He played Costa Diva, the "Carnival of Venice," the Andante by Ernst, with variations of his own, &c. He was accompanied in his pieces by the band of the Orchestral Union....Of Mr. OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT's new Psalm, performed at the late "Nightingale Fund Concert," the Musical World says:

It not only shows the knowledge but the feeling of a musician. It consists of an introduction for the orchestra; a soprano air of plaintive character—"From the deep I cry;" a chorus upon Luther's corale, "Aus tiefer Noth;" an instrumental interlude; a chorus (female voices)—"See all the lilies," which is charmingly melodious; a very effective duet for soprano and tenor—"From thee are grace and mercy sought;" a chorus (male voices)—"Then let thy soul await;" a graceful arioso for soprano—"Though all the night;" and a grand chorus, well developed—"Then in the Lord hope." The instrumentation is good throughout. We cannot, however, judge of such a work (and it is a work of pretension) at a single hearing, and we are much mistaken if Herr Goldschmidt's Psalm does not merit another. It was generally well executed, under the composer's own direction, by the band and chorus. The soprano part was perfection; no wonder, it was Mme. Goldschmidt who sang it; and Mr. Swift took great pains in his duet with the accomplished Swede. The end was followed by great applause.

The election of a Cambridge Professor of Music in the place of the late Dr. T. A. WALMISLEY, took place on the 4th ult. in the School of Arts. WILLIAM STERNDALÉ BENNETT was the successful candidate, having received 173 votes. Dr. Elvey had 24, Mr. C. G. Horsley 21, and the others were scattered among nearly forty candidates. This professorship, to which no salary is attached, was founded in 1684. The late Professor Walmisley was elected in 1836....The University and town of Oxford were greatly excited by the public performance of an exercise for the doctor's degree in music, composed by Mr. E. G. MONK, precentor and musical professor of St. Peter's College, Radley. There were nearly 4,000 persons present. The work consists of Gray's poem of "The Bard," which forms the subject of an Ode for solo, chorus and orchestra, of about an hour in length.

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, MARCH 16.—DEAR DWIGHT:—It is from no want of will, and just as little from any lack of material, that week after week has gone by, and now Spring has come, and yet you have had no musical reports from Berlin. Other causes have operated to break off so entirely my former frequent correspondence; and whether I shall now make out a few notes upon a fortnight spent in Dresden and Leipzig last month—we will see to-morrow. I like to go to Dresden and Leipzig—at the one place I find good pictures, pleasant walks and occasionally a good opera, and at the latter more or less good fellows digging into the mysteries of harmony and composition, who give me as much pianoforte music as I can well carry off, and take me to the Abend Unterhaltungen of the Conservatorium, or introduce me to the professors.

I like to go to Dresden dearly, and deposite my travelling bag in chamber No. 3, of Das Kleine Rauchhaus, a nice comfortable little German inn, where the guest-chamber, the dining-room, the sitting-room and parlor of the family are all one and the same apartment. Everything is neat as wax and white-wash can make it. The great broad passage-way, which leads from the street to the little court in the centre of the house, is as nicely kept as the front entry of an American dwelling, though it is paved with stone, and carriages and carts pass in and out. I should really like to know how many centuries that two-story building, with its high peaked roof pierced with rows of little windows like port-holes, has stood there, looking over across to its more pre-tending but less respectable neighbor. No shingle palace that!

I have been several times to Dresden, and after the train reaches the Elbe and is running along the low plain between the vine-covered hills and the river, I begin to think of my inn. I imagine the madame and the master of the house welcoming me and making me at home, and wonder whether I shall get No. 3, with its two casement windows sunk in the thick wall—and have other wonderings and vain imaginations. The train stops, I take my bag and jump into the first droschky, and away we go through the gate, by the Japanese palace with its library and casts of antiques, through the narrow street which leads to the guard house and bridge; over the long stone bridge from which I get such exquisite views up and down the river and of the city beyond; across the square, with the theatre, picture gallery and Catholic Church on the right, the Brühlische Terrace on the left; through the arched way under the palace,—up the street along the market place to Scheffel Gasse, down which the driver turns and soon the kellner, or head waiter and book-keeper of Das Kleine Rauchhaus, is running out to open the droschky door and welcome me.

I follow him into the dining-room, and Madame, though her name be Sauermann (Sour-man) welcomes me most sweetly. "How have I been? Has it gone well with me since I was there last? Shall I honor them with a good long stay this time?" and so on. And Herr Sauermann, a tall, thin, dark looking man, smiles sweetly and kindly and shakes hands heartily—and the dark-eyed daughter of sixteen, or thereabouts, smiles a welcome, and the son looks up from his mathematical book that he is studying in the corner, and greets me—and I go marching up stairs to my room half believing that they are glad to see me and not the guest. Now all these things make one feel good—and give him more contentment in the little Rauch (Smoke) haus than he would get in the Astor or Tremont. When dinner is all away and the room cleared up, the mistress of the cooking department, whom I take to be a sister of madame, comes in with her knitting, and spying me on the sofa, also bids me welcome. And so would the pretty chambermaid have done, but alas! she is away and an ugly middle-aged woman is in her place, which is not satisfactory.

This last stay at "the Little Smokinghouse" was just three days, as we reckon time at American hotels, and my bill, including servant's fees, fire, lights and everything, was four thalers, 16½ new groschen—less than $3.50. Satisfactory!

One of these three days was Sunday, and Dresden has two churches which a musically disposed American must visit—the old one, near the new picture gallery, where SCHNEIDER plays the organ and where Mr. Mason (see his musical letters) heard such magnificent congregational singing, and the Catholic Church—the church of the court. Owing to some mistake in the hour, I lost the long extemporaneous voluntary with which Schneider is said to open the service at the former church, and which I have heard described as something most wonderful. You know SCHNEIDER of Dresden, and HAUPT of Berlin, are now the two great organists. The first time I was in Dresden, April 1851, I went up to the upper gallery of this old church and heard a choral come swelling up from I suppose a thousand voices below. It was one with which the people were familiar, and the effect was such upon me as Mr. Mason describes it to have been upon him in the same place some months later. But this morning (Feb. 17) was cold, windy and raw, and the people were shivery—the choral was one which seemed not generally known, and the organ went on ahead dragging everybody along by a chain of half a dozen measures of notes after it. Such a distressing confusion, such utter absence of anything like musical feeling, expression or effect I have seldom heard; such intolerable nasal, snuffling, wheezy, impure, cracked, brassy, tinny, wooden voices I hardly ever heard. It was unbearable, and after the third stanza I left the church to its fate. I for one do not possess enough of religious principle to ever make me willing to take up such a cross Sabbath after Sabbath.

John Murray's red-covered hand-book, speaking of the Catholic Church, says "the music in this church is celebrated all over Germany. It is under the superintendence of the director of the opera, who merely transfers his band from the orchestra to the organ loft, * * * no stranger should miss hearing it." So everybody who has Murray goes to hear the mass, and comes away saying "splendid! magnificent!" if he is an American, and "very nice! very clever!" if he is from John Bull's island. Now I have been there repeatedly, and the impressions of 1851 have been but confirmed by subsequent hearings. The music I understand to be directed by REISSIGER, and I am told that the operatic orchestra supplies the instruments, the operatic chorus the basses and tenors, but the sopranos and altos are boys. Now unless the music sung be properly adapted to boys' voices, and the want of power in their young organs be supplied by numbers, and if they are obliged to exert themselves to be heard above an orchestra, the result is universally that the soprano sounds impure, screechy and boyish. This has always impressed me as being the case here in Dresden. The Domchor at Berlin always sing alla capella (without accompaniment.) The small Domchor in Breslau, of which I wrote last year, sing to a gentle organ accompaniment or alla capella. Here at Dresden the attempt is made to use boys' voices like those of women, in fully accompanied compositions; and this seems to me out of place, at all events the effect of the voices is to me not very good.

But, suppose in all this I am mistaken, in another point upon which the music must depend almost entirely for its effect, I mean the musical composition as such, I am not mistaken, and that is that the church is built so in utter defiance of all the laws of acoustics, that there is hardly a point to be found in the building where a man can pick out even with painful attention the thread of a composer's idea. Suppose the choir is to reply to the priest at the altar in the Gloria in Excelsis. You hear a confused blast from trumpets, and the roll of drums, and the 'gl' of the word gloria—followed by roaring of tones echoed from all quarters, made up of inarticulate 'orias'—and then by an explosion of the sibilants in the word excelsis. You sit for a minute or two, in uproar and confusion worse confounded, and then the sound dies away in faint echoes, and the gloria is ended. It is utterly abominable. And it is the fashion to praise up the Dresden court music, and so every traveller, who does not know one tune from another, tells you: "Ah, if you wish to hear church music, go to Dresden!" I appeal to all the young musicians in Boston who have been to Dresden, if this statement is exaggerated. If they say it is, I can only reply that tastes vary.

I am afraid you will think that I was in Dresden this time in quite the disposition of Smellungus, immortalized by Sterne. By no means. On the other hand, I was in an excellent mood, and yet I was sadly disappointed in the NET, and in TICHATSCHKE, at the opera. During my stay there was one performance, and the piece was MEYERBEER'S "North Star." The whole thing was beautifully put upon the stage, the orchestra, chorus and ballet fine, and MITTERWURZER, the first bass, with TICHATSCHKE, first tenor, I thought, on the whole, better than the corresponding singers at Berlin. The bass is fine, but as I said, the tenor, celebrated as he is, rather disappointed me. So did Frau BUERDE-NET.—Though rather too fleshy, she looks very well, and her fine expressive face is very pleasing. I like her all the better for not being very tall—it is in pleasing contrast to our WAGNER and KOESTER. The voice is a delicious, pure, full soprano, but now getting a little worn. I noticed here and there false notes, though a blemish of this sort occasionally, in a long opera, is of little importance. The tenor struck me on this once hearing as being of the pure PERELLI sort, but stronger than that voice, which I remember with such delight in Stabat Mater!

Have you had the story of the "North Star" in the Journal? I suppose so, but do not remember. The first act is in Wiborg in Finland, and in this, Peter of Russia, under the guise of a carpenter, becomes acquainted with a confectioner, Danilowitz, and a girl named Catharine.

Peter and the girl fall in love, and she urges him to high ambition, not knowing who he is, as I understood it. A fine scene in this act is one in which she practices upon the superstition of a horde of Tartars, and delivers the village from plunder. The second act is in the Russian camp, on the boundary of Finland. Catharine appears here as a soldier, and happens to be placed as sentinel by a tent into which Peter and Danilowitz enter, have a drunken bout, and make love to a couple of girls. Catharine, for a time, has no idea that her Peter is there, but the voice strikes her, and peeping into the tent, she is shocked and amazed at what she beholds. The conduct of Peter is too much for her, she neglects her sentinel's duty, and is found by the corporal listening to what is going on. Of course the corporal cannot allow that, and finally gets a box on the ear, for which she incurs the penalties of disobedience and insulting behavior to her superior.

Peter is roused from his drunkenness and made sober by news of insurrection among his own soldiers, and of the approach of enemies. He rushes out among his troops, and promises to deliver Peter into their hands if they will only follow him and fight for the defence of Russia. He reasons with them, but they utter nothing but threats and the determination to spill Peter's blood. At last they inquire who this man is.

"Who am I? The Czar!—strike!" of course—for this is always a matter of course in these European operas—the divinity that "doth hedge a king," dazzles all, and down they go, kneel to him, and now will give their lives for him. (It is a curious thing to trace how the jure divino and the fine porcelain manufacture of kings and the nobility is taught here on the stage.)

The third act is in Peter's palace, and Catharine is here crazy. Her restoration to reason is brought about, as in Weigl's "Swiss Family," by surrounding her with recollections of former days; for which end a great picture of Wiborg is hung up, behind which a multitude of the people of that village, brought hither for the purpose, sing the chorus in the first act, and Peter plays a flute solo that he used to play to her. So all ends happily. Peter gets Catharine in a much more romantic manner than history says he did, and the confectioner becomes the ancestor of the present Menchikoffs, just as history says he did.

It is a military subject, and much of the music is military and capital good.

I liked the opera much. There is a good deal of the comic in it, and some quite touching points. The music is exceedingly well adapted to the subject, and some of the best of the peculiar effects of Meyerbeer's skill in the vocal and instrumental combinations are to be heard in it.

I enjoyed it much. I wish that it might even be given in our country, with such an orchestra and chorus, and such attention to scenic effects. If all I read and hear about the new Boston Theatre is true, I may yet have that pleasure. What is to hinder the translation of this work (by some one capable of it) and its production, with all its pleasant spoken dialogue, upon our stage? The spoken parts are as pleasant to me, in such an opera, as are the prose scenes which break the stately march of SHAKESPEARE'S noble verse.

A. W. T.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 12, 1856.

Superlatives.

To judge from the newspaper musical notices from all parts of the land, which fall under the eye of one in our position, there is no country on the globe which at the present moment possesses so many transcendent and inimitable artists as our own. Whoever is not great in one city has only to announce himself in another to become greatest of the great. Thus OLE BULL is now in the South-west; a Memphis paper tells its readers that:

"Like a standard book which has passed the ordeal of criticism, and takes its place among the sources of thought and culture, this great, and, at the present day, unrivalled artist has elevated himself above the reach of analogy or comparison, and consequently sets the critics at bay."

Such extravagance of eulogy is the common staple of musical criticism in the amiable and independent press of these United States; nor is it limited to parts remote from the more musical centres. The other day we cited a specimen of New York ravings about GOTTSCHALK. If a man have real titles to distinction, as he has, they are sadly compromised by such superlatives. So too, not long since, appeared in the New York Express, a parallel of two superlatives, GOTTSCHALK and WILLIAM MASON, which the Musical Review copied as a rare specimen of sound, discriminating criticism, "far removed from ordinary puffs," and which ended with declaring: "Gottschalk is the jeweller, Mason the Gothic architect. It is a comparison of the art of Cellini to that of Angelo." Rather a tall comparison that!—to say nothing of the originality of the connection indicated between Michael Angelo and Gothic architecture! The New York Musical World offsets this with a biography of GUSTAV SATTER, the certainly very highly accomplished pianist now residing here in Boston, but of whom it is either too early or too late to say: "He is the very model of an artist,—ever inspired, whilst performing; a true friend of all that is beautiful and good, and an unrelenting foe to all humbug;"—that he "plays everything, from Bach down to Liszt and himself, with the same perfection, never abandoning the charm of nature for the clownish tricks of modern virtuosos," &c. &c. Now we are sorry to say that it has been just the yielding to these same virtuosos tricks, which has disappointed those who at first found so much to admire in this young artist's talent. What becomes of "the honor" of those "wreaths and flowers" at the Musical Convention Concerts, when it is known that it was by variations upon "Yankee Doodle," "Hail Columbia," &c., that they were won! What shall we say to that "Anvil Chorus" fantasia which we heard him play the other night? and how does the "unrelenting hostility to humbug" comport with the announcement to play at a lottery "Gift Concert" in New Hampshire! We may pardon these mistakes to early youth, amid the bewildering influences of such a world of trade and humbug; but until they are repented of and put away, let us not talk about the "very model of an artist," and a "true priest of Art." The tone of the whole article indeed would seem to convey the impression that here has another young Mozart been born in Germany, to be neglected there, and first appreciated here. Mr. Satter may well pray to be delivered from his friends who write him up in that style!

We have purposely selected our examples from the wholesale eulogies of men who are in some sense superior artists. Give each his due. But this ready way of placing each upon the pinnacle of his profession, in order to say a kind thing, is demoralizing and destructive to all true criticism, as it is insulting to the taste and sober judgment of the musical world proper. Such things belong to the mere flaming show-bill order of literature; and as in the modern style of announcing new books, especially novels, the advertisement is more ingenious and startling, if it be not even longer than the book itself. If every singer, violinist or pianist, who is in any way remarkable, cannot be pronounced so without at the same time intimating that he beats all the world; if this is done too even in journals which are musical authorities, who can wonder that all classes of pretenders, down to musicians of no science and no gift at all, should come in for their share of such cheap spoils, and keep the newspapers all ringing with their praises, as the prime secret of success!

CONCERTS.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—"Moses in Egypt" does not draw the overflowing audiences it has done in past years, yet it was a large company who listened in the Music Hall last Sunday evening. And they had abundant reason to be pleased with the performance. The solo singers all did their best and the whole thing went off with spirit. The impression of Mrs. HARWOOD'S fine, clear, equal, noble voice grew upon us. It was refreshing from the first, and in the latter more pathetic portions of her rôle (that of the Queen), she sang with such expression and sustained power as gave great present pleasure and inspired rare hopes.—The piece was repeated, to a smaller audience we understand, on Thursday (Fast) evening.

AFTERNOON CONCERTS. On Wednesday the Music Hall was crowded, and MENDELSSOHN'S "Scotch" Symphony, as it is called, the one in A minor and the best, was played remarkably well. The "Invitation to the Dance" too, by WEBER, for so difficult a piece of instrumentation, and so rapid a movement, scarcely admitting of perfect unity and cleanness in any but the original form for the piano, was made quite effective and seemed very generally relished. With our orchestra the overture to Freyschütz never fails. The lighter pieces were as good as usual. The Afternoon Concerts seem now in the full tide of success.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO LITERATURE; Descriptive, Critical, Humorous, Biographical Philosophical, and Poetical. By SAMUEL GILMAN, D. D.

Such is the title of an elegantly printed volume of between five and six hundred pages, just published by Messrs. Crosby, Nichols & Co. It contains some of the best fruits of the literary leisure of a highly cultivated, genial, Unitarian clergyman, who, educated in and loving New England, has for many years been settled in Charleston, South Carolina. It is enough here to say that Dr. Gilman is the author of the "Memoir of a New England Village Choir," a charming little book, for some time out of print, which those who have read in any of the three editions through which it has passed, (it was composed in 1828,) will rejoice to meet again in a collection of other good things from the same source. Those who never read it, have yet to know one of the most true and charming sketches of New England village life at the beginning of this century, that have been produced. So far as it is the history merely of the troubles and dissensions of a choir, the picture is almost as true of this day as of that. Indeed, these little worlds of rustic, unskilled singers of mere psalmody reflect in little nearly all the strifes and jealousies and changing fortunes of great operatic troupes. The book is worth possessing, if for this alone. But besides this it is full of various interest. The graver papers, such as those on Brown's metaphysical writings, the reciprocal influence of national literatures, &c., will command the attention of thinkers. The literary criticisms are of value. The humorous sketches are exquisite. A genial, humane, Christian spirit, a tone of true, refined culture, quick perceptions and sympathies, a rare grace and sincerity of style and easy, masterly command of language, are perceived throughout. A few graceful poems, mostly occasional, complete the volume, among which it is pleasant to recognise "Fair Harvard!" the verses sung at the centennial celebration at Cambridge in 1836. But it is in the sketches of New England life that we find the most peculiar charm. These must live among the most genuine and national products of our literature. Better even than the "Village Choir" is the "Rev. Stephen Peabody and Lady," a sketch of a New Hampshire pastor living at the close of the last century. Take as a specimen this about "Sir Peabody's" musical endowments:

His musical powers and habits were extraordinary, and he almost revelled through life in an atmosphere of sweet sounds of his own creating. On rainy days, when unlikely to be disturbed by capacious or narrow-minded visitors, he would take out his golden-toned violin from a little closet, and draw from its strings the richest and most bewitching notes, a sweet and serene half-smile all the time playing over his lip and cheek and eye. His voice was of vast compass, and exquisitely flexible. He was at home in every part in music. When there was no choir in the meeting-house, he led the singing himself; and when there was one, he supplied the deficient parts, rolling out a mellow and deep-toned bass, or warbling with his treble or counter over the whole concert, like an animated mocking-bird. He sang on week-days at his work, and sometimes talked aloud to himself most agreeably. He would sing on his rides about the town, or when travelling in his chaise, alone or accompanied, by night or by day; and all the solitudes and echoes of that region have many a time rung with his loud and melodious voice. He was most fond of sacred music, but did not disdain a scrap now and then of secular. He would sing you, in perfect taste, with graceful gesture and a happy look, either sitting or standing, various extracts from the delightful old anthems of Arne or Purcell, or from the oratorios of Handel. Coming home from public worship, if a favorite tune had just been sung there, he would repeat it over and over as he entered the house, stopping you in a companionable way, looking you smilingly in the face, and asking if it was not beautiful. He would, except on Sunday mornings, awaken the whole household of sleepers at sunrise, or as soon as he had made the fires, by singing up and down stairs, "The bright, rosy morning peeps over the hills," "The hounds are all out," or some other hunting-song equally stirring. He would take into his lap a little round, favorite dog, and, commanding it to sing with him, he would begin by roaring some tune aloud, the dog immediately joining in with a louder and responsive roar. The only inconvenience from this practice was that the dog one Sabbath followed his master unperceived to the meeting-house, and up to the platform of the pulpit-stairs, and too zealously practised there the musical lessons which he had been taught at home. On some warm summer afternoon, when all the windows of the house were open, and one of his young boarders, far up in the garret at his studies, might happen, for variety's sake, to burst out in some cherished tune or strain, such, for instance, as old St. Anne's, his venerable friend, in the lower story, awaking from his transitory nap, would fall in with his mellifluous bass, and so would they sing for a long time together, until, looking out of their respective windows, they would smile upon each other, as who should say, "Were there ever two better friends than we?"

Musical Chat-Chat.

There has been a very large sale of tickets to the Orchestral Concert in aid of the German Benevolent Society, to be given at the Music Hall this evening, and the programme (see last page) is really a rich one.... The MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY concluded their season on Friday evening of last week, by a musical entertainment before an invited audience in Mercantile Hall. Selections from "St. Paul," and other good things were sung. (What a pity that this Society has not found an opportunity to let the public hear "St. Paul" entire this season!) The first part closed with the presentation on the part of the members of a silver pitcher and salver to their retiring president, Gen. B. F. EDMANDS.... At the Boston Theatre Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" is shortly to be produced, with splendid scenery, &c., and with MENDELSSOHN's overture and intermezzi; but the vocal music, it is said, will be by Purcell, Arne, Bishop, Mr. Comer, the conductor of the orchestra, &c. Why mix these up with Mendelssohn? Why not his music throughout, so as to make one artistic whole of it?

Our excellent friend the "Diarist," in other words our Berlin correspondent, "A. W. T." is probably by this time on his way home from Germany, and we shall soon have leaves "From my Diary" at home. His visit will be brief, however; its chief object being the benefit of a sea-voyage to a brain long over-taxed and health run down. Before the summer is spent he will return again, true to his long and faithfully pursued purpose of mastering all the materials in Germany for that "Life of Beethoven" which has occupied so many of the best years of his life, and which we are happy to hear is fast approaching its completion. It will no doubt be a work of which we may be proud, as of that other American monument to the great master, the statue in our Boston Music Hall. By the way, our friend brings with him some hundred or two complete sets of the Piano Sonatas of Beethoven, (thirty-two Sonatas in all,) which he can furnish to subscribers here at about half the price of the cheapest editions we have hitherto known. It is said to be a neat and correct edition. We shall be happy to receive the names of any who may desire to possess a set, at the very low price of six dollars. In more ways than one is our friend destined to be a promulgator of Beethoven upon this side of the ocean.

The Musical Review takes quite good-naturedly our remarks about its "Prize Songs." It admits that there may be some truth in our suspicion that that the best song will not win the prize, and even adds: "It is a fact that decidedly the most meritorious song of the eight has thus far the least votes of all!" but intends, after the prizes are awarded, to dispute our proposition that Art is not benefited by the enterprise. Well, let us have all that can be said for it—and for the eight songs also.

Mr. HENRY AHNER, with an orchestra which he has organized into a permanent society, is giving concerts every Saturday afternoon in Providence, R. I.... At the last concert of the Philadelphia Philharmonic Society, on the 1st inst., the main attraction was the appearance of the new American Opera Troupe, in which Miss HENRIETTE BEHREND is the prima donna; Mr. HARRISON MILLARD, the tenor; and Mr. BORRANI, (late of the PYNE troupe,) the baritone. They met with much favor.

The Italian Opera at New York closed on Monday evening with an extra performance of Don Giovanni; Mme. LAGRANGE was Donna Anna, Miss HENSLEE, Elvira, and Mme. BERTUCCA-MARETZKE, Zerlina. It does not appear what is to be done with the Academy of Music, whether the singers are to scatter or re-organize. There is some talk of Mme. Lagrange turning impresario; also of her going back to Europe; also of a tour to be made by the troupe to the Lake cities. It is only certain that, as hitherto managed, opera at the Academy is a losing business. In their short flight to Philadelphia and Boston alone money was made. Why should not the whole troupe come here and give us our usual Spring season? But if they do, why can they not give us something new? Say the Nozze di Figaro, or at least "William Tell," of which the novelty has not yet been worn off for us?

The Lyons papers tell a very good story. The bedchambers of two wealthy gentlemen, who belong to different social circles, are adjacent, and, as is usual nowadays, thin partitions divided them. One spends all his nights at his club-house never returning home before half-past 5 o'clock in the morning. His neighbor rises at 6 and sits down at once to his piano, which he does not quit until dinner. The former complained to the commissary of police, who laughed in his face, and told him to keep better hours. As he had a lease for six years he could not change his apartment. He thought of sending a challenge to his neighbor; his neighbor was paralyzed in the lower limbs. He had his walls lined with thick hair-matresses, still the "sharps" penetrated into his room. He made his servant play the French horn—his neighbor had him fined by the police: the French horn cannot be played except during the jours gras. He made his servant take a hammer and rap against the wall—his neighbor waited until he was tired, and then began to play. He then bought a large hand organ which was sadly out of tune, and ordered a turn-spit which would turn eight days without being wound up, and which he had fitted to the organ. The turn-spit was put in motion, after it and the organ had been placed next the chamber wall. The piano-player bore the organ for nineteen hours; at the end of the time he sent a letter of truce; he was told the club-haunter had gone out of town and wouldn't be back for a week. The pianist sold his lease.... the organ is still going!

Advertisements.

PROGRAMME OF THE FOURTH AFTERNOON CONCERT, AT THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL, Wednesday, April 16th, 1856.

Symphony No. 6..... Haydn.
Overture: 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' Mendelssohn.
Waltz: 'Magic Sounds,'..... Wittman.
Aria from 'Ernani,'..... Verdi.
Horn obligato by M. TROISI.
Allegretto from Eighth Symphony,..... Beethoven.
Overture: 'Semiramide,'..... Rossini.

Concert to commence at 3½ o'clock.—Package of six tickets, to be used at pleasure, $1. Single tickets 25 cents.
The Fifth Concert will be given Wednesday, April 23d.

Advertisements.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERT,
IN AID OF THE GERMAN BENEVOLENT SOCIETY, TAKES PLACE AT THE
BOSTON MUSIC HALL,
This (Saturday) Evening, April 12.

A Full Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. ZERRAHN, — the German Singing Club, "ORPHEUS," led by Mr. KREISSMANN, — Mr. SATTER, Pianist, and Mr. Wm. SCHULTZ, Violinist, have kindly volunteered their services.

PROGRAMME.PART I.

- 1—Overture to the "Freischütz,".....C. M. von Weber.
- 2—Chorus: "The Young Musicians,".....Kücken.
By the German Singing Club.
- 3—Fantasia on themes from "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser"
Mr. Gustav Satter.
- 4—Chorus: "The Bard,".....Silcher.
German Singing Club.
- 5—Andante of the Fifth Symphony,.....Beethoven.

PART II.

- 1—Overture to the "Magic Flute,".....Mozart.
- 2—Chorus: "Mine,".....Härtel.
German Singing Club.
- 3—Solo for Violin: "Sounds from Home,".....Styrian Air.
Mr. Wm. Schultz.
- 4—"Chorus of Scotch Bards,".....Reiter.
German Singing Club.
- 5—Overture to "Tannhäuser,".....R. Wagner.

Tickets 50 cents each, to be had at the Music Stores, and of the Committee:—O. H. F. Möring, 89 Commercial Wharf; B. Roelker, 89 Court Street; F. A. Hirsch, 13 Doane Street.
Doors open at 6½; to commence at 7½ o'clock.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S

Depot of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

AFTERNOON CONCERTS
AT THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

A Series of SIX WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS will be given at the Boston Music Hall, commencing March 26th, under the direction of CARL ZERRAHN. The Orchestra will be the same which has given so much satisfaction at the series of Orchestral Concerts just terminated. The selections will be of a character suited to all the various tastes of the community, consisting of Symphonies, Overtures, Arrangements from popular Operas, Waltzes, &c. The managers pledge themselves to make these Concerts worthy of the liberal support of the community.

Packages of six tickets, to be used at pleasure, $1. Single tickets 25 cts. For sale at the Music Stores and at the door. The Concerts will commence at 3½ o'clock.

CHOICE MUSICAL WORKS.

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS, complete in two large quarto volumes, printed from engraved plates, and pronounced the most elegant specimen of music typography ever executed. Bound in cloth, embossed and lettered. Price of a single vol. $7.50; of both volumes, $12.

MENDELSSOHN'S SONGS WITHOUT WORDS complete in one vol. quarto, bound in cloth, embossed and lettered. Price $3.

MENDELSSOHN'S FOUR-PART SONGS. Text in German and English. The latter by J. C. D. PARKER. In cloth, $1.50; boards $1.25.

DITSON'S STANDARD OPERAS, 6 vols. Norma, Lucia, Sonnambula, Lucrezia, Ernani, English and Italian text, each, $2. Don Giovanni, Piano Solo, $1.50.

ORATORIOS. Creation, $1.25. Messiah, $1.25. Moses in Egypt, $1.50.

MASSSES. Mozart's Requiem, $1; Mozart's 12th Mass, $1; Beethoven's Mass in C, 75 cents; Haydn's 8d Mass, 75 cts.; Rossini's Stabat Mater, Latin and English words, $1.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,
(Imported from England)
389, Broadway, N.Y.

The Latest Publications of
J. A. NOVELLO.

ORIGINAL LONDON EDITIONS.

Novello's Complete Folio Edition.

RINK'S PRACTICAL ORGAN SCHOOL,
Op. 55. Carefully revised and corrected; with the German directions and terms translated into English. Price $3.75; or in Six Parts, 75 cents each.

PART I, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 1 to 12. Short and easy pieces in two parts.
" 13 to 24. " " three parts.
" 25 to 36. " " four parts.
" 37 to 68. Preludiums, in various keys, for soft or loud stops.

PART II, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 67 to 132. Exercises for the pedals.
" 133 to 144. Twelve Chorales, or well-known German Psalm Tunes, with variations.

PART III, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 145 to 159. Fifteen easy Postludes, or Concluding Voluntaries, in the Fugue style.

PART IV, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 160 to 174. Fifteen Postludes, or Concluding Voluntaries for alternate manuals, in the Fugue style.

PART V, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 175 to 181. Seven Preludes and Fugues.
No. 182. The Flute Concerto.
" 183. Variations on "Hail dir Steges Kranz," or, "God save the Queen."

PART VI, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 184 to 192. Nine Preludes and Fugues.
" 193 to 194. Fantastic and Fugue.

Please to order Novello's Edition, and quote the prices.

MENDELSSOHN'SSIX GRAND SONATAS FOR THE ORGAN.

New Edition, complete in one Book, $1.75, or singly, as follows:

No. 1. Price 44c.	No. 4. Price 85c.
2. " 25c.	5. " 25c.
3. " 25c.	6. " 31c.

Composed and dedicated to Dr. F. SCHLENNER, by FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY. Op. 66.
J. Alfred Novello, London and New York.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY

FOR THE DIFFUSION OF

MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

Vol. 8. Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition with the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering. (Former price $5.25c.) In paper wrappers, $1.18c. By mail—$1.20c.

Volumes of this series already issued.

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue, $1.68c.
- " 2. Dr. Marx' General Musical Instruction, 1 68c.
- " 3. Fétis on Choir and Chorus Singing, 39c.
- " 4. Mozart's succinct Thoro' Bass School, 21c.
- " 5. Cate's Treatise on Harmony 68c.
- " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected writings on Thoro' Bass, Harmony and Composition for self-instruction. Vol. 1. Harmony and Thoro' Bass, price 88c. Vols. 2 and 3. Guide to Composition, 88c., each. Three vols. bound in one complete, Cloth Boards—$2 68c.

J. A. NOVELLO,

Sacred Music Store, 389 Broadway, New York.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 18 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

ED. B. ROBINSON,
PIANO-FORTE TUNER.
Orders received at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington Street.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER,
Will be happy to give instruction in Piano-forte and Organ playing, and the Theory of Music. Address:—
No. 8 Hayward Place. May 26. tf

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ma.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

Mlle GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE
—Gives—
INSTRUCTION on the PIANO-FORTE,
And may be addressed at her residence, 55 Hancock St.

CARL HAUSE
OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
215 Washington Street, Boston.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,
Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
U. S. HOTEL.
Communications can be left at Mr. Ditson's music store.

C. H. CLARKE,
TEACHER OF MUSIC, 285 Washington St.
RESIDENCE...18 SHAWMUT STREET, BOSTON.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. [Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
do each subsequent.....$6 00
Special notices (loaded), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 211.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 3.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
"GEORGE P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row, "
"A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I. "
"C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
"SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
"GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
"G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
"JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
"MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
"W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
"W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
"HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O. "

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by
JOHN S. DWIGHT, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court
of the District of Massachusetts.]

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Translated from the French of Madame Dubrion, for the Journal of Music.

CHAPTER IV.

A STROLL.

She had risen to go, and drew her large shawl over her shoulders. She was badly dressed, shockingly dressed, like a poor tired-out actress, who hurries to throw off her stage costume, and joyfully envelopes herself in a large and warm dressing gown to go home on foot. She had a rusty black veil on her head, large shoes on her feet, for the weather was rainy. She hid her pretty hands (how minutely I recall that detail!) in coarse and ugly knit gloves. She was very pale, perhaps a little sallow, as I had observed she became when she removed the ashes which covered the glow of her soul. Probably she would have seemed homely rather than beautiful at that moment to any other person.

Well, I found her, for the first time in my life, the most beautiful woman I had ever looked upon, and I am sure that she really was so. That mixture of despair and firmness, of disgust and courage, that utter sacrifice in so energetic a nature, and consequently so capable of tasting life with fulness, that deep flame, that saddened memory, veiled by a smile of naïve sweetness, made her shine in my eyes with strange radiance. She stood before me like the soft light of a little lamp just lit in a vast church. First it is only a spark in the darkness, and then, as the flame grows, it becomes clearer and the eye grows accustomed to it, and the objects about it are gradually illumined. Every detail is distinct, while the general effect loses none of its clearness, none of its sad severity. At first one cannot walk in the twilight without stumbling, but afterwards one may read by the cathedral lamp, and the images in the church become slightly colored and wave before you like living beings. The picture grows upon you every second, like a strange sense, perfected, satisfied and idealized by the gentle influence of a light which is pure, steadfast and serene.

This metaphor, so long to relate, flashed through my thoughts in an instant. Painter as I am, I saw the symbol with my imagination, as I beheld the woman with the eyes of sense. I rushed towards her, threw my arms about her neck, and cried out like a madman:

"Fiat lux! let us love each other, and there will be light!"

But either she understood me not or did not hear my vain words, for she was listening to the sound of voices in the next box.

"Ah, mon Dieu!" said she, "my father is quarreling with Celio. Let us go and interrupt them. My father has just left the café, and is very much excited, and Celio is ill-disposed to listen to a discourse upon the emptiness of glory. Come, my friend."

She seized me by the arm and ran to Celio's box. A long time passed before I had another chance to confess my love to her.

The old Boccaferri was half undressed and half drunk, as he always was when he was not entirely so. Celio, washing his face with pâte de concombre, was stamping furiously.

"Yes," said Boccaferri, "I will repeat it, even if you strangle me. It is your own fault; you were bad, shockingly bad. I knew you were bad enough, but I really did not think you could be quite as bad as you were to-night."

"Don't I know that I was bad, bad drunkard that you are?" cried Celio, rolling up his napkin to throw at the old man; but seeing Cecilia, he stopped this dramatic gesture, and the napkin fell at our feet. "Cecilia," began he, "deliver me from your plague of a father. The old fool is giving me a last kick, and if he does not stop, I shall throw him out of the window."

Celio's violence partook so strongly of the low actor that I was shocked; but the peaceable Cecilia seemed neither surprised nor astonished. Like a salamander, accustomed to walk through the flames, like a sailor familiar with tempests, she glided between the combatants, took their hands, and forced them to join them, saying:

"And yet you love each other so much! If my father is beside himself to-night, it is grief which makes him so. If Celio is unkind, it is because he has been unfortunate, but he knows well enough that it is his own misfortune which makes a fool of his old friend."

Boccaferri threw himself upon Celio's neck, and, pressing him in his arms: "Heaven knows," cried he, "that I love you almost as much as I do my own daughter;" and he began to weep. His tears came both from his heart and from the bottle. Celio shrugged his shoulders in embracing him.

"It is only because," continued the old man, "I wanted to place you, your mother, your sisters, and your little brother, in the highest heaven, with a glory, a crown of lightning round your brows, like the old gods; and now you have made a fiasco horrible for not consulting me."

He talked nonsense for a few minutes, and then his ideas grew clearer as he spoke. He said excellent things upon the love of art, upon the personality, misunderstood, which injures that of talent. He called that the personality of the person. He expressed himself at first in rude, obscure and strange terms, but as he talked his drunkenness passed off, and he became wonderfully clear, and even found agreeable expressions which made the stubborn Celio accept his criticisms. He really said about the same things which I had said to the duchess; I mean that he conveyed the same ideas, but differently and much better expressed. I saw that he thought like me, or rather that I thought like him, and that he summed up my own thoughts before me. I had never before paid any attention to the old man's words, his negligence had so disgusted me; but I saw that night that he had intelligence, subtlety, and great knowledge of the philosophy of art, and at times he used words which a man of genius would not have disclaimed.

Celio listened sulkily, defending himself badly, and showing, with the generous naïveté so peculiar to him, that he was convinced in spite of himself.

The hour was passing away; they were putting out the lights in the passages, and were about fastening the doors of the theatre. Boccaferri was at home everywhere. With that admirable indifference which is a grâce d'état for the dissipated, he would have slept on the boards or talked until daylight without thinking of the fatigue of others any more than his own. Cecilia took his arm to lead him away, said good-night to us in the street, and I was left alone with Celio, who, too much excited to sleep, asked to walk home with me.

"When I think," exclaimed he, "that I was invited to sup at ten different houses to-night, and now none of my acquaintances seek me to console me! No one is troubled about me, no one regrets my absence, and I have not had one friend who has fairly sought me, for I was in Cecilia's box, and not finding me in my own, they did not care to inquire if I was not on the other side of the partition. Across that accursed partition I heard words which should make me reflect: 'What! already gone? he must be in despair!' 'Poor fellow! upon my word, I am going off. I will leave my card for him. I am rather glad I did not find him,' &c. So did my sweet and faithful friends talk together, and I kept quiet, delighted to hear them go away. And your duchess, who was going to send her companion for me in her carriage—I did not even have the chance to refuse her tea. You like that duchess, hey? You are wrong; she is a shameless woman. Only wait for a fiasco in your art, and you will tell another story. From the first I saw she measured every one by her standard, and that to be in her favor one must carry his certificate of great man in his hand."

"I do not know," answered I, "whether it is spite or habit which makes you cynical, Celio, but you are so, and it is a fault in you. Where is the use of such bitter language? I could not even call a woman shameless of whom I had a right to complain. Now, as I have not that right, and am not in the least in love with the duchess, I beg you to speak coldly and politely of her in my presence; you will do me a favor, and I shall think better of you."

"Listen, Salentini," answered Celio quickly; "you are prudent and you manœuvre through the world like many others. I do not think you are right; at least it is not my way. One must be frank to be strong, and I wish to be that at any price. If you are not a lover of the duchess, it is only because you do not wish it, for, for my part, I know I might have been, had I desired it. I know how she spoke of you at the first flattering word which I addressed to her, (and I assure you I only did it out of sheer curiosity, for my own amusement.) I was looking at a pretty sketch which you had made of her, and which she had hung, richly framed, in her boudoir. I thought the portrait flattered, and told her so, plainly, without her contradicting it, intimating that such a noble interpretation of her beauty could only have been rendered by love."

"Speak lower," said she, with a mysterious air. "I have a great deal of trouble in managing that man." Just then the bell rang. "Ah, good heavens!" said she, "perhaps that is he forcing my door. Let us leave this room; I do not wish to make any enemy for you at your début."

"Yes, yes," answered I, ironically, "you are so kind to me that you would make him happy to save me from his hatred."

"She thought it a declaration, and, stopping on the threshold of her boudoir, she said:

"What are you saying? If you fear nothing for yourself, I only dread the ennui he will give me. But let him come, let him be angry—here will we stay."

"Was not that charming, Monsieur Salentini? I awaited my success or my failure. If you will come with me, we will laugh at her. Come, will you?"

"No, Celio; I do not wish to persist with women; above all, coquettes do not deserve the trouble. The bitterness of spite flatters instead of mortifies them. My vengeance, if vengeance I seek, shall be henceforth the greatest indifference of mind and manner towards her."

"Well, you are better than I. To be sure, you have not been hissed to-night, which is a very hurtful thing I assure you, and jars one's nerves horribly; but you seem to bring me calm. Do not be hurt by the word; a spirit which calms is often one which rules, and perhaps calm is one of the greatest forces of nature."

"It is the producing force," said I. "Agitation is the storm which disturbs and overthrows."

"As you will," said he; "there is a time for all—everything has its uses. Perhaps the union of two such opposite natures as yours and mine may make a complete force. I wish to become your friend. I feel the need of you, for you know that I am selfish, and shall undertake nothing without asking how I shall be affected by it; but it is only in the moral and intellectual that I seek profit. In material things I am almost as careless as old Boccaferri, who would be one of the first of men if man was not the last of the races. He was right to-night, and I was wrong not to bear his insolence just now. He told the truth. I failed because I was below myself. Upon that I agreed with him; I did not do my best, and lacked inspiration, because I have gone all wrong until now. A healthy, well balanced talent can always find inspiration. Mine is unhealthy, and I must cure it. So I shall follow his advice and not listen to yours, which was prompted by politeness. I shall not make a second trial without invigorating myself. I ought to be beyond these sudden failures, and hence I must consider differently the philosophy of my art. I must return to my mother's lessons, which I have neglected to follow, but which are written in sacred characters upon my memory. To-night old Boccaferri talked like her, and the peaceable Cecilia, that cold artist, who neither praises nor blames what surrounds her, yes, my old Cecilia, slipped in, like the point d'orgue in her father's theories, two or three words which made a deep impression upon me, although I pretended not to hear."

"Why do you call her old Cecilia, my dear Celio? She is only a few years older than you and I."

"O, that is only a way I have, a habit of my childhood, a term of fondness, if you will. I call her 'mon vieux fer.' It is a nickname taken from her surname, and it does not offend her. She has always been old beyond her years, sad, thoughtful and considerate. When I was a child I used to play with her sometimes in the corridors of old palaces; she always gave up to me, which made me think her as old as my nurse, although she was then a pretty girl. We have only become intimate since my mother's death, or rather since she entered the theatre, and after I had left the nest where I was sheltered with so much love. I have learned a great deal of the world in two years. I was backward in experience, and eager to gain it; I quickly found it. The eager desire which I had of trying life alone first diverted my thoughts from my great grief; for I had a mother whose like no other man has seen. She bore me in her heart, her thought, and in her arms even, without remembering my age; neither did I remember it, I was so happy thus; but when she sought the skies, I longed to wander, to build and possess on the earth. I am already weary and my hands are empty. Now I really feel that I have no mother; now I weep and mourn for her in the loneliness of my heart, and still in this frightful solitude, heart-rending to one so used to the exclusive, passionate love of a mother, there is one who still does me good, and near whom I breathe freely—Cecilia Boccaferri. Listen, Salentini—I will tell you something which may astonish you, but weigh it well and you will comprehend it. I do not like women, nay, I detest them, and I am very ugly with them. I shall only except one, Cecilia, for she alone resembles my mother somewhat—resembles her whose perfection makes others hateful to me. Do you understand that?"

"Perfectly, Celio. Your mother lived only for you, and you became used to the society of a woman who loved you more than herself. Ah! you do not know, Celio, to whom you speak and what different tortures that name of mother awakens in my heart. The more my childhood has differed from yours, the better can I understand you, O spoiled child, insolent and handsome as good fortune! As long as your boyish inexperience lasted, you believed that woman was an ideal of devotion, and that the love of woman was man's highest good; in short, you thought that woman was made to serve us, to adore us, to protect us, and guard us from danger, evil, trouble, and even ennui, did you not?"

"Yes, yes, it was so," cried Celio, stopping and turning his eyes upward. "The love of a woman, in my idea, was the bright and trembling light of a star, which never pales nor fades. My mother loved me as a star pours out the fertilizing light. Near her, I was a living plant, a flower as pure as the dew with which she nourished me. I had not a single evil thought, not a doubt, not a desire. I did not care to live a separate life, when life might have wearied me; and yet she suffered; she died, worn out by a secret grief, and I, wretch that I was, did not perceive it. If I questioned her, she reassured me by her answers—I believed in her smiles. One morning I held her lifeless in my arms. I bore her home, thinking she had fainted. She was dead, dead! and I was clasping her corpse."

Celio sat down on the parapet of a bridge which we were just then crossing. A cry of despair and terror came from him, as if a ghost had passed before his eyes. I saw well that the poor child did not know how to bear trouble. I feared lest this awakened remembrance, embittered by his recent misfortune, might be too violent for him, and I took his arm and led him gently away.

"You can understand," said he, taking up the thread of his ideas as we walked on, "how and why I am egotistical. I cannot be otherwise; and you can see too how I became full of hatred and anger as soon as I sought love and friendship among my fellows. I was jarred and wounded by selfishness like my own. The women whom I have met (and I begin to think all are alike) only love themselves, or if they like us a little, it is for their own sake, because we satisfy their vanity or their passion. When we are of no use to them, they trample upon us and cast us aside; and do you want me to respect those ambitious, sensual creatures, who tell me that I am handsome and may have a glorious future? Oh, my mother would have loved me had I been a hunchback and an idiot; but the others! Just trust in them once, Salentini, and you will see."

"My dear Celio, you are right in general; but for the sake of possible exceptions, you should not curse all. I, who have never been indulged, never even been loved, hope still and expect always—"

"No one has ever loved you? Then you had no mother, or yours was worth no more than other women. Poor boy! Then you must have been alone with yourself, and that must be such a terrible tête-à-tête! Ah, Salentini, I wish I were loving, that I might love you. It must be such happiness to make others happy!"

"What a strange soul you are, Celio! I do not yet understand you, but I desire to know you, for it seems to me that, in spite of your contradictions and your inconsistency, in spite of your pretensions to hatred, selfishness, and harshness, there is in you something of that soul which showered its treasures upon you."

"Something of my mother? I cannot think so. She was so humble in her greatness, incomparable soul, that she always feared to destroy my personality in substituting her own. She developed the feelings I showed to her; she took me as I was, without dreaming that I could ever do wrong. Ah, that is loving, and not so do other women love us—agree with me."

"How is it that, understanding so well the greatness and beauty of devotion and love, you do not feel it living or budding in your own soul?"

"And you, Salentini," answered he, stopping me quickly, "what do you bear and cherish in your soul? Is it devotion to others? No, it is devotion to self, for you are an artist. Be sincere; I am not one of those who are satisfied with sounding words, vulgarly called the humbug of sentiment."

"You make me tremble, Celio," said I to him, "by so cold an examination; you will make me doubt myself. Leave me till to-morrow to answer you, for I am here at my door, and I fear lest you are fatigued. Where do you live, and at what time do you shake off the poppies of sleep?"

"Sleep! Another humbug!" answered he. "I am always awake. Come for me to breakfast as soon as you like. Here is my card."

He lit his cigar by mine and walked away.

[To be continued.]

(From the New York Musical Times.)

Sketch of the Conservatory of Paris.

PART II.

In the regular order of the public examination, the piano-class comes next. The boys are first tested. It is not unusual to find among these young lads some of twelve or fifteen years, who have already attained a proficiency which full-grown men might envy. After the boys come the girls, who are far from affording the audience the same degree of musical gratification, although they are, oftentimes, not wanting in talent. But you seek in vain for that fulness of sound and that boldness of touch in their playing, which is so captivating to the ear. Nevertheless from other causes, they are welcomed with more enthusiastic applause and hurrahs: in which it is easy to see that the French spectator pays his usual tribute to some fine pair of eyes or rosy cheeks; and the fair owner never fails to avail herself of whatever advantages she may possess, by which to awaken enthusiasm, and elicit the favors of applauding hands.

The composers whose works were used at examinations during my connection with the Conservatory, were Hummel and Herz: now, Thalberg's works are à la mode. Clementi, Cramer, and Dussek, who, as composers, were superior to all the fashionable piano-writers of the present day, are quite forgotten as too easy, now that both performers and hearers aim only at tours de force.

The two most distinguished professors of the piano in the Conservatoire, have been Louis

Adam—now dead, and father to the present composer, Adolph Adam—and Zimmermann, equally distinguished as contrapuntist and pianist, who died last year. Louis Adam presided over the female class, and Zimmermann the male. On the death of Adam, his professorship was solicited and obtained by Herz; he soon resigned, however, having yielded to the attraction of American and Californian dollars: similarly attracted, he would, no doubt, have re-crossed the Pacific again and visited Australia, had the Australian mines been discovered at the time of his tour.

But we now pass on to the singers, who come next in order. The vocal classes are the last examined, and are the most interesting as regards the professors who have them in charge. The public here meet with names they have often greeted upon the great stage of the capital. These names I have already mentioned on a previous page. To name them is to praise them—they are their own best commendation. The reader will easily conceive that such men impart to their pupils some of their own prestige. It would be difficult to express the degree of attention and sympathy which is given to these young singers, especially the female ones. Here the young ladies possess an unquestionable superiority over the young men. Some of them, even in the Conservatory, enjoy a considerable degree of fame, and are crowned with the first laurels of their class. Such pupils are, of course, destined for the great stage of the metropolis, the Grand Opera. On the day of their début, the house is thronged with multitudes of spectators. The examination consists in the performance of an aria, with recitatives, selected from the operas of the most celebrated masters, particularly Italian, with accompaniment of piano. The pupils of the vocal department having performed their several tasks, the general examination closes.

After the competitions in each of the classes have thus been heard, the jury, or committee, deliberate "on the spot," and then mention the names of those who have been deemed worthy of the first and second premiums. In the violin and violoncello class, the first premium is a corresponding instrument: that is, either a violin or violoncello, obtained from some of the very best makers of Paris, such as Lupot, Gaud, Thibault, and Willaume. The instrument bears upon it the name of the successful competitor, with these words: "The National Conservatory of Paris to the pupil, 18—." The only award to the second competitor is the proclamation of his name. If I remember rightly, a flute is also given to the best pupil on that instrument. To the successful piano competitor, a selection of the best piano-music is awarded. A piano-forte has been deemed too costly a premium for the Conservatory, which has otherwise such heavy expenses to sustain. To the best singer a musical score, richly bound, is presented. The second best singer has merely his name proclaimed.

I must remark, however, that these prizes mentioned, are not presented at the time when the names of the successful competitors are announced: another public and ceremonious occasion is ordered for this. Immediately after the examination, a vacation commences, which lasts till the first Monday in October. At this time a great festival is arranged by the director, and publicly announced in the Parisian journals. It takes place on the day preceding the term which commences another year, and that is, on a Sunday evening. All the pupils are called upon to exert their talents to grace the occasion; and, now, the successful competitors for the first prizes are again listened to, and then receive the final award of their genius. In addition to this performance, a theatrical entertainment is furnished, consisting of an opera comique in three acts, sometimes, however, only in one act, and occasionally a single act of an Italian opera is performed. This beautiful festival, to which the most brilliant society in Paris is bidden, under the monarchy was presided over by the Minister of the Royal House, and sometimes by the Minister of the Interior. I remember to have seen Marshall Count of Lauriston presiding, who was, at the time, minister of Louis XVIII. He made the pupils and professors a most flattering and eulogistic address, which created not only among them, but the spectators present, the warmest enthusiasm. It is by such acts as these that a government promotes the progress of ART, and makes a nation greater than by the bloody battle-field and the shock of arms.

I have thus far said nothing about the class which is most worthy of mention—a class which has furnished France with distinguished artists, and which has raised the Conservatory to a proud distinction; I mean the class of Musical Composition. This is quite distinct from the classes of harmony, counterpoint, and fugue, which have their separate teachers. I will also here state, that there are, in the Conservatory, three Examiners. In connection with the directors, the examiners form the High Council of the Conservatory, by which are examined, quarterly, the pupils in fugue and counterpoint. The examiners are selected from the ranks of the very best French composers, and are members of the Legion of Honor and of the Institute of France. Their only duty (beside that of examining the pupils just mentioned), is the teaching of musical composition. Each examiner has two or three pupils under his care, to whom he gives three lectures a week. He is not subject to the rules of the Conservatory, as the professors are, but instructs his pupils at home, and at any time most convenient for himself. His system of instruction is thorough and rigid to extremity; and the progress of the pupils is correspondingly certain and satisfactory.

After studying three years under these illustriously and conscientiously severe masters, the pupils come to competition for the grand prize. Three successive trials are had,—1st. An exercise in Counterpoint. 2d. A Fugue. 3rd. A Musical Composition, with an orchestral accompaniment. The third piece, till within the last three years, had been an aria, preceded by a recitative; but it has been enlarged, and is now a drama, in one act. I heard that, a few years ago a drama, called Sappho, which had gained for its author, M. Gounod, the grand prize, was brought out with success at the Grand Opera in Paris.

Previous to the competition for the grand prize, which takes place in the large Hall of the Institute of France, each pupil is for three days locked in a room; writing materials being furnished him, also necessary food. During this time, he is allowed to have no intercourse with anybody; and should he violate this rule, he would be expelled, with disgrace, from the class of competitors. And why is he thus locked up? and what does he do in his solitary room? He there composes his third piece with orchestral accompaniment; and he is thus locked up that it shall not be possible for him to gain any aid from friends or books, but that he must, in those three days, produce the composition out of his own head. The exercises on fugue and counterpoint are handed in before the competitors are locked up. When a pupil has finished his composition, he selects some device and writes it carefully on one corner of his score, as a mark by which his production shall be distinguished from all the rest. He then carefully signs, folds up, and seals his score, and then it is handed to the director of the Conservatory. The director examines every device, that he may know to whom each score belongs, and then removes the signature; so that the judges determine the merits of a composition without knowing who is its author; and thus is even the suspicion of partiality avoided. Let me now relate how the decision is given on this important matter.

The music section of the Institute of France, consisting of five members, all first-rate composers, meet upon an appointed day, in the Hall of the Institute. A piano has been carried there, and able artists summoned. Each composition is performed in presence of these equitable and incorruptible judges, and each of them drops his vote into a bag, giving, at the same time, his motives of praise and blame. After every piece has been thus performed and judged, the votes on each work are compared and verified, and the grand prize is awarded. The decision is made known publicly by the papers. All that I have described takes place in August, in which month also the general examination comes off. But that is not the end. The composition to which the grand prize has been adjudged will be honored with a public execution. In October all the sections of the Institute of France meet publicly; and in that illustrious assembly, before an immense concourse, to which the first artists and the orchestra of the Grand Opera, with their great leader, Habeneck, have been called—in such a place, I say, the happy young Laureat enjoys with rapture a performance, which, alas! will perhaps be the last for him.

Napoleon was the founder of this grand prize. He had remarked that in every other branch of the fine arts, painting, sculpture, architecture, &c., a premium was granted to the pupil who produced the best work; and that music, by some unexplainable, and in his view unjustifiable, reason, was made an exception. He resolved at once to place music on the same footing in this respect with her sister arts, and to this end he founded the grand prize.

Great advantages were, and are still, attached to the gaining of the grand prize. The pupil who wins such a distinction, is maintained during three years at the expense of the government: he is sent to Italy, to stay one year in Rome, where he makes himself acquainted with the musical resources, performances, and models, which the art can afford an artist in that city. The second year he visits Naples, Milan, and Florence, where every facility is given him for holding intercourse with such celebrated masters and singers as he can meet with there. The third year he is allowed to visit Germany. This closes his tour, and he is ordered back to France. Another privilege which was invaluable under Napoleon, belongs still to the young musician crowned with the grand prize. He was exempt from enrollment in the army. This shows the high degree of esteem Napoleon entertained for the art of music, of which he was exceedingly fond. There is no better proof of this than his restoration of the Chapel of Music in the Chateau of the Tuileries. He loaded with presents and regards Lesueur, his Chapel Master; he summoned from Italy to France the celebrated Paisiello, to whom he gave a high salary taken from his private treasury; the composer Paër accompanied him in all foreign expeditions, to compose masses and te Deums to celebrate the victories gained by his armies over the enemies of France. No other sovereign ever did so much for the arts in general, and music in particular.

[To be continued.]

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, MARCH 17. To go on with my visit to Dresden and Leipzig: It was still dark when I bade farewell to "Smoking house" friends and trudged off, with a boy to carry my bag, down to the noble new bridge built for the railroad, and so across the Elbe to the station. The policeman watches you, and if he hears you taking a ticket for Leipzig or Berlin, he demands the passport. You present it—a pleasant little reminder of the paternal care taken of you by these governments. At last we are off, running along the smooth river bottom of the Elbe, with a vine-covered side-hill not far off. By and by we see Meissen four or five miles away to the south; for we are not so far from the river; then again we pass through a tunnel, and our vineyards have disappeared; then we reach the river again at Riesa and cross it, having accomplished some thirty miles; and now straight across the level country forty miles farther, and there is Leipzig.

There were kind hearts awaiting me still, although but one or two are left of the friends of last year; but the fewer the number the warmer the welcome. CLAPP I found plunged into the mazes of WEBER's and MENDELSSOHN's concerted music, with the pleasing prospect of being called upon in a few weeks to play one of these pieces in presence of the pillars of the musical church—a little episode in a pianist's life, like a young lawyer's first argument before the U. S. Supreme Court in the days of MARSHALL and STORY. However, you may be sure he will do Boston credit. His touch seems to me exquisite, and his power of imitating, no, reproducing, the styles of other players, from such men as MOSCHELES down to the author of the sweet song: "Little children, love your ma," is wonderful. He has no ambition though to become a virtuoso, but is devoting himself to a thorough study of the best methods of instruction.

This visit to Leipzig is a green and sunny week in my calendar. If for no other reason, the contrast between my student lodging in Berlin, and the sitting room of a noble American woman, with its delicious home feeling, enlivened and refined by her presence and that of her children, was enough to make it so. But musically, this visit was worth more to me than any of my former ones. I had more opportunity of meeting, seeing and hearing the men to whom Leipzig owes its present musical renown than formerly, and had for the first time opportunity of attending one of each of the two great concerts, the "Quartet" and the "Gewandhaus."

To one who has lived as much as I have in the musical periodical literature of England and Germany of the last sixty years, there is hardly a living musician whom one could visit with more interest than MOSCHELES. Years ago, how I used to pore over a set of the old London Harmonicon, another of Bacon's Musical Review, and the early volumes of the London Musical World! Later, the Leipziger Allg. Mus. Zeitung came in my way, and in the columns of that noble work I found could trace back the history of him whose name filled so large a space in the English musical press, to the boy composer of fourteen years, to the boy virtuoso of ten years, astonishing the public at Prague by his performance of variations of their new kapellmeister, WEBER, and playing with Fräulein MELITSCH the double concerto for two piano-fortes in E flat by MOZART. I follow him to Vienna, and there find him arranging BEETHOVEN's Fidelio for the piano, and at the end he writes: Fine, mit Gottes hülf, (Finis, with God's help;) to which Beethoven adds: O Mensch, hilf dir selber! (O man, help thyself.)

I follow him from volume to volume of the Zeitung in his artistic journeys, gaining ever a higher position, becoming more widely known, filling the places left vacant by the setting of the great stars of fifty years since, until I reach the era of the Harmonicon, when he is in London, the great composer, the great director, the great pianist, the most honored and popular man, as it seems, in the London world.

And at last MENDELSSOHN comes upon the stage, and "Moscheles and Mendelssohn" are names to conjure by; and still later, covered with honors and wealthy, he leaves the great capital and settles in quiet Leipzig—to my feelings, the great link which connects the present with the past. He is still active, still guiding the young virtuoso in the true path, still impressing the great lessons of the past upon the present, still stemming the current of fate in its efforts to break away from all the restraints of the true and the classic. He knew BEETHOVEN and probably HAYDN. If not, he knew those who did know both HAYDN and MOZART; and so you can follow the chain back to the days of BACH and HANDEL.

It was therefore with no small pleasure that Clapp brought me permission to call upon one of whom I had read so much. I had seen him at the Conservatory and in other places, but to visit him in his own house was another thing. Such a call would in any case be of interest; but where a man has improved his many opportunities, and has collected so many little remembrances of the distinguished persons whom he has known, this interest becomes an hundred fold greater. Such objects are a variety of Beethoven matters, autographs, likenesses, &c., and a volume of MS. letters of Mendelssohn, in which his talent for drawing and his wit are shown conspicuously. But this is no place to give an inventory of the objects of interest in that drawing room. During another visit he was kind enough to offer to play, and selected Beethoven's Variations, Op. 35, a work new to me, and which I now for the first time saw. Its theme forms the last movement of the "Sinfonie Eroica." Of the beauty of these variations, so played, I need not speak. Moscheles must now be over sixty years of age, but I should not dream it from his appearance. Health to him for long years to come!

Another interesting visit was to the well-known organist, C. F. BECKER, whose musical bibliographical works sustain a very high reputation. Herr Becker has devoted himself mostly to the history of church music, and certainly his collection of works illustrative of the rise and progress of modern sacred music, is one to "make my mouth water." Herr Becker seems hardly yet past the middle age, and I hope that we may yet have much from his pen. His catalogue of the musical works of the 16th and 17th centuries is a work of great labor, and one I would not willingly be without.

Besides Prof. PLAIDT, of whom I have before spoken, and who is just as industrious and as skilful a teacher as ever, I may mention that in one of our walks we met a man whose name has become known in America within the last few years, and whom I saw once or twice afterwards. This was JULIUS KNORR. He is rather a tall, slender man, somewhat past the middle age, I thought. I did not hear him play, though I saw him show some tricks of fingering, which no hand but one with such an immense span as his can ever hope to perform. I was reminded of the stories told of Waelff, the rival of Beethoven in the days of his virtuoso glory in Vienna, who used to play Mozart's Fantasia in F minor, for four hands, without omitting a note, as old Tomaschek has recorded.

One evening passed pleasantly at the Abend Unterhaltung of the conservatory. The pieces given were a Quartet in A by Beethoven, the performers, except the violoncello, being pupils; a sonata for piano-forte and violin, by Schumann, by pupils; Piano Trio by Moscheles, which pleased me much, and none the less so because the Scherzo, if not a regular Scotch reel, was much of that character.

The Gewandhaus Quartet Concert which I attended was on the evening of Feb. 25, and the programme was this:

Trio by Beethoven, in G, performed by Herren Röntjen, Herrmann and Grätzmacher.

Quartet, No. 1, E flat, by Cherubini, performed by the same gentlemen with the addition of DAVID as first violin.

Variations for two pianos, by O. Singer, quite a young man, and I think a pupil in the conservatory. I cannot say that I was much impressed either by the melody of the theme or by the character of the variations. There was no resting point; the hands seemed to be always full of chords; and when it was finished, one wished to know what all that was about.

The second part of the concert was filled by Mendelssohn's Octet. Once hearing is not enough for me to be able to enjoy a work of this extent, or indeed to follow its ideas, especially in the case of a composer like Mendelssohn, who deals so little in broad, clear melodies. The author of the fairy music in the "Midsummer Night's Dream," however, was fully confessed.

But how can I express my astonishment at my first look into the hall of the Gewandhaus, of which we have heard and read so much! A little, miserable, unventilated room, which can scarcely, when crowded to its utmost capacity, I judge, hold eight hundred auditors. Though well fitted for quartet concerts, can it be possible for an audience to get more than a faint idea of the due effect of a large orchestra? This remained to be seen. Well, four days after came a so-called "Gewandhaus Concert," par excellence, and I had opportunity to hear for myself. First came Spontini's noisy overture to the Vestalin. Now it is clear that to one who is in the habit of being in the very tumult of the sounds of an orchestra, and has learned to look for this sort of effect, the clear distinctness with which we who are used to the large concert rooms of Boston and New York hear the various voices and parts, with the utterances of the themes from all the different instruments, and the subdued tone of the whole, must appear to be a defect. I do not seem to have said just what I mean. Take a comparison. An orchestral work is to me in music what a great painting with many figures is in a sister art. The artist can find enjoyment in a near view, which will enable him to trace the hand of the master and appreciate the evidences of his skill. But we, the laity, go to a distance and sit down, to let the work as a whole speak out its intent and find its way into our hearts. It is one kind of pleasure to sit in the choir and join in Handel's mighty choruses, in which the singer is borne along as upon a mighty flood of tones; it is quite another thing to sit in our noble Boston Music Hall, and follow such choruses as clearly and see their construction as distinctly as we do a vocal quartet in a small room. Some of our first critics here in Berlin are now finding fault with the great numbers of performers, both vocal and instrumental, employed in producing Beethoven's great Mass in the Sing Akademie. "For the room," says RELLSTAB, "the number of performers was too great. In such cases also there is a golden medium."

To me, then, used to the most distant seats in the Berlin concert rooms, which, though small, still are larger than that of the Gewandhaus, a seat on the main floor of this latter seemed to place me in the midst of a rush and torrent of confused sound—noisy, but not musically sonorous—loud, but dead. The exquisite manner in which the orchestra played was not to be denied, though my standard of comparison is the Royal Orchestra of Berlin; but for real enjoyment of the work played, give me either a larger hall or a smaller orchestra. DAVID can make himself more conspicuous—he is a magnificent orchestral player—doubtless, in a small room; but when one hears an orchestra he wishes to hear no single performer—not Paganini; he listens to Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, not to the men who are performing them.

Well, after the overture came a scene and air by SPOHR, with Clarinet obligato, sung by Fräulein Bianchi. She is all the mode just now in Leipzig—a pretty girl and a sweet singer, but why so much praised, why rated so highly, I cannot imagine.

Concertstück for oböe, by Rietz, played by Herr Diethe; neither the composition nor its performance better than Ribas used to give us in Boston, Diethe's tone by no means so good.

Terzet from Fidelio, sung by Fräuleins Rodi and Bianchi, and Herr Eilers. No better singing than we often hear from Boston artists.

Overture "for the Emperor's Nameday," Op. 115, by Beethoven; exquisitely played, but to me not effective from causes above discussed.

Trio from Cimarosa's "Secret Marriage," by the two girls above named, and the violinist Droyschok's wife, who took the contralto. Her part pleased me best of the three.—By the way, why do not your Italian opera troupes give this work by Cimarosa? It requires no chorus, and is a perfect masterpiece of fun and music.

The second part of the concert was filled by a new Symphony by Taubert in C minor, led by the composer, who had come on to Leipzig for the purpose. At its close there was just enough of applause to prove that it had fallen dead. I felt sorry for Taubert; but why, after so many failures in this class of compositions, does he venture new manuscript works among strangers? On the whole, this was a pretty poor programme and very unsatisfactory concert to some.

I enclose a specimen of the programmes to the private concerts of the "Aufschwung,"* a musical club, of which our Boston representative, Clapp, is entitled to the honor of paternity. It will give you a good idea of what the young musicians in Leipzig can do and are doing.

PART I.

1. String Quartet, in E flat,.....Cherubini
Played by Herren Japha, Langhans, Koning and Lutz.
2. Cavatina from "St. Paul,".....Mendelssohn.
Sung by Herr F. Rebling.
3. Piano Pieces,.....Schumann.
a Nos. 1 and 10 from the "Davidbänder-tänzen."
b "Warum?" and "Grillen," from the "Fantasie-Stücken."
Played by Herr J. von Bernuth.

PART II.

4. Salon Piece for two pianos, eight hands, Oesterley.
Played by Herren H. Bosch, N. B. Clapp,† J. von Bernuth, and W. Saar.†
5. a Romanza, }Beethoven.
b Sarabande, } for the violin,.....Spohr.
c Melody,Molique.
Played by Herr Toste.
6. Three Songs :.....Schumann.
a "Nichts Schöneres."
b "Ständchen."
c "Ausallen Märchen winkt es."
7. Sonata, op. 106, 1st movement,.....Beethoven.
Played by W. Saar.†

[To commence precisely at 6½, P. M., and end at 7½.]

And so, with no diminution in my pleasant recollections of Leipzig, the next evening I was again in Berlin.

A. W. T.

P. S. The "Stern Orchestra Society," in connection with his Singing Society, is going to give us a Beethoven night to close with, which will be as near the acme, the ne plus ultra, as it is easy to get. What do you think of just these three numbers on the programme? Selections from the "Ruins of Athens," the Piano Fantasia, with Orchestra and chorus, and the Ninth Symphony entire. For this latter work our public is well prepared, as the first three movements have been played by other performers some half-dozen times in public this winter, and all is fresh in our memories and ready for the addition of the vocal finale. Stern is a public benefactor..

A. W. T.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 19, 1856.

A Compliment to Otto Dresel.

Of all the "complimentary concerts" we have known, the most beautiful and the most hearty was the Private Concert given at the Messrs. Chickering's rooms last Monday evening in compliment to our admirable pianist, composer, and musician par excellence among all who have ever resided among us, Mr. OTTO DRESEL. The concert was a token to him of esteem and gratitude on the part of a little club of amateur ladies and gentlemen, including about an equal number of our best professional singers, who for two winters past have met weekly in a private house for the practice, under Mr. Dresel's direction, of some of the choicest vocal compositions of the German masters. In this way they have studied, and by dint of the severest and most patient drill, have mastered several entire Psalms of MENDELSSOHN, SCHUBERT and ROBERT FRANZ; Motets of BACH; portions of MOZART's Requiem; the Christus, the Athalia, the "Midsummer Night's Dream" choruses, and many four-part songs of MENDELSSOHN; parts of GLUCK's Orfeo; choruses by WEBER, SCHUMANN, &c. Never probably, has so pure and beautiful an ensemble of voices (to the number of four or five upon a part) been brought together in our city, and never has such thorough drill, with such artistic spirit and result, been known in any of our vocal combinations.

* The word means Aspiration—equivalent here to our Longfellow's motto: "Excelsior."—Ed.

† Americans.

The members of the club have felt it a rare privilege to be thus initiated into such satisfying music by a guide so sure and so inspiring. The fruits of their practice have several times delighted little parties of their friends at the hospitable house; this time it was their wish upon a somewhat larger scale to make the attraction of their singing serve the purpose of a substantial compliment to their instructor, and yet to do it in a way that should have as little as possible of the unpleasant publicity of a concert. The Chickering room therefore was chosen as the fittest place; the tickets were disposed of privately, even to the last seat that the room would hold, some weeks before the concert, and the disappointed applicants were almost as many as the fortunate who found admittance. The room was exquisitely adorned with huge bouquets of flowers, which, with the youth and beauty of so many female singers, and the well-dressed audience, made a charming scene. The selections were all vocal, sung by the members of the club, reinforced by a few extra voices in one or two of the last pieces, and directed and accompanied on the piano by Mr. DRESEL, aided by Mr. TRENKLE, wherever a greater breadth of harmony was required. This was the programme:

PART I.

- 1—Psalm cxvii, for Double Chorus,....Robert Franz.
- 2—Psalm xlii: "As the Hart," &c.,....Mendelssohn.
Chorus. Soprano Solo. Recitative, Soprano Solo with Chorus of Women. Chorus of Men; Full Chorus. Recitative, Soprano Solo. Quintet for Soprano and Male voices. Finale.
- 3—Psalm xlii: "The Lord is my Shepherd," Schubert.
Quartet for Treble voices.
- 4—Oratorio of "Christus,".....Mendelssohn.
Recitative. Trio for Male voices: "Say, where is he born, the king of Judea, for we have seen his star, and are come to adore him."
Chorus: "There shall a Star from Jacob come forth and dash in pieces Princes and Nations," and Chorus.
Recitative. Chorus: "This man have we found perverting all the nation, and forbidding to render tribute to Cæsar," &c.
Recitative. Chorus: "He stirreth up the Jews by teaching them."
Recitative. Chorus: "Away with Jesus, and give Barabbas to us."
Recitative. Chorus: "Crucify him."
Recitative. Chorus: "We have a sacred Law; guilty by that Law let him suffer."
Recitative. Chorus: "Daughters of Zion, weep for yourselves and your children."

PART II.

- 5—Selections from "Orpheus,".....Gluck.
Dance of Furies.
Chorus: "What mortal dares enter these shades, guarded by Cerberus."
Solo: Orpheus, answered by Chorus of Furies.
Chorus: "Unhappy mortal, what brings thee hither?"
Solo—Orpheus: "Endless woes, unhappy shadows," &c.
Chorus: "Ah! by what magic does this mortal irresistibly soothe our fury?"
Solo—Orpheus: "Infernal gods! Pity my despair!"
Chorus: "Let him enter the infernal gates."

Chorus: "Enter the abode of the blest, noble hero, faithful lover."

- 6—I. Chorus of Elves, from "Oberon,".....Weber.
 II. Four-part Song: "Come, let us roam the Greenwood,".....Mendelssohn.
 7—I. Chorus of Houri, and
 II. "Sleep on, sleep on, in visions of rest," from "Paradise and the Peri," R. Schumann.
 8—Choruses of Elves, from "Midsummer Night's Dream,".....Mendelssohn.

It would take many pages to describe the characteristic beauties of all these pieces, not one of which, we believe, was ever publicly performed in Boston. Admirable as each was separately, the gradation and contrast of effects in the whole series was not less admirable. The Psalm for double chorus by FRANZ is a noble composition, learned, almost BACH-like in its spirit, with the same fresh originality and truth of expression which we find in his songs; a truly religious work, elaborate and very difficult, ending in a fugue, which, like all the rest, was sung with the most perfect balance, precision, and purity of intonation and expression. The sopranos were all fresh and telling, without any harshness, and sounded together like one voice; and so the contraltos, which were extremely rich and musical. MENDELSSOHN'S Psalm: "As the hart pants after the water-brooks," &c., is one of his most beautiful productions, full of sweet and tender feeling, and with such contrasts of solos, choruses, now of women, now of men, quintet, and grand full chorus for finale, as to keep the interest always fresh. The soprano solos, each by a different voice, selected with careful reference to the peculiar fitness of each to the speciality of the passage, were all sung in an artistic and expressive manner which we rarely hear in concerts. Of course we may not particularize.—SCHUBERT'S Psalm, sung by four fine, fresh treble voices, is a piece suggestive of angelic harmony, and has all the peculiar imaginative charm of that rare genius.

But the profoundest impression of the sacred half of the programme was produced by that wonderful fragment (all that was completed) of MENDELSSOHN'S Christus. The Trio of the three magi, which was finely rendered, excites expectation marvellously. The chorus: "There shall a star come forth," &c., has a sweet and starlike beauty. But the narrative recitatives, (admirably delivered by Mr. ARTHURSON,) with the accusing choruses before Pilate, are extremely, terribly dramatic, especially those multitudinous echoes of "Crucify, crucify, crucify him," and the inexorable sound of "We have a sacred Law," &c. And again, what is more exquisitely plaintive and pathetic than that weeping chorus at the end? The rendering of the whole fragment seemed near faultless, and everything else was forgotten in the expression and intention of the music. To judge from this fragment, (of which we published a fuller analysis a few weeks since,) the "Christus" would have been Mendelssohn's greatest sacred composition.

Part II. gave us sprites and fairies of all shades and nationalities, from Greek mythology, from German WIELAND'S brain, to music equally imaginative by WEBER; Eastern houris, and Mendelssohn's Shakspearian elves. Such purely imaginative, romantic music made the most agreeable relief after the graver pieces of the first part. It was changing from the solid to the "light," without resorting to aught trivial or empty, but keeping still to works of real creative genius.

The selection from GLUCK'S "Orpheus" was perhaps the most admired of anything that evening. It represents Orpheus at the entrance of the infernal regions seeking his Eurydice. First we have one of those short instrumental interludes, called in the score balletta, here representing the dance of the Furies. Mr. Dresel had arranged it, as well as the following accompaniments, for four hands in such a manner as to bring out the maximum of power from the piano for the simple but appalling harmony. The bark of Cerberus, accompanying the chorus of demons, who dispute his entrance, is strongly marked and quite impressive. All the music, incredibly simple as it seems in its construction after works more modern, is wonderfully dramatic and effective; and the alternation between these loud, inexorable choruses and the pleading melodies of Orpheus, with lyre-like accompaniment, (beautifully sung by a rich and sympathetic amateur contralto,) shows the highest art of contrast. Wonderful and beautiful is the gradual softening and yielding of the infernal chorus; a drowsiness comes over the stern chords, and the last piece is serene and peaceful as the songs of blessed spirits. Yet through the whole one musical motive, one and the same ever-repeated figure reigns, so that the change seems not one of form, but only atmospheric, imperceptible in its degrees. Here was real musical dramatic genius; with the simplest means, such wonderful results produced in the imagination and feeling of the hearer! Yet never before has a scene from one of Gluck's operas been heard, that we know, in this country! It moves us to repeat more earnestly than ever the wish, that some opera company, after all these highly spiced Italian operas, will deign for once to let us hear an opera of Gluck, that we may judge of opera from a standard of simple musical dramatic truth. Alas! too well they know that it would be to kill the charm of all their modern hot-house products.

The Oberon chorus is perfectly lovely; why not as finely imaginative in its way as Mendelssohn's fairy music? Indeed, we even question whether Weber's does not indicate more freedom from a certain musical one-ideaism, and whether its charm may not wear longer. It is the opening of the opera; Oberon sleeps, and his elfin ministers and subjects flit round his head with whispering, cautious strains, warning the noisy bee and fly to keep farther off, and the little rill to run more quietly and not disturb their monarch's dream. On a ground-work of exquisite accompaniment, slumberous chords, broken by little dream-like snatches, partly borrowed from the overture, the voices (soprano, alto and tenor,) hum little fragments of a low, half-connected strain, in a peculiar rhythm; voices and instrument together making one sweet whole. It was charmingly sung, with the most delicate light and shade. The merry little four-part song, called in the original "The Birds of the Forest," was sung with rare truth and unity, without accompaniment, and gave such pleasure that it had to be repeated.

The SCHUMANN choruses gave us a higher idea of his "Paradise and the Peri," than we had gathered from reports. The first one: "Deck we the steps of our Allah's throne!" is very original in its melodic design, and very beautiful; some of the modulations, two, are striking and significant. The other: "Sleep on," is a beautiful soprano melody (beautifully sung by an amateur), upon a soft, suffused background of chorus.—Finally, the fairy choruses from the "Midsummer Night's Dream," for female voices, (near twenty in all, and all so fresh and pure and musical, all so refined in quality), upon the ground-work of those humming figures from the overture, very nicely sketched on the piano, truly suggested the delicate chorus of the souls of little flowers—a sort of musical exhalation. They were sweet sounds to go home to sleep by.

Thus closed a most delightful and successful evening. The only source of regret was that more persons could not hear it. To the self-sacrificing artist, to whose honor these fruits of his own watering were offered, it must have been one of those sweet rewards which Providence fails not to let fall in the thorny path of every sincere and uncompromising devotion to the Beautiful and True.

Organs and Organ-building.

We alluded a few weeks since to the movement now in progress to place in the Boston Music Hall a Grand Organ, such as is now the boast of Haerlem and of Freyburg. The plan, we understand, is still being pushed vigorously—may we hope, successfully.

It may not be inappropriate, in this connection, to quote the following sound and practical hints, touching the necessary negotiations which must be had between the purchasing and building of such an instrument. They are taken from the recent work of HOPKINS, (Organist of the Temple Church, London, &c. &c.) "On the Organ and its construction."

After describing in detail the various elements which go to make up a perfect instrument, he says: "We have now arrived at the last, but by no means the least important question for consideration, namely, the price of the organ. This matter necessarily rests, to some extent, with the builder chosen, but remains to a much greater degree in the hands of the purchasers. From what has been explained in the preceding sections, it must be obvious that there is a durable, complete, but costly way of building an organ, and an unsubstantial, incomplete and cheap way of making it. It is also equally evident that organ-building may be viewed as a calling of high Art, or treated merely as a matter of business; and it will be exercised in either the former or the latter spirit, according to circumstances.

"Under the most extreme circumstances the organ-builder must exist by the exercise of his calling; but, at the same time, it is only consistent with the proper feeling of ambition that actuates every genuine artist, that he should prefer also rearing specimens of his art to which he might point with pride, as well as his successors for generations after him. But this second condition must depend obviously on the means placed at his disposal.

"On being applied to to make proposals for the construction and erection of an organ, an organ-builder may draw up a specification for an instrument of given contents, and, intending to use certain materials, and to devote much attention to various matters of detail and finish which cannot be specified in an estimate without extending it to the length of a pamphlet, place his charge at a certain sum, say £1,000. He may, however, have good reason to know that that figure will ensure him the loss of the 'order'; accordingly, without altering one of the written conditions of his contract, or foregoing one penny of his own fair profit, but simply by reducing the standard or substance, or both, of his metal, and paying less regard to the minute excellencies of his work, he can, 'to meet circumstances,' at once lower his estimate from £1,000 to £850. It is in this sense that 'the price of an organ' is said to remain so much in the hands of the purchasers. But when the organ is completed, will it rank so high, as a work of Art, as it was originally intended by its designer it should do? Will it reflect more than a temporary credit on its builder? A few years pass, and the organ itself probably solves these problems. Crooked or bruised metal pipes, cracked wooden pipes, drumming sound-boards, twisted rollers, double frictional resistance opposed to the fingers at the keys, and numerous other such fatalities, too frequently indicate what are and probably must ever be among the most probable distinctnesses of the 'cheap organ.' Nor is the builder exactly to be held responsible for this, if he gave timely advice and warning.

"So far it has been shown by how easy a course the price of an organ of a given size may be materially reduced, to accommodate the estimate to particular circumstances. But the process may be reversed: i. e. the size of an organ may undergo great apparent increase, when 'a Grand Organ' is desired for the price of one of ordinary dimensions. An organ with say fifty stops, may cost either £1,000, or nearly £2,000, according to circumstances. If its specification be drawn up in a spirit consistent with the magnitude of the work, as implied by the number of its stops—if the stops chosen are introduced mostly in a 'complete' form, and if a just proportion be observed in their distribution between the manuals and pedal—the cost of such an instrument will certainly approach the higher of the two rough estimates above given. But then it will also be a genuine specimen of the German system of organ-building, carried out in its amplitude and integrity. Among the fundamental laws of that system are these: if a great manual be furnished with sixteen stops, these should include at least two double stops, one of which must be a double open diapason throughout. Or, to follow the German form of expression more closely, the great organ should be a 'sixteen feet manual.' Then all the manuals—by which is meant the organs as well as the keys—should be of equal, that is, of CC range; and the pedal moreover should, as a minimum proportion, have at least one third as many stops as the great manual.

"These and other governing rules of the science, however, can only be recognized, or at least followed, when the price will admit of their being so. But it too frequently happens that the approximate price for the organ has already been fixed, and the hoped-for number of stops also considered; in which case all that is left for an organ-builder to do, who desires to secure the order, is to prepare a design that will as little as possible run counter to these pre-formed expectations. He sees clearly that the plan for an instrument on the genuine German principle will exclude itself by its appended estimate; that there is every probability of the prize falling into the hands of him who can prepare the most 'promising' specification; therefore ideas about Art must subserve to those relating to business.

"Nor can organ-builders fairly be accountable for adopting the obvious alternative thus imposed upon them, and which amounts to this in effect if not in words: he who will prepare the specification that seems to promise the most extensive instrument for the stated terms—who, in fact, can the most successfully make what would seem a smaller organ look like a larger upon paper—will stand the best chance of securing 'the order.' And the ingenuity sometimes displayed in estimates drawn up to meet such expectations, almost calls for admiration. First, instead of the specification stating that the proposed instrument shall be built on the German system, which would be embodying a great deal, all it will promise, if it be prudently drawn up, is that it shall be made to the German compass, which implies but little. Next, several of the stops are planned to draw in halves; every such divided stop thus appearing as two; or they are introduced in an incomplete form, to meet other incomplete stops. In this manner a great step is made toward securing the necessary array of 'stops'; many persons judging of the excellence of an organ by the number of its handles, rather than by the excellence and completeness of what those handles govern. The couplers, even, to swell the number, are sometimes enumerated as stops. Then the important distinction between 'standard size' and 'size of tone' is overlooked; and the two portions of the stopped diapason, which together in reality form but one stop of eight feet tone, in consequence bear the aspect of two stops of eight feet. The bourdon, also, if divided, appears as two stops of sixteen feet. In this manner the stops in question, and by consequence the department to which they belong, are left open to a flattering estimate of their real dimensions.* The one sesquialtera of five ranks, again, which is to be found in all the most important organs of Germany, as well as in those of Bridge, Byfield, Harris and Smetzler in England, has to be made to draw as two or even three stops. Then the swell organ—a department in the construction of which an organ-builder takes peculiar pride and interest—this must be cut short at tenor C; which denudation deprives the swell of its finest octave, though to be sure at the same time it effects a saving of nearly £100 in the cost of that department alone, and must therefore be resorted to as one means of keeping down the price of the instrument. The swell manual perhaps runs 'throughout,' though that is of little value without its proper pipes. Numerous small and inexpensive stops, again, find admission, which assist in making up the required number, at no great outlay; while many large and costly ones are necessarily excluded, to bring the instrument within the narrow bounds prescribed by the stipulated terms. In this manner the admirable rule which lies at the foundation of the German system of organ-building—that the pedal shall have, at the least, one third as many stops as the great manual—and which is specially intended to check all excess in small or incomplete stops, as well as the slighting of large and more important ones, is perforce treated as though it had no existence. By the above and other such means, a specification for an organ of almost any number of stops—i. e., handles—may be provided, to suit almost any sum that may be named. But it cannot be supposed that any organ-builder who has a real love for his Art, can prefer building an instrument according to so unhealthy a system, however readily he may consent to do so.

* It must be borne in mind that it is not the tone of the deepest sounding covered stop, but the 'standard length' of the largest stop of the open diapason species, that fixes the size of a manual or pedal organ.

"Yet despite the discouraging influences under which it has been sometimes carried on, Organ-building has nevertheless progressed marvellously, particularly in respect to those mechanical details which ensure quietness in the action generally, and which relate to lightness and promptness in the touch of large instruments, as well as in the selection and variety of the stops; but in regard to the completeness in the compass of the stops, and the excellence of the metal used in their construction, great 'progress' might still be made in going back to the customs of a century or more since. But these latter returns, whenever they may take place, must be preceded by a corresponding return to something akin to the fair and liberal terms paid to the artists of former times. We need not wonder, then, at the completeness, so far as they went, goodness of material, excellence of finish, beauty of tone, and durability of old instruments, made under such favorable auspices."

The above matters relating to the price, excellence and completeness of an organ, have been entered into thus fully and unreservedly, first, because emanating as they do from one who is wholly unconnected with the organ-building business, and who therefore can in no way be interested in the issue, beyond what is shared by all who admire excellence, irrespective of size, they may perhaps be permitted to exercise some influence with those who have to detect the actual merits of competing estimates; and secondly, because they really involve the permanent interest of the purchaser, the credit of the builder, and the progress of the Art, in equal degrees.

OTTO DRESEL gives the last of his Soirées at Chickering's this evening, assisted by other pianists, by the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, and in the vocal department by Miss ELISE HENSLEY, fresh from new operatic triumphs in New York. She will sing Cherubini's Ave Maria and the Romanza from "William Tell." For piano solos, Mr. Dresel will play again his fine arrangement of the Andante from Schubert's Symphony; Beethoven's Sonata, op. 31, in E flat; the Adagio from Chopin's second Concerto, and his Andante and Polonaise, op. 22, both for the first time and with quintet accompaniment. These, in addition to the larger features of the bill, which are Bach's Concerto for three Pianos, with quartet accompaniment, (not the one played two years since,) and Mendelssohn's first Trio (in D minor) for piano, violin and 'cello, which has not been aired here for a year or more.... For next Saturday evening, (26th.) at the new Mercantile Hall, our old friend, WILLIAM KEYZER, the violinist, announces a Benefit Concert of classical chamber music, with the aid (as will be seen below) of some of our best instrumental artists. Mr. K. enters a field somewhat different from any that has been occupied of late by our other chamber concert givers; he is to preach to us the gospel of SPOHR, the larger half of his programme being occupied with two of the most important compositions of that often tedious, but always elegant and learned, and sometimes delightful master. Judged by symphony and oratorio, he has never taken a deep hold on our musical affections here, and is really far less known among us than so great a master should be. His Piano Quintet and his Double Quartets rank among his very best works. CHORLEY, whose criticism on him we once copied, admits that "Dr. Spohr's music has its times and places of vitality and individual intelligence, as well as that general air of swooning, over-luxurious, elaborate grace, which conceals its poverty in significance and variety so well and so long, with some even forever." And he speaks of his Quartets as works "in which the compromise betwixt what is classical and severe, and what is exciting and gracious, could hardly be carried to higher perfection." Mr. Keyzer has many friends in Boston, and we hope he will have a full house.

Advertisements.

OTTO DRESEL'S SOIRÉES.

The FOURTH (and last) Soirée will take place THIS (SATURDAY) Evening, at Messrs. Chickering's Rooms. He will be assisted on this occasion by Miss ELISE HENSLE, the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, and other Artists.
Tickets One Dollar each, at the usual places.

Mr. WM. KEYZER'S BENEFIT CONCERT,

At Mercantile Hall, Summer St.,

On SATURDAY EVENING, April 26, 1856,

Assisted by the following Gentlemen, who have kindly volunteered:

GUSTAV SATTER, Pianist: Messrs. SUCK, SCHULTZE, and MEISEL, Violins: ECKHARDT and EICHLER, Tenors: W. FRIES and A. SUCK, Violoncellos.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

Quartet,.....Haydn.

Allegro—Adagio—Scherzo—Finale.

Messrs. Keyzer, Schultze, Eckhardt and Fries.

Grand Quintet, for Piano-forte solo, 1st and 2d violin, tenor and violoncello, (first time in Boston,).....Spohr.

Messrs. Gustav Satter, &c.

PART II.

Duo Concertante for Piano and Violin,.....Hers and Lafont.

Messrs. Satter and Keyzer, (by request.)

Double Quartet,.....Spohr.

Allegro—Scherzo—Larghetto—Finale.

1st Quartet—Messrs. Keyzer, Schultze, Eckhardt and Fries.

2d Quartet—Messrs. Suck, Meisel, Eichler and A. Suck.

(The Quintet for Piano-forte, and the Double Quartet, by Spohr, are generally considered as among the best compositions of that great master.)

Tickets 50 cents each, to be obtained at the music stores, Tremont and Revere Houses, and at the door.

Concert to commence at 7½ o'clock.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
U. S. HOTEL.

Communications can be left at Mr. Ditson's music store.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.

NEW YORK.

AFTERNOON CONCERTS

AT THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

A Series of SIX WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS will be given at the Boston Music Hall, commencing March 28th, under the direction of CARL ZERBAHN. The Orchestra will be the same which has given so much satisfaction at the series of Orchestral Concerts just terminated. The selections will be of a character suited to all the various tastes of the community, consisting of Symphonies, Overtures, Arrangements from popular Operas, Waltzes, &c.

The managers pledge themselves to make these Concerts worthy of the liberal support of the community.

Packages of six tickets, to be used at pleasure, $1. Single tickets 25 cts. For sale at the Music Stores and at the door.

The Concerts will commence at 3½ o'clock.

CHOICE MUSICAL WORKS.

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS, complete in two large quarto volumes, printed from engraved plates, and pronounced the most elegant specimen of music typography ever executed. Bound in cloth, embossed and lettered.—Price of a single vol. $7.50; of both volumes, $12.

MENDELSSOHN'S SONGS WITHOUT WORDS complete in one vol. quarto, bound in cloth, embossed and lettered. Price $8.

MENDELSSOHN'S FOUR-PART SONGS. Text in German and English. The latter by J. C. D. PARKER.—In cloth, $1.50; boards $1.25

DITSON'S STANDARD OPERAS, 6 vols. Norma, Lucia, Sonnambula, Lucrezia, Ernani, English and Italian text, each, $2. Don Giovanni, Piano Solo, $1.50.

ORATORIOS. Creation, $1.25. Messiah, $1.25. Moses in Egypt, $1.50.

MASSSES. Mozart's Requiem, $1; Mozart's 12th Mass, $1; Beethoven's Mass in C, 75 cents; Haydn's 3d Mass, 75 cts.; Rossini's Stabat Mater, Latin and English words, $1.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

C. BREUSING,

IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

The Latest Publications of

J. A. NOVELLO.

ORIGINAL LONDON EDITIONS.

Novello's Complete Folio Edition.

RINK'S PRACTICAL ORGAN SCHOOL,

Op. 55. Carefully revised and corrected; with the German directions and terms translated into English. Price $8.75; or in Six Parts, 75 cents each.

PART I, price 75c., contains—

PREFACE.
Nos. 1 to 12. Short and easy pieces in two parts.
" 13 to 24. " " three parts.
" 25 to 36. " " four parts.
" 37 to 66. Preludiums, in various keys, for soft or loud stops.

PART II, price 75c., contains—

Nos. 67 to 132. Exercises for the pedals.
" 133 to 144. Twelve Chorales, or well-known German Psalm Tunes, with variations.

PART III, price 75c., contains—

Nos. 145 to 159. Fifteen easy Postludes, or Concluding Voluntaries, in the Fugue style.

PART IV, price 75c., contains—

Nos. 160 to 174. Fifteen Postludes, or Concluding Voluntaries for alternate manuals, in the Fugue style.

PART V, price 75c., contains—

Nos. 175 to 181. Seven Preludes and Fugues.
No. 182. The Flute Concerto.
" 183. Variations on "Heil dir Sieges Krans," or, "God save the Queen."

PART VI, price 75c., contains—

Nos. 184 to 192. Nine Preludes and Fugues.
" 193 to 194. Fantasia and Fugue.

Please to order Novello's Edition, and quote the prices.

MENDELSSOHN'S

SIX GRAND SONATAS FOR THE ORGAN.

New Edition, complete in one Book, $1.75, or singly, as follows:

No. 1. Price 44c.	No. 4. Price 88c.
2. " 25c.	5. " 25c.
3. " 25c.	6. " 81c.

Composed and dedicated to Dr. F. SCHLEMMER, by FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLODY. Op. 65.

J. Alfred Novello, London and New York.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY

FOR THE DIFFUSION OF

MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

Vol. 8. Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition with the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering (Former price $5.25c.) In paper wrappers, $1.18c. By mail—$1.20c.

Volumes of this series already issued.

Vol. 1. Cherubim's Counterpoint and Fugue, $1.63c.
" 2. Dr. Marx' General Musical Instruction, 1 63.
" 3. Fétis on Choir and Chorus Singing, 33.
" 4. Mozart's succinct Thoro' Bass School, 21.
" 5. Cate's Treatise on Harmony, 63.
" 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected writings on Thoro' Bass, Harmony and Composition for self-instruction. Vol. 1. Harmony and Thoro' Bass, price 88c. Vols. 2 and 3. Guide to Composition, 88c., each. Three vols. bound in one complete, Cloth Boards—$2 63c.

J. A. NOVELLO,
Sacred Music Store, 389 Broadway, New York.

J. M. MOZART,

BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 18 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quartet of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

APR 29 BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

ED. B. ROBINSON,
PIANO-FORTE TUNER.
Orders received at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington Street.

NEWS'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER,

Will be happy to give instruction in Piano-forte and Organ playing, and the Theory of Music. Address:—No. 8 Hayward Place. May 26. 17

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,

RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

J. TRENKLE,

TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.

Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE

—GIVES—
INSTRUCTION ON the PIANO-FORTE,
And may be addressed at her residence, 55 Hancock St.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,

TEACHER OF MUSIC,

205 Washington Street, Boston.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,

Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

G. ANDRÉ & CO'S

Depôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,

19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.
Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6 00
Special notices (loaded), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 212.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 26, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 4.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 232 Washington St. "
"GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
"A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
"C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
"SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
"GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.
"G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
"JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
"MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
"W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
"W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
"HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by
JOHN S. DWIGHT, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court
of the District of Massachusetts.]

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Translated from the French of Madame Dubeaut, for the Journal of Music.

CHAPTER V.

VEXATION.

I was fatigued, and yet I could not sleep. I counted the hours as they passed, but could not sum up the emotions of the evening and decide for myself. There was but one thing certain for me, and that was that I no longer loved the duchess, and had barely escaped learning a severe lesson in becoming attached to her; but a wounded heart soon seeks another wound to efface that which has mortified self-love, and the strong desire of loving made me feverish. For the first time in my life I was not absolute master of my will; I was impatient for the morrow. Since midnight I had entered into a new phase of existence, and not understanding myself, thought I was ill.

But I had never been so; my health had been my strong point, and I had grown up with a wonderful physical equilibrium. I was frightened in feeling my pulse slightly quickened. I jumped from my bed, looked at myself in the glass, and laughed outright. I lit my lamp, sharpened a pencil, and sketched upon a bit of paper the ideas which crossed me. I drew a composition which pleased me, although it was bad. It was a man seated between his good and bad angel. The good angel was anxious and full of solicitude for a pilgrim, whom the bad angel was tempting. Between these two angels, the principal personage, left to himself and relying upon neither of them, was looking smilingly at a little flower, which to him represented nature. This allegory had not even common sense, but to me alone it signified a great deal. I thought I had conquered my nervousness, and went back to bed, dozed a little, had the nightmare, and dreamed of murdering Celio.

I left my bed decidedly, dressed myself by the first light of the dawn, took a walk upon the ramparts, and, when the sun had risen, went to Celio's lodging.

Celio had not been to bed, and I found him up and writing letters.

"You have not slept," said he to me, "and you have wearied yourself with vain efforts. I did better than you; I passed the night out. When a person is excited, he must seek still more excitement; it is the quickest way of finishing the matter."

"Fie, Celio," said I, smiling; "you shock me."

"Without any reason," answered he, "for I passed the night discreetly, talking and writing with the purest of women."

"Who? Mademoiselle Boccaferri?"

"Eh! how came you to guess? Can it be that—but it would be too late, for she has gone."

"Gone!"

"Ah, you are pale. Come, come, I did not notice that. I was wholly absorbed in myself yesterday. But listen: when I left you last night I felt very angry with you. I should have been glad to have talked two hours longer, and you told me to go and rest, which meant that you had had enough of me. Determined to talk until daylight, no matter with whom, I went straight to old Boccaferri. I know that he never sleeps so soundly, even after he has drunk much, as not to be able to awake instantly with a clear head and always ready to talk. I saw a light at his window, knocked at the door, and found him up and talking with his daughter. They came towards me, embraced me, and showed me a letter which had arrived during the evening, and which they had opened upon their return. I cannot tell you what the letter contained; but you will know before long. It is an important secret for them, and I gave them my word of honor to reveal it to no one. I helped them pack and am commissioned to arrange their affairs at the theatre; I talked over my own with Cecilia while her father went for a carriage. Finally, I saw them get into it an hour ago and drive out of the city. Now you see me settling their accounts, waiting the time to go to the theatre and secure Cecilia from all pursuit. Do not question me, for my mouth is sealed; but I beg you to observe that I am very busy and gay this morning, and do not mind wasting the freshness of my voice, and am devoting myself to my friend like a simple épiciér. Don't let this astound you too much. I am obliging, because, instead of its troubling me, it occupies and amuses me, that is all."

"Can you not even tell me towards what country they are travelling?"

"Not even that. Am I not cruel? Blame no one but Cecilia, who did not even except you in the silence which she imposed upon me, so ungrateful and perverse is woman."

"I thought you made Mademoiselle Boccaferri an exception in your anathemas against her sex."

"Are you serious? Then she is truly an exception, and I own it. She is a pure woman; why? because she is not beautiful."

"Are you quite sure that she is not beautiful?" asked I, eagerly. "You speak like an actor, but not like an artist. But I am a painter and learned in such matters, and I assure you that she is much more beautiful than the Duchesse de X—, whose reputation is so great, and than the ruling prima donna, who has caused so much talk."

I expected either a jest or a denial from Celio. He answered not a word, but changed his coat and we went to breakfast. On the way he said to me hastily:

"You are perfectly right—she is the most beautiful of all women. I had the bad grace to deny it, for I thought I alone had discovered it."

"Celio, you speak like a possessor—like a lover."

"I!" cried he, turning his face towards mine with great assurance. "I am not, I never have been and never shall be her lover."

"How comes it that you do not desire it?"

"Because I respect her and wish to love her always, because she was the protégée of my mother, who esteemed her, and because after me, (and perhaps as much as I,) she is the person who best understood, best loved and best lamented my mother. Oh, my old Cecilia, never! Hers is a sacred head, and the only one which wears a bonnet that I would not like to trample under foot."

"Always strange and inconsistent, Celio! You know her to be estimable and loveable, and you so despise your own love as to guard her from it as if it were a stain! Can your breath then only degrade and wither what it touches? What sort of man or devil are you? But allow me to use one of those slang words you so much admire: this all seems humbug to me, an affectation of Mephistophelism, which your age and experience cannot justify. To tell the truth, I do not believe you. You want to astound me, affect the bold, the invincible and the satanic; but in reality you are an honest youth, rather wild, rather boastful, rather lawless, but not enough so to deny that a man ought to marry the girl whom he has betrayed; and as you are either too young or too ambitious to decide hastily upon so modest a marriage, you will not consent to lay siege to Cecilia's heart."

"Would to God I was as you think!" said Celio, without getting angry or contradicting; "then I should not be unhappy, as I am now. What I suffer is terrible. Ah, if I was pure and good, I should be candid, and marry Cecilia tomorrow and lead a calm, serene, charming life, more so than you think, as it might not be so humble a marriage as you now believe. Who knows the future? I cannot explain myself upon this subject; but know this—that even if Cecilia were a great heiress, honored with a noble name, I would not love her. Listen to a great truth, Salentini, though hackneyed and commonplace: the love of bad women kills us; the love of good and noble women kills them. We only love much that which loves us little, and that but little which loves us much. My mother, at forty, died of that, after ten years of silence and agony."

"Then that is true? I had heard so."

"And he who killed her still lives. I could never make him fight with me. I have insulted him bitterly, and although he is no coward, no, far from that, he bore it rather than raise his hand against Floriani's child. So I live like a reprobate, with a vengeance unquenched, which causes my torment, and I have not the courage to kill my mother's destroyer. You see in me another Hamlet, who does not affect grief and madness, but who is consumed by remorse, hatred and anger; and you called me good! All egoists are easily satisfied, tolerant and kind. But I shall not follow Hamlet's example, and I do not want to break poor Ophelia's heart. She should get her to a nunnery sooner! I am too unfortunate to love; I have no time nor strength for it; and the Hamlet within me becomes entangled with other passions. I am ambitious, selfish; Art is only a strife for me, glory only a revenge. My enemy prophesied that I would never come to anything, for my mother had spoiled me. I long to prove his falsehood before the whole world. As for Cecilia, I do not wish to be to her what he was to my mother, and yet I shall be; it is my destiny! The storms and griefs of our childhood fasten themselves to us, and when we try to free ourselves from them they draw us on by some fatal instinct of imitation to renew them at some later period; crime is contagious. I feel the injustice and folly I so hated in my mother's lover rising within me whenever I begin to love. So I will not love, for if I were not the victim, I should be the executioner."

"Then you are afraid lest you might be the victim unawares? You confess that you are capable of loving."

"Perhaps so; but I saw by my mother's example into what an abyss devotion may plunge us, and I shun it."

"And you do not really believe that love is subject to any laws but this terrible alternative of misplaced and sacrificed devotion, or that of mad tyranny and homicide?"

"No."

"Poor Celio! I pity you, and see that you are a weak and passionate man. At last I know you; you are destined to be either the victim or the destroyer; but apply that only to yourself—the human race is not your accomplice."

"You scorn me because you think yourself better," cried Celio, bitterly. "Well, wait awhile. If you are sincere, we will moralize upon it some other day; we will not dispute now. Until then, what do you intend doing? making love to my old Cecilia? Look out! I watch over her defence like a keen and snarly little dog. You must walk uprightly with her. If I respect her so much, others shall not possess her even in their most secret thoughts."

I was struck by the bitterness of these words and the tone of hatred and spite which accompanied them.

"Celio," said I to him, "you will be jealous of Boccaferri; you are so already. Confess that we are rivals. Be frank, since you say frankness is a sign of strength. You told me you were not her lover and should never be; but look into the depths of your heart and see if you are sure for the future; then you can tell me if I am in your path, and if from to-day we are friends or enemies."

"You ask me a rather delicate question," replied he; "but I will not delay my answer. I never lie to myself or to others. I shall never be jealous of Cecilia, for I shall never be in love with her unless she first loves me, which is as probable as that the duchess will become sincere and old Boccaferri sober."

"And why not, Celio? If, unfortunately for me, Cecilia should see and hear you now, she might well be moved, trembling, wavering. . . ."

"If I saw her wavering, moved and trembling, I should flee, Salentini, I give you my word of honor. I know too well what it is to profit by a moment of excitement, to take women by surprise. Not so would I be loved by a woman like Cecilia; I should find no glory nor delight in such a love, because she is sincere and fruitful; she would not hide from me her shame or her tears, and instead of pleasure I should only bestow and receive sorrow and remorse. No, not thus would I win a pure woman; and as I only seek excitement, I shall woo only those who give it. Are you satisfied?"

"Not yet, my friend. Nothing proves that Cecilia does not love you deeply, and that the friendship she professes for you is not love, which she hides even from herself. If it is so, you will find it out some day, and when you do you will dispute her with me?"

"Yes, certainly, sir," answered Celio, unhesitatingly; "and since you love her, you must know that her love will be no light thing. . . . But in such a case, my friend," added he, seized by a sad emotion which clouded his expressive face, "I beg you to fight with me. I might be killed, for I fight badly. I excelled in my fencing lessons; but in presence of a real adversary I am agitated, anger carries me away, and I am always wounded. My death would save Cecilia from my love. So do not fail me if we should ever come to such a pass. But now let us breakfast, laugh, and be friends, for I am sure that she only considers me a child, and I only see in her an old friend; so, if this goes on so, I shall not take offence. . . . But you will marry her? Otherwise I could fight coolly, and surely kill you, depend upon it."

"Good!" answered I. "These words of yours prove to me what she is, and this respect for virtue in one who pretends to be vicious would drive me to marriage with closed eyes."

We shook hands and our breakfast was merry. I was full of hope and trust; I cannot tell why, for Mademoiselle Boccaferri had gone; I did not know when or where we should meet again, and she had never even given me a look which could make me believe she loved me. Was I infatuated? No, I really loved. My conversation with Celio strengthened my belief in the merit I had guessed at the night before. Love enlarges the soul and purifies the air which reaches it. It was my first true love; I felt happy, young and strong; everything about me was colored with a livelier, purer radiance.

"Do you know of what I have been dreaming lately," said Celio, "and which returns to me more seriously since my fiasco? To go and pass a few weeks, perhaps months, in some quiet, secluded corner with foolish Boccaferri and his sensible daughter. Together they possess the secret of Art; each represents a separate phase. The father is particularly inventive and impulsive—the daughter eminently conscientious and learned; for Cecilia is a great musician; the public do not imagine it, and you probably know nothing of it. But I can tell you that she perhaps is the last great musician Italy may boast. She understands the great composers more than any new singer now in vogue. If she sings in the chorus, with her voice that can hardly be heard, all go on smoothly without dreaming that she alone keeps together and rules the rest by her mere intelligence, while the strength of her lungs has nothing to do with it. They feel it, but say nothing. What favorites of the public would own the supremacy of talent which is never applauded? Go to the theatre to-night and you will see how the opera goes on. The void made by Cecilia's absence will be a little noticed. Of course they will not say what causes this lack of harmony and of united movement. It may be the hoarseness of this one, the distraction of another; the singers will blame the orchestra, and vice versa. But I, who shall look on to-night, shall laugh at the general confusion and say to myself: 'Foolish public, you had a treasure and never understood it! Is it roudades you desire? There are plenty. Are you satisfied? Strive to know what you do want; until then, I observe and rest myself.'"

"You teach me nothing new, Celio. Only last night I quarrelled with the duchess de — about the superior and elevated talent of Mademoiselle Boccaferri."

"But the duchess cannot understand that," answered Celio, with a shrug of the shoulders. "She is no more artist than my old shoe; and a person must be extremely well versed in such matters to recognize merits which are buried under a perpetual fiasco, for that is Cecilia's fate. When she renders the most insignificant parts of her rôle, like a mistress of her art, four or five true dilettanti scattered about in the vast theatre smile with wondrous delight. A few half-way musicians say: 'What beautiful music! How finely it is written!' without remembering that they could not notice such perfections in the detail of a great thing, if the seconda donna was not a great artist. So goes the world, Salentini. As for me, I want to astonish, and I seek success with all my will, but it is to revenge myself upon the public, which I detest, and to despise it still more. I mistook the means, but I shall find them with the aid of Boccaferri and his daughter, and myself above all. I must perfect myself like a true artist; it will not take long; each year to me is equal to ten years of common life; for I am energetic and persistent. When I shall have found out what I needed, then I shall know what the public needs to understand true merit. I shall succeed in being infinitely worse than I was yesterday, and so shall please infinitely more. Such is my theory. Do you understand?"

"I understand how false it is, and that if you do not seek the true and beautiful that you may teach it to the public, thinking that falsehood will please them, you will never possess the truth. You can never do both. No one can make a grimace without wrinkling even the most beautiful face. Take care; you have gone all wrong and will ruin yourself."

"But look at Cecilia's example," cried Celio, warmly. "Does she not possess the truth in her? Does she not persist in only giving truth to the public? and is she not misunderstood and unknown? You need not say that she lacks strength and fire. For only two days since I heard her sing and declaim alone to four walls, not knowing that I listened. The atmosphere burned with her passion; she uttered tones which might make a crowd thrill and start like one man. Yet she does not scorn the public, only she does not love it. She sings well before it for her own sake, without anger, passion, or boldness. The public remains deaf and cold; it claims first that one should trouble himself to please it, and I will; but it shall pay me well, for I will only give it the refuse of my passion and my knowledge, and that will be too good."

I could not soothe Celio. He drank a great deal of coffee, all the time swearing against the insipidity of Viennese coffee. He strove to get more excited. The anger of his failure came back to him with fresh bitterness. I reminded him of his affairs at the theatre, and thither he went, after appointing a rendezvous for the evening at my house.

[To be continued.]

(From the New York Musical Times.)

Sketch of the Conservatory of Paris.

PART III.

I must now add a few words on the Pensionnat. I use this term, because it has no synonym in English. The Pensionnat is not a boarding-school. It is used here to mean that part of the Conservatory in which the male singers, twelve or fifteen in number, are supported and instructed gratuitously. It is of them I shall speak, whenever I mention the male singers in this narrative. No other male members of the classes of singing are allowed to reside in the establishment. They are severally confined, and never permitted to go out and wander about the streets, without a written permission from the director. They are subject to a rigorous discipline, the violation of which is followed by the exclusion of the transgressor. They are only allowed to take a walk on Sunday. Formerly, female subjects were received in the Pensionnat; but some abuses and reasons of morality have induced the Government to suppress the female branch, and girls are now admitted into the classes of singing, as day-scholars only.

I have now given all the details concerning the Conservatory that will interest the general reader, and it only remains for me, in conclusion, to say a few words about the great man who stamped his name on the National Conservatory of France: that man is CHERUBINI.

I do not intend to write Cherubini's biography; that has already been done by abler hands. I need not speak of his mighty genius; that is universally acknowledged. He has no rival in the art of fugueing; on the sacred harp he is equal to Mozart, and has left Haydn far behind him. My design here is to speak of the man, and the reader will doubtless be pleased with some particulars concerning him, which I gathered in my social intercourse in Paris, from friends who are artists, and some of whom are Cherubini's relations.

Cherubini's poverty in Paris and the Conservatory was as proverbial as that of the Grecian Aristides. About 1816 or 1817, after his return from London, where he had been called in 1815, he found himself greatly injured by the political changes which had taken place in the French Government, and he retired from his employments in disgust. After a while, it was acknowledged that the Government had dealt wrongly with him, and to make amends, he was appointed Professor of Composition in the Conservatory and Chapel Master to the King, or rather, to use the term of the time, Director to the King's Music Chapel. But, learning that, before he could enter upon the duties of the latter office, his friend Lesueur would have to be discharged from the directorship of the Music Chapel, in which he had been maintained after the downfall of Napoleon, Cherubini (who at that time was miserably poor), unhesitatingly and peremptorily declined the office, which he said, was so satisfactorily filled by his friend. All possible means were used to prevail upon him to take the position, but he was unshaken in his resolution. At length it was decided that both Lesueur and Cherubini should share the charge of the King's music; and, on such terms, Cherubini accepted the office; and both these most honorable artists continued in this employment till 1830, at which time, to the great detriment of the art, the King's Chapel fell with the dynasty, and has never been, and, perhaps, never will be restored.

Cherubini, though warm-hearted, was of a serious and stern disposition. He was never found laughing or even smiling in his intercourse with the pupils. He was always in earnest, and had no time for frivolity. He inflexibly insisted upon the observation of the regulations of "his house," as he called the Conservatory. Every professor, previous to the opening of his class, was obliged to sign a book, called "le registre de presence," in order to show that the members of his class were all present and taught by him. Cherubini never failed to examine daily the register, that he might know whether every one's task had been fulfilled. But he required no more from others than he performed himself; he attended to all the duties of his station with exemplary exactness and promptitude. At ten o'clock in the morning, he regularly sat at his bureau, either writing or answering letters, sending orders to the classes, or hearing the professors and pupils, or any other person, who might occasionally call upon him. When he had to dispatch a letter, summons, or message of any kind, he rang a little bell which was always near at hand, and a servant, who was always attending at the door of his cabinet, immediately presented himself uncovered, to know what was wanted and to perform what was commanded. When the business of his charge was over, you would find Cherubini copying either the parts of one of his own scores, which was to be performed, or writing out the score of some great master. His wife, on a certain occasion, asked him what profit he could get from such copies:—"Oh!" said he, "there is always some good to be got from them, which remains in one's mind." His favorite employment in moments of leisure, was drawing and cutting flowers, of which he was exceedingly fond, or classifying plants, for he was very conversant with botany. He was most patient in writing his own scores; if by chance a drop of ink fell on the paper, he immediately took a penknife, cut round the mark, and adapted another piece of paper to the place with such skill that it was impossible to discover the place of the blunder. In consequence of so much care, his scores were so neatly done, that no printing could rival them in clearness and beauty. At twelve o'clock Cherubini left his bureau, and then was engaged in reviewing the classes or other parts of the establishment; at two o'clock he went home, and his day's business was ended.

Cherubini was, par excellence, a classical man, not in his works only, but in his tastes, habits, and manners; and when he judged another's productions, he could not rid himself of the influence of the principles which ruled him when writing. This caused him to err on many occasions in the appreciation of modern masters. It will hardly be believed, that such a great man, so well fitted to judge rightly in musical matters, on first witnessing the performance of Beethoven's Symphonies, exclaimed:—"It is impossible to understand all this, it is a mere devergoudage." I use the French word, and don't know of any synonym in English. He had forgotten the saying of a celebrated French poet:

"Souvent un beau disordre est un effet de l'art."

He changed his opinion afterwards, and became an admirer of the great Symphonist.

Cherubini could not bear the music of Berlioz, —he had the the most profound aversion for it. This, perhaps, was also owing to the above-mentioned disposition. Berlioz from the very first time he was brought before the public, evinced the most evident desertion of the classical school. He affected to transfer to music, and especially to the Symphony, a genius which was in fashion in the literature of the time, the domantisme. The domantisme! which was a heresy in the opinion of Cherubini. Berlioz, though not to be compared with Beethoven, is certainly a man of talent and the first Symphonist in France. One day, Cherubini crossing the yard of the Conservatory, joined a group who were speaking of the performance of Berlioz, which had taken place some days before. Each person, occupying a different point of view, expressed a different opinion. Cherubini listened without uttering a word. At length one of the group remarked that Berlioz was an inveterate enemy to fugue and fugue writers; "Yes," said Cherubini, "Mr. Berlioz hates fugue, but fugue hates him still more,"—every one present laughed heartily at so unexpected a reply, and so did Berlioz himself when he heard it.

Cherubini was endowed with a manly genius; his strain is always broad, round, and soaring heavenward, leaving the earth at an immeasurable distance below. And this manliness of style and freshness of creation did not abandon him even when near to his grave. His second Requiem, which was his last work, ranked among his masterpieces, though composed in the 79th or 80th year of his age. Although his body bent under so great a weight of years, yet his eye was full of fire, his face full of majesty, his forehead full of brightness. It was delightful to contemplate his curled, silver hair, which thickly covered his head, and played beautifully round his ears and temples.

Many statements have been circulated in relation to his second Requiem. It has been said that Cherubini composed it for his obsequies. This is a mistake. The facts, according to the most authentic authorities are simply these. In France, female singers are excluded from Catholic churches, although they are admitted in the Chapel of the restored Dynasty, because it was considered as a private building with which authorities had nothing to do. It is well known that Cherubini's first Requiem was composed for the funeral of the ill-fated Duc de Berry; and as it was to be performed by the members of the King's Chapel, the soprano parts were written throughout for first and second soprano, for the performance of which Cherubini availed himself of the female singers attached to the Chapel. This Requiem was generally pronounced equal to Mozart's Requiem, and everywhere it was crowned with great success. In many instances at the decease of persons of distinction, the performance of Cherubini's Requiem was desired, but not permitted because of the exclusion of female singers from churches. Annoyed by such vexations, Cherubini determined to compose a new Requiem for male voices only, and the result was the second Requiem;—which, indeed, was first performed at the obsequies of the author himself. This composition closed the artistical career of this celebrated master. He departed this life in the 84th year of his age; and his soul rose up to heaven, to keep her seat by the side of Bach, Handel, Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven.

A Sunday in a German Church.

[We take the following chapter from Mr. RICHARD STORRS WILLIS's very interesting and instructive little book, entitled "Our Church Music," of which we shall have more to say ere long.]

I once found myself in one of the cities of central Germany. The leading Protestant Church of the place had been closed for some months, while undergoing repairs, and meanwhile the Roman Catholics, with a liberality of feeling sometimes met with in that country, had thrown open their magnificent edifice to the worship of the Protestants, the Protestant service immediately succeeding the ordinary morning service of the Catholics. The only change made was the concealment of the altar by a curtain dropped from the ceiling. In front of this curtain was a temporary desk for the clergyman.

On a Sunday morning I entered this cathedral, upon the front of which was inscribed in imposing capitals the solemn word, DEO. The immense edifice was crowded with worshippers. The Duke and his court (a Protestant house) were present, occupying a separate tribune on the side of the pulpit. The body of the edifice was filled, promiscuously, with garrison troops, citizens, and peasantry from the surrounding country in their picturesque national costumes. The introductory voluntary was just commencing. The powerful organ, which seemed to have its place near the altar, and was concealed by a curtain, was crowding every arch and corner of the immense pile with its massive harmonies. The air around us was a sea of music; its rich surges broke majestically on the vaulted roof, and echoed among the lofty arches, and beat solemnly upon the silent heart.

Meanwhile the assembled multitude had found the first hymn, which, as usual in German churches, was indicated upon tablets, placed at convenient intervals upon the wall. And now the rich tone-masses of the organ gradually merged into the familiar strain of an old church choral. At this well-known signal the great assembly, from the sovereign to the peasant, arose. The introductory strain of the organ ceased, and a trumpet behind the veil led off in clear, courageous tones the choral melody, sustained by full organ accompaniment. Simultaneously with this, a chorus of a thousand voices rolled up from the congregation in a mighty song of praise to Jehovah—a song which the lofty roof seemed scarce capable of repressing—majestic, soul-thrilling.

As the last echoes of this choral hallelujah died upon the ear, a clergyman, who until now had not been seen, advanced and pronounced, in a deep-toned and solemn voice, the opening prayer. He retired, and again, unheralded except by the invisible organ, the thousand-voiced chorus swelled to the skies. The sermon immediately succeeded, brief and impressive; then a closing choral was sung, and after the benediction the cathedral doors were once more thrown open to the congregation; while the parting tones of the organ followed us as we passed into the outer world, like sacred memories of the hour.

Now, here was a combination of singularly felicitous circumstances, and which afford us, I think, some valuable hints as to Church Music.

1st. The machinery of the music was concealed. Here was no twitching of curtains by the choir; no preparatory whisper and flutter, and turning of leaves; no clearing of throats, no obtrusion of personalities in any way upon the audience.

2d. The act of worship was simultaneous and seemingly spontaneous. The clergyman did not announce, and then recite, preparatorily, the invocation to Jehovah about to be made. Why should an invocation to the Supreme Being be recited before-hand?

3d. All united, from a common level of devotion—prince, priest and people. There was no unnecessary personal intervention; each soul bore its humble, individual part in the common worship; and, moreover, with the greatest reverence and earnestness—a feature so unusual in our churches at home, and yet so common abroad! A very observable thing, also, was the utter unconsciousness of each worshipper—both of the observation of others and of any possible effect produced by his music.

I do not claim for this example of congregational singing, that it could be copied in every particular, or that it were desirable so to do: many of the circumstances mentioned were incidental: but the unanimous participation in the service, and the withdrawal of all unnecessary personality, were parts of a well-considered system.

It is evident that in our present Church Music we greatly lack purity of style. We should clearly distinguish between the different forms of church song, and the purpose each is best calculated to subserve. An ornamental and impressive style of music, as legitimately represented by choir performances, we should never confound with a devotional style, as represented by congregational singing. Let us act intelligently, when we act at all. Let us not thwart our church devotions, by making them the responsibility of a few, whose only realized responsibility is the music. Let us not, on the other hand, impede the development of high musical Art, by attempting to make it ornamental and impressive, and, at the same time, congregationally simple and devotional.

We need to simplify the congregational style, and amplify the choir style. Our present choir music is too difficult, and on too extended a vocal scale for the mass of worshippers, on the one hand, and too cramped and hampered for the glories of sacred Art on the other. A short tune of four lines, which, in itself, is but half of a legitimate melody, (a completed melody consisting of eight,) is but very insignificant material to work with, in an Art whose resources are boundless as those of music.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 26, 1856.

The Prize Songs—The Award.

The New York Musical Review of Saturday announces the result of the voting of its subscribers for the two best songs among the eight selected by a committee and published in successive numbers of that journal. The first prize of Two hundred dollars has been awarded to Mr. OTTO DRESEL, of Boston, for Song No. 1, to Tennyson's words: "Sweet and low, wind of the western sea." Mr. CHARLIE C. CONVERSE, of New York, takes the second prize, of One hundred dollars, for Song No. 4, entitled "My gentle Mother's Song." This announcement in the Review is accompanied with the following statement of facts and gratulatory reflections on the enterprise:

While the number of votes received has been small in comparison to the large list of our subscribers—smaller indeed by far than we anticipated—they come to us from all parts of the country, and in sufficient number to give a true indication of the opinion of the majority of those to whose decision the award was submitted.

The Song No. 1, by Mr. Dresel, to which is awarded the first prize, has received about twice as many votes as either of its competitors. The Song No. 4, by Mr. Converse, to which the prize of $100 is awarded has received nearly three times as many votes as either of the others with exception of No. 1. The song which has received the least number of votes, (one only,) is No. 5, 'The Baby,' a song which is by no means the least meritorious of the eight.

It is no wonder that this enterprise should have caused much excitement amongst artists, amateurs, and critics; no wonder that many comments have been made upon the merits and demerits of the songs; and last, not least, no wonder that some of our kind friends of the musical press should have pronounced the whole set (of course, always with exception of one or two) decided trash. Now, this last symptom of sympathy from artists and critics is such a common thing with regard to prize-songs and prize compositions in general, that we should have wondered very much if the contrary had occurred. In fact, we do not think that there ever were prize compositions of any kind that were not declared by some bad, and by others indifferent. But has this necessary diversity of opinion prevented the small or great amount of artistic benefit which was derived from them? Certainly not; for when time has removed the excitement and bad blood which the award of prizes had necessarily created amongst the unfortunate competitors and their friends; when a calmer reflection has produced a more just opinion, at least something good has been discovered where before nothing was found but want of merit, or even that which was positively bad. It has been said that to award prizes for compositions is of no use to art itself. One of the German papers lately had a long article upon this subject, and Mr. Dwight has repeated it. With regard to our prize-songs this is certainly not true; for the "very fine song," the "real work of art," of the eight, which, according to Mr. Dwight, would, if awarded a prize, "do true service to the cause of music as an art," has received the first prize. But even if our subscribers had voted for two others of the songs, for instance, for No. 7 or No. 5, there would have been exhibited on their part no want of appreciation for good music. For both songs are meritorious; No. 7 as much so as any of the whole set. In fact, each of the songs, if viewed in the remembrance that musical culture of a higher order is rather of recent date in this country, may claim some merit for itself.

We could not have expected that every competitor should write in the style of Schubert, Schumann, and Franz. If every song of the eight had shown this character, America would be the most advanced musical country of the age. We have no glorious past of our own in this kind of composition, and it would be folly to presume that we were ripe enough to commence where the Germans arrived only at a very late period of the history of their musical art. But that we have offered some good songs, in spite of the little which has been done here in this field, is already a very good sign, and must be attributed to nothing else but the fact that we offered prizes of two hundred and one hundred dollars for the two best songs. If we had not tendered this encouragement to our artists, the public would have been deprived not only of the benefit of their efforts, but also of the opportunity of showing its own soundness of judgment and knowledge of the matter. That we have afforded this opportunity is a just source of pride and satisfaction to ourselves. When we started the idea of making subscribers judges over the songs, there were many who feared that the votes would not be a very flattering testimonial of the state of musical art in this country. But we had a better trust in the progress that art has made within a few years; we even thought that our own efforts in this journal for the cause of good music would not have been without some influence upon the large number of our readers. The result of the vote shows that we thought aright, and we may now say with some propriety that our enterprise has been crowned with a glorious success—a success not only as regards the benefit of musical art, but also as a triumphant justification of our desire to test the musical knowledge of our country in a just and appropriate manner.

In another place the Review says:—"This award of the first prize, however unexpected, will no doubt be highly satisfactory to Dwight's Journal of Music, and give its editor a much better opinion of the vox populi than he has hitherto professed," and then adds: "How about the 'real interests of Art, of music in America,' now?"

The result (in the case of the first prize) is certainly as satisfactory to us as it was unexpected and indeed altogether strange. And this it may be without altering our opinion of the vox populi as arbiter in such a competition, or weakening the ground we took in regard to prize compositions generally, and these prize songs in particular. We did not think, no one who feels the difference between what is Art and what is not Art, thought, that the best song would win the prize. We are happy that the result is so much better than we dared predict. We enjoy it none the less, that the strangest freak of Fortune's wheel is where it coincides for once with right and reason. The confession of the Review, a few days before the award, that so far the best song had received the fewest votes of any, did not of course tend to remove our scepticism;—or was that a sheer piece of waggery to draw us more completely into the pleasant little trap? Enjoy your joke, good gentlemen! for after all it is a joke, and it is perhaps answer enough to your question: "How now about the interests of Art?" that we enjoy it with you.

In reconsidering Mr. Dresel's song, we do find in it certain elements of popularity. In the first place a melody, sweet, simple, easily fastening itself in the memory, easily sung, and separable enough from its artistic and quite difficult piano accompaniment to satisfy the untaught love of mere melody, though to an appreciating taste accompaniment and melody make up one vital and inseparable whole. In the next place, the subject, a lullaby, and Tennyson's sweet words, were of a kind always popular. This may account for the large vote in its favor, without implying any hocus pocus. Yet that in a land where $20,000 have been made upon the sale of "Old Folks at home," where publishers grow rich on "Negro melodies," and are ever readier to buy the copyright of some stale, imitative, commonplace, sentimental ditty, which sells only because it is not new, but runs in the same old well-worn channels of a humdrum melody, than they are that of a really new and true work of Art;—that in such a land, the majority of the subscribers, in town and country, to a popular journal, should select the artistic, poetic and refined song in preference to others more after the type of those that sell, is, to say the least, anomalous. Happy should we be to see such anomaly become the rule; and if the Messrs. MASON BROTHERS, by their prizes and their Musical Review, will make it so, they shall have credit among the greatest benefactors to the cause of musical Art in our wide country.

But let us look a little farther. How is it as regards the second prize? And here we find what we were about to say anticipated by an exchange paper, which we just took up. "It is a little remarkable," says the Worcester Palladium, "that the two best songs should have received, one the largest, and the other the smallest number of votes." We are quite of the opinion of this writer that decidedly the second best song (though we may see it at a greater distance from the first best,) is that poor No. 5, "The Baby," which got only one vote! At all events, as the Review itself seems well aware, the real question lay between that and the No. 7, only that the two songs are of so different a character that they are not easily compared. One or two others should we place above the successful "Mother's Song," which certainly is commonplace enough, in melody and accompaniment, and has a prelude (recurring as symphony and conclusion) of the most senseless, awkward kind, an empty period of three bars complete in itself, with a full cadence. But we did not intend to enter into any special criticism of the songs; there will be time enough for that when Mr. Richardson shall have published his revised edition of the eight. We shall cheerfully qualify somewhat, in some instances, the judgment we first passed on them collectively. Enough for the present for the vindication of our distrust in the popular vote, that it has signally failed in the other cases, if it did guess right in the first. So the exception only proves the rule; the result of the balloting helps not our unbelief, from which we should be thankful to be quite delivered, because it is most pleasant to believe that what is best is also the most popular.

We said: "If there were any certainty that the one really fine song would win the general vote, then indeed would a true service be done to Art." This result, as we have seen, proves not that certainty. Yet we gladly recognize some good to Art in the award of the first prize. It draws attention to a good song, and leads to a comparison of it with the others, which cannot fail to be somewhat instructive. The little factitious excitement about these songs will provoke much sharp and careful criticism, such as our native efforts in this line have not often been exposed to. In this the publishers of the Review are right. But these benefits are not incidental solely to the popular vote system. A more competent jury would inspire nobler competition, ensure more just awards, and lend the matter all the éclat it now has. And still we fall back upon our first general position, based on the world's experience, that prize products of all kinds, especially in music, do somehow, as a general rule, bear the stamp of mediocrity. Genius finds not its best inspirations in such competitions. We said, it rarely happens that the best work was written for the prize; and so, we chance to know, it was in the case of this first prize song. It dropped into the competition without much serious purpose of competing; and no one could have been so much surprised at the result as was the author. Again, on the other hand, this very song, although so beautiful and so artistic, and so much above the others, is by no means a great song, nor what a composer of such gifts might be expected to regard as more than a happy little chance inspiration. Nor can we see that the published fruits of the competition, with this exception, are much better on the whole than we have been getting through the ordinary channels.

Is Art, then, the gainer by this enterprise? It has given distinction to one good song; it has hung a poor one in almost the same favorable light; it has cast another good one wholly in the shade, comparatively, while collectively it has surrounded good, bad, and indifferent with about the same éclat. We have above shown how Art may incidentally derive some gain from it; but is it so sure that the weeds do not thrive equally, or even faster, under the same warm sun?

A New Composition by Satter.

Two weeks ago we took occasion to remark, under the heading of "Superlatives," upon the extraordinary disposition in the press of this country to heap the highest eulogistic epithets upon all sorts of musical artists. We quoted specimens from certain extravagant eulogies or "puffs" upon such artists as OLE BULL, GOTTSCHALK and WILLIAM MASON; and pointed out the wrong done by that kind of talk to Art, to the musical public, as well as to these really distinguished artists themselves. All who read the article, or who will take the trouble to refer to it, will find in it not one word or hint against those gentlemen themselves, as artists or as men. For further illustration, we were reminded of certain very frank and piquant "Letters from Boston," written to the New York Musical World by GUSTAVE SATTER, the pianist, largely taken up in praise of his own concerts here, and in magnificent professions of the uncompromising pride and dignity of high Art; also of a "Biography" of the said Satter, conceived in very much the same tone, but which we did not declare to be an auto-biography, or even hint the possibility of such a thing, although it is indeed difficult to see where most of the materials could come from, unless from the modest young man himself. What we did was to contrast these lofty artistic claims with certain familiar clap-trap performances. We hoped that he might profit by the lesson, for that he has talent no one will deny. But in the last number of the Musical World, his letter is addressed to us, and is a composition of so strange a character, that we do not wonder it "surprised" and mystified our good friend RICHARD WILLIS, the editor of the said World. Perhaps it also furnished him a new phase of his Boston correspondence. We will now copy both Mr. Willis's introduction, and Mr. Satter's incoherent mess of boyish rage and nonsense. First Mr. Willis:

A SURPRISE.

We were thoroughly aroused from our editorial repose the other day by the reception of the letter herewith appended. Our excellent friends Dwight and Dresel of Boston appear in some manner (unknown and uncomprehended as yet of ourselves) sensitively to have come into collision with Satter the artist.

Mr. Satter, as our subscribers are aware, has been furnishing for the N. Y. Musical World a series of letters from Boston over his own signature. These letters (it must be acknowledged) have been exceedingly written by Satter. That is, with a frankness and ingenuousness by us inexperienced before, Satter has written a weekly critique of his own concerts, a very successful series of which has just closed. This was something new; this was something piquant—to our subscribers, doubtless, as well as to ourselves.)

* * * * *
Touching the biographical sketch of Mr. Satter, to which allusion is made, we received it (as we stated in the brief introduction) accompanied by a letter from the Boston admirers of this artist and a request for publication. It was interesting as furnishing statistics of an up-coming celebrity, and as such we published it.

As to any unworthy inducements for a publication of the same, we feel as confident that Mr. Dwight has insinuated nothing of the kind as that he would never think it of us. We say this anticipatively, our copy of his journal not having yet come to hand, and we being still ignorant of the entire grievance of our irate correspondent.

Mr. Satter (whom we have never yet had the pleasure of seeing, except once across a concert room,) is an artist of decided ability. His enemies even, (if he has any,) will willingly concede this. It is a pity, we think, that an artistic vitality which must inevitably make its own way, should be impeded in its progress by exterior personal animosities, so foreign to the spirit of Art and so injurious to an artistic nature.

But let not Mr. Satter think that Mr. Dwight has any other than a pure motive in what he says and does; all the world believes this of Dwight. And as to Otto Dresel, he is a veritably true artist; though he does (it must be confessed,) sometimes, in his conscientiousness, unnecessarily tread upon the toes of people. But this is coupled with so true and uncompromising a fidelity to high Art, as he understands it, that they afterwards make it a point to forgive him; as (if he has sought against him) Satter must do.

We herewith present the letter, then, without any emendations of Mr. Satter's English, which, for a foreigner, he certainly writes remarkably well. The tone of the communication is an unaccustomed one in our columns, but as the casus belli apparently originated in the N. Y. Musical World, we cannot deny Mr. Satter a hearing.

This is courteous, kind and reasonable. Our friend does only justice to the motive of our article; and of course we need not assure him that any suspicion of "unworthy inducements" in his insertion of the "Biography" was the thing farthest from our thoughts. What we did suspect was, that he was possibly taking too much upon trust, as all amiable natures will. When we remarked that "Mr. Satter might well pray to be delivered from his friends," we meant of course the friends who flatter his vanity and write such biographies of him to send to unsuspecting editors.

One other point in the above requires remark. Why mix up the name of Mr. DRESEL in the matter? Surely he is in no way concerned in it. We wrote the article, and with no prompting and no aid from any one. From this jumble of Satter's, which seems to have misled Mr. Willis, as well as from like hints which have once or twice appeared in other quarters, there would seem to be a notion in the heads of certain persons—we know not how many or how they came by it—that OTTO DRESEL, the pianist, is part editor or manager of Dwight's Journal of Music. Let it be understood, once for all, that that gentleman has not and never has had any interest or part whatever in the conduct of this paper. That we can count him among our friends, that we owe much to him both as an artist and a wise judge and teacher of his art, we should be ungrateful to deny; and that it is our duty, as our pleasure, as one who would do somewhat to improve the public taste, to learn what we can from him, as from all other greater or lesser lights in the divine art, is what no sane mind will dispute. Surely of all the musicians with whom we have had to do, no one has taken less pains to forestall the good impression of our columns. Now for Mr. Satter:

AN OPEN LETTER TO J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR OF THE JOURNAL OF MUSIC, BOSTON.

If a man whose merits are comparatively nothing, in the line which he pursues, has the meanness to deny laurels to an artist who sacrificed his whole life to one and the same object, and who earned these very laurels, not from the pre or post-paid editorials of any paper, but from public opinion, we must consider such proceedings as the mere result of want of education; for an editor cannot envy an artist, though he may hurt him, and an artist, if he is one, will never care for a single man's opinion, though this man may have a letter-press, a printer, or a compositor. But if this very man is acknowledged the "head puffer" of his friends, and laughed at for this very reason by many intelligent people, and he fights for criticism, and raises a flag of defiance against those upon whose protection he chiefly depends, then, I say, this very man appears in a very different light, and he becomes an odium for Art and Artists. I have nothing at all against J. S. Dwight as a man, but as an editor I declare him incompetent for any musical paper. My friend W. H. Fry has defended himself and his talent; so shall I. But not only me alone; but not only Ole Bull, Gottschalk and William Mason; but not only pianists and violinists; but the whole world of artists. I have the satisfaction to prove plainly and to show that there is one man left in this world who will never bow to the good graces of an editor, as this man knows—that most of those men who raise a paper have only one object in view, money, and that J. S. Dwight complained very bitterly, a short time ago, about the non-payment of his subscribers.

1. I hereby declare that the biography which my friend Willis kindly published has been inserted without my knowledge, and without any pecuniary, friendly, or otherwise shaped arrangements. If R. S. Willis considers me a man of merit, or if my Boston friends do, all right; if not, all right too. But I earnestly hope that Willis will keep the manuscript of this biography, and show it to any one who is acquainted with my hand writing. If R. S. Willis had taken any pay for it from me, he would probably despise me as much as I would him; and if R. S. Willis has published this article from a feeling of esteem, I thank him sincerely. And at last, this biography has not given me a heartfelt delight for one very heavy reason, viz: that there appears a certain kind of blame against my honored and beloved parents, who have ever wished and acted for my best, although they may have been mistaken in the way to do it. Family struggles should never appear as a matter of publicity, and I earnestly hope that the author of my biography, kindly and nobly as he meant it, may never cherish any bad feelings in and against his own family.

2. Gottschalk enjoyed a great reputation, long before J. S. Dwight thought of enjoying the editorship of a paper, and William Mason will be a fine and thoroughbred artist, despite all the Dwights in the world. If the Musical Review says, that "Gottschalk is the jeweller and Mason the Gothic architect, and that it is a comparison of the art of Cellini to that of Angelo," the Musical Review does not say, that these two artists are Cellini and Angelo. Gottschalk and Mason do at all events infinitely better in their way than J. S. Dwight in his, for they are modest, at least in a certain degree. They do not attempt to do anything beyond their sphere, and their success is sure; I wish I could say the same of J. S. Dwight.

If anything may beat J. S. Dwight in his protestations against florid language and flaming show-bills, take his own criticisms of my concert in Boston last year, and you will find a perfect description of the four seasons, of crispness and new words; or still later, read his inspired exertions for Otto Dresel, a music teacher here in Boston, who must at least be another Beethoven, Bach, Schumann and Robert Franz, (all four together), "neglected in Germany and first appreciated here," if I am "Another Mozart." And if anything may beat the veracity or more plainly said, the truth of J. S. Dwight's writings, take his criticism of my "Six Morceaux de Concert" which he describes as six little pieces, whilst three of them are not yet published at all, and among these three there is not one less than eighteen pages long, and among these three again there are the Lore-Romances dedicated to my friend Hector Berlioz, and which I consider my very best composition.

4. J. S. Dwight says: "What becomes of the honor of those wreaths and flowers at the Musical Convention Concerts, when it is known that it was by variations upon Yankee Doodle, Hail Columbia, etc., that they were won?" Is J. S. Dwight an American or not? Is he ashamed to listen to the hymns of his country? Does he pretend to be a musical Benedict Arnold? Does J. S. Dwight know, that I got the wreath at the Convention Concerts after the performance of my Sonata in F sharp major? And if he does not know it, how can he be bold enough, to utter such a falsehood in public, and insult at the same time those, who admired my composition? Does J. S. Dwight know, that Europe loves its national airs quite as well as America? And finally, does Mr. Dwight know, that Liszt, Dreyshock, Thalberg and Schulhoff played more English, Russian, French and Austrian national airs in their concerts, than fugues of Bach or Sonatas of Beethoven?

5. J. S. Dwight says: "How does the 'unrelenting hostility to humbug' comport with the announcement to play at a lottery Gift Concert in New Hampshire!" These words are the alliest, that ever man spoke, and though I never believed much in Dwight's logic, I did not think that he was quite so flat. If Dwight means, that "humbug" has to do with the concert, let him write to the managers, and tell them to stop the lottery: but that Mr. D. gives me the blame for playing there, is not half as mean as it is ridiculous. I know, that Mr. D. is very amiable towards any one, who subscribes with $2.00 for his paper, and that he never asks the persons, whether they are from Boston or from the Feejee-islands: why should not I play for my friends, who pay me fifty or a hundred dollars for fifty or a hundred minutes entertainment? I am not so aristocratic and so silly, as to believe, that a farmer's dollar is less worth than even Rothschild's dollar, and the very fact that I played already three times in the same place in N. H. shows, that people like me. What do I care for the rest? How perfectly ridiculous it is, to stick to a certain clique, and to attack innocent little artists, who have quite as capacious a stomach as Mr. D., and even a better one, doomed as they are, to swallow the Schoolstreet pills!

6. As to ridiculing Ole Bull, Mr. D. ought to be ashamed of himself. Let Mr. D. write twenty columns a year about the incompetency of "such lonely, forlorn, miserable critters" as Gottschalk, Mason and Satter, and these poor individuals will curse their unlucky fate. But let Ole Bull alone, for Heaven's sake! Ole Bull.....J. S. Dwight!! The Great Spirit.....an Indian serenade!! Ole Bull's name will sound through the world and through generations, when every single copy of Dwight's Journal of Music shall have perished: and to prevent that, Mr. D. must assume a very different course with artists, like Ole Bull, Gottschalk, Mason and Satter, whose company should be his greatest delight, whose support his greatest pride.

7. Mr. D. seems rather to be a spy of American musical matters under German pay, than anything else. Instead of rejoicing at the growth, at the grandeur of Art in his country, he cries over it. He says: "To judge from the newspaper musical notices from all parts of the land, which fall under the eye of one in our position (who, Mr. D. or Mr. Dresel?) there is no country on the globe which at the present moment possesses so many transcendent and inimitable artists as our own." (Is Mr. D. sorry for it, or does he prefer an emigration of the Leipzig school of Germany to this independent country, where almost every musician and publisher has his own "Journal of Music," and praises his own publications, whilst he drags all the others in the mud!) And in another place: "Such extravagance of eulogy is the common staple of musical criticism in the amiable and independent press of these United States." (These United States, Sir, give you a good living, liberty and moral security; and this amiable and independent press is the very same who tried to get your Journal into circulation. And you, who are one of the press, allow advertisements to be inserted, which ought to make you blush to your very bones.)

And so I think, that Ole Bull, Gottschalk, Mason and I will do best, to thank you for your kind exertions, to ask for no further notices, to declare every single word that you write about us, valueless, and to pursue our own way with the idea, that whatever Dwight and Dresel may say, it will never be more or less than "Fiddle D. D."

GUSTAVE SATTER.

This surely calls for no reply or comment upon our part. We will only for the further amusement and instruction of the reader, append a few piquant extracts from the aforesaid "Boston Correspondence."

Some people told other people that my fantasies on Huguenots and Robert le Diable were not written by myself. Now, I have had until the present moment two ways to compose—for the publishers, and for use. Those in the first style I consider, myself, "mere trash," but I have the sorry satisfaction to say, that I just as truly made the last pieces as I promise never to write in the former style again.

The first of the series of three concerts under the title, "Philharmonic Soirées," comes off next Thursday, at the splendid and newly decorated rooms of Hallett, Davis & Co., and if you think that a man who feels tickled to death by seeing his subscription list over-filled, may write an impartial criticism of himself and the assisting artists, then, I say, I am very happy to tell you, with profound reverence: "My dear Willis, I am the man."

The receipts of the Beethoven Festival were appropriated to pay the expenses previously contracted in the six orchestral concerts, which did not quite meet the expectation of the founders. We think that more variety and the engagement of great artists would have done more credit to the managing committee. Indeed, if we except Mr. Wm. Mason, there was nobody worth noticing among the solo performers. Orchestral concerts ought not to serve as "encouraging opportunities" for friends and favorites, and if they have an object, it ought to be for composers, whose names are not a sufficient guarantee to give instrumental concerts on their own account.

Mr. Gustave Satter (poor me!) had his usual encore after having used the anvil of the Tyrannator and the imperial dresses of Ernani in a fantasia; and having commenced with "clap-trap," I persisted in clap-trapping, and "brass-banded" the Coronation March. I am so disgusted with playing this kind of music, that I wish all the time some strings would break, and I would send an apologizing "alter ego" on the stage; but Hallett & Davis's pianos are just as obstinate as can be, and whenever I intend to punish their firmness by a thirty-finger chord, all that people say is: "What a noble instrument!" and that ere piano grins at me most sarcastically, as if it wanted to reap all the laurels for itself, and leave for me the more interesting part of acknowledging its merits.

The first of the Philharmonic Soirées met with the most flattering success; there was such enthusiasm manifested for Beethoven and the undeserving writer of this epistle, that henceforth I do not envy the Crescent city for her plantation dances and their interpreters to large audiences.

My second piece, Fantasia on themes of Lohengrin and Tannhäuser, met with still more applause, and towards the close I was greeted with such an impetuous demonstration of satisfaction, lasting for about five minutes, that I gave for an encore my Transcription of the fourth act of the Prophet.

Perhaps some of your readers (particularly those who try to put a man down because they fear him,) think that there is a good deal of humbug or of arrogance about my editorials in favor of myself. Be it so. It is better to tell people how you get along in the world, and to knock down base calumniators by the strength of truth, than to rely upon the exertions of a vile mob, who tear a new pair of gloves to pieces every night for an oyster supper and an occasional drink. When I first made my appearance in New York, though it was rather an apparition, owing to the small number of evenings, I knew nobody, and according to my principles I went to no editor, no critic, to no professional man; for success which is due to a handsome pile of dollar bills or to a certain quantity of bows is no success. I trusted to my own facilities, to my energy, and to my will; and it came out just as I anticipated. Of course a few papers, startled by the novelty of such proceedings, threw occasional thorns among the three roses which I plucked in the concert rooms; but the fact that they alone blamed, and blamed continually, when the others gave vent to their utmost satisfaction in a body, convinced me that the gardener, who intended to spoil my flowers, did so because his roses lacked not the superiority in color, but the fragrance of mine. In Boston it amounted to the same thing. I came and conquered. Now the host of music teachers which crowd this city (I except some very honorable men,) burst almost with jealousy, and as they could not possibly attack the artist, they assailed the man. Exactly as in New York. But, although the eccentricities, oddities, educational faults, sins and unfavorable reports, which were lavished upon my little frame, are enough to fill two handsome royal octaves, it came otherwise than they thought, and the very man whose "stay could not possibly exceed a fortnight," has crowds of devoted friends, anxious to prove to him their love and esteem on every possible occasion. You know, my dear Willis, that your correspondent has never had the pleasure of your personal acquaintance, and it is something very queer not to know you; but principles and nothing but principles. Next fall I'll be happy to invite you to my New York concerts, provided you pay for your ticket; that is the only way to tell me what you think of my playing, truly and honestly.

The second Philharmonic Soirée came off on Thursday. If I merely observe, that a crowd of "bellies" completed the desired harmony of the evening, and that the attendance and the enthusiasm were equal to the preceding concert, I have said enough. A Fantasia of my composition on themes of Ernani gained applause, and a tumultuous encore. Stephen Heller's Sonata-Fantasia had a "succès d'estime." I answered to a general demand by playing one of my concert-studies, a kind of dreamy, up-and-down running piece, with occasional sighs, sobs and sufferings, fit for tender hearts, etc. After the greater part of the audience had left, a few kind and persevering friends led me again to the piano. I saw with great satisfaction the élite of Boston musicians assembled, and am happy to say, that they applauded just as good-naturedly, as did many of those whom their kind influence had secured to assist at my concerts.

The piano again was a splendid instrument: the rooms looked very elegantly, and the audience, which kept tolerably cool for the first six pieces, raised the thermometer to almost 150 degrees, when the delightful strains of Verdi began to obliterate the classic remembrances of Stephen Heller! As for me, I felt rather warm when I played Stephen Heller, and very much at my ease when I played Satter; there must be some close spiritual affinity between me and the latter gentleman.

The third and last of my Philharmonic Soirées came off at the Rooms of Messrs. Hallet, Davis & Co., last Wednesday, with the assistance of Miss Eliza Josselyn and Mr. B. J. Lang, pianists, Mr. A. Kreissmann and a chorus of twelve gentlemen, and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. Before I attempt my description of the concert, I feel bound to thank the Boston public for the unprecedented and unexpected sympathy which they displayed on the occasion, every single seat being occupied, even the entry being filled, and the saloon crammed to suffocation. As to the reception with which I met, I am proud to say that this day was one of the brightest in my life. One of the bouquets which fair hands and sympathizing hearts sent to the retiring-room stands before me in all its freshness, and long after those sweet orange-blossoms will have faded away the remembrance of my friend's kindness will be fresh in my heart. Among the audience I discovered almost every one who professes to call himself a real musician and critic, excepting only some few, who never go to my concerts, deeming themselves so much superior to Satter, and calling his scales "illegitimate." I did actually not miss one of this city's eminent talents. The whole concert was more of a festival than anything else, and those who were so anxious to make me feel all the bitterness of Art's quassa cup saw their last hopes drowned in the furore which prevailed from A to Z through the evening, from 7 to half past 10 o'clock. And so I came to the happy conclusion that conciliatory movements are only needed, when both parties were wrong, and that a man needs only to act, and his success and reputation will be complete, despite all hostile efforts. The programme, undoubtedly the choicest and choicest one which I ever presented to my audiences, consisted of Beethoven's two Overtures to Coriolanus and Egmont, Mendelssohn's Quartet in B minor, Haydn's last two movements of the quartet in D major, Mozart's Quintet with Clarinet in A major, Rossini's Overture to "William Tell," Benedict and David's duo on themes from Obéron, Songs for male chorus of Silcher, Haertel, Marschner and Maurer, a Transcription of the Ronde Bohémienne and Barcarole of the North Star by your humble servant, and a medley of American airs, (Musical rockets, as J. S. Dwight says.) Strange to say, Mendelssohn's Quartet took the prize, and so evidently, that at the beginning of the last two pieces of the Finale, a thunder of applause followed the remaining wild strains, such as shook even me, with all my generally reliable strength and composure. At the end of the "William Tell" Overture, a second edition was issued, and the American air which I gave as an encore, and at the urgent solicitation of half the audience, secured the final demonstrations of my friends. Though I dislike nothing so much as to play "Wait for the Wagon,"—(wait for applause,) "Old Folks at home,"—(court the mother and love the daughter,) "Hail Columbia,"—(I am a foreigner, but I beg you to believe my sincere gratitude for your republican applause and dollars,) and last of all, "Yankee Doodle,"—(I hope there is no Englishman among the audience); nevertheless I found myself bound to comply with the general request, and with the immortal harmonies of "Pop goes the weasie," young and old left perfectly delighted! Beauty before age; Miss Josselyn before Germany. Miss Josselyn is a young lady of a very prepossessing appearance, of very great talent, of great energy, and one of my cherished pupils. Pupils? no! friends. That is the very reason that I want to speak plainly to her, and to deny her, what the vulgar crowd is ever anxious to bestow, poisoning flatteries. Miss Josselyn has two paths before her, the one which leads to "Slang-bang" the Capital of Central Stupidity, the other which leads to "Fame" metropolis of After World. The first path is covered with silver, gold and diamonds, the second with copper, lead and iron; the first path is crowded with miners, emigrants and swindlers, the second is lonely and solitary. Miss Josselyn has so much execution that mechanical difficulties are no longer a doubtful feature in her performances; she lacks but one thing: Poësy. Let her feel from her own heart, let her create instead of imitating, let her ruin diverge from the fashionable nightmares and attend Music's divine service, let her forget her listeners and inspire herself, whenever and before she plays: if so, she bids fair to become a great artiste, considering her youth, her unrelenting perseverance, and her rare gifts. The moment has come for her to decide, and may it prove in her favor.

The Prize Songs of the Musical Review are the most abominable trash in this line on record, with the exception of the first, which has at least something like merit in its two pages; though it is flat. Who is to blame? The composers or the public? Who may be laughed at? The judges or the very idea of calling such cheese-envelopes "prize-songs?"—Gustave Satter, the pianist writes musical letters for Willis's Musical World over the signature of Gustave Satter, the critic.

CONCERTS.

OTTO DRESEL's fourth and last Soirée was remarkably well attended, and in many respects the most interesting of the series. This was the programme:

PART I.

- 1.—Concerto for Three Pianos, C major, with Quartet accompaniment, (first time,)..... J. S. Bach.
Allegro—Adagio—Finale.
- 2.—Ave Maria,..... Cherubini.
Sung by Miss Elise Hensler.
- 3.—Andante from the Symphony by..... Schubert.
(Arranged for the Piano by Otto Dresel.)
- 4.—First Trio, D minor, for Piano, Violin and Violoncello, Mendelssohn.

Allegro molto agitato—Andante tranquillo—Scherzo—Finale.

PART II.

- 5.—Sonata for Piano, Op. 81, E flat,..... Beethoven.
Allegro—Scherzo—Tempo di Minuetto—Finale.
- 6.—Adagio from the Second Concerto, with Quintet accompaniment, (first time,)..... Chopin.
- 7.—Romance from "William Tell,"..... Rossini.
Sung by Miss Elise Hensler.
- 8.—Andante and Polonaise, Op. 23, for Piano, with Quintet accompaniment, (first time,)..... Chopin.

The triple Concerto by Bach proved even more interesting than that other, which was played here in

Mr. Dresel's soirées two or three years ago, and more recently in the Mendelssohn Quintette Club concerts. Especially beautiful and striking, full of a deep feeling, was the Adagio. The whole was played with admirable unity, precision and expression by Mr. DRESEL, Mr. TRENKLE, and a lady amateur, at the three pianos, with Quartet of strings by the Quintette Club. Miss ELISE HENSLEER was most warmly greeted, but seemed somehow more embarrassed before the room full of friends than in the larger theatre, nor did she quite recover herself during the Ave Maria. Yet there was no mistaking the rare beauty of the voice, nor the habitual style and feeling of the artistic singer. In the Romance from "Tell" she was all herself, and never were we so charmed by her singing or by that lovely melody itself, as in her singing of it. Vain were the efforts to recall her; once they seemed to have succeeded, but the audience had to laugh at their own disappointment, as she prettily seated herself at the piano to turn the leaves for Mr. Dresel in his last piece. Schubert's lovely Andante goes to the very heart, the more one hears it; and Mr. Dresel gives the spirit and the outline of it in a very satisfactory manner. It was pleasant to hear again the D minor Trio of Mendelssohn; it made a deep impression, although we think we have heard it once or twice, and by the same artists, brought out with more perfect ease and self-possession.

That Piano Sonata (the third of Op. 31,) is one of the most original, imaginative, and quaint (at least in the first movement) of all Beethoven's works. The interpreter seized the spirit of it perfectly, and made it very clear. We know not when we have heard a Beethoven Sonata played so finely. The Chopin Adagio he has often played before in part, without accompaniment. To hear it entire and with accompaniment was a rare treat. The recitative passages, with tremolo of strings, after the exquisite cantabile, were exceedingly impressive. The Polonaise is also a remarkable and characteristic work, but was less clearly apprehended by most hearers, we opine.

FIFTH AFTERNOON CONCERT. Haydn's 7th Symphony is perhaps the best and largest of the set. The first and last movements come nearer than any to the grand and complex works of later symphonists. The Adagio has a great deal of simple and methodical beauty, but fatigues somewhat by its length, especially when taken so slow as it was. But as a whole it was finely played and much enjoyed. How much richer, stronger, and more full of imagination was the Zauberflöte overture, which came out grandly! The marvellous Andante to Beethoven's 7th Symphony, without the rest, had a cruel, tantalizing charm. Lumbye's "Farewell to Berlin" waltz, a richly instrumented "Gipsy Galop," by Koppitz, and the "Wedding March," superbly played, made out the entertainment. Only one more concert remains, of which the excellent programme will be found below.

[Crowded out last week.]

CONCERTS.—We were unable, to our great regret, to attend the Concert in aid of the GERMAN BENEVOLENT SOCIETY. The Music Hall, we hear, was very full, and the net proceeds added to the funds of the society were between $600 and $700. We were particularly sorry to lose the singing of the German Männerchor, the "Orpheus," under the direction of Herr KREISSMANN, which all say was a model of fine part-singing. The overtures to the Freyschütz, Zauberflöte and Tannhäuser, and the Andante to the Fifth Symphony, were of course well played by Mr. ZERRAHN's orchestra.

The last Wednesday AFTERNOON CONCERT drew another hall full. Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony pleased by its cheerfulness and grace and clearness; but it sounded like child's play in comparison with Beethoven, or even with the best of Mozart, which have so much more in them, besides mere elegance of style. The overtures to "Midsummer Night's Dream" and to Semiramide were well played. But the gem of the concert was the little Allegretto from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony—short as it was sweet. Wittman's "Magic Sounds" is a fine, rich, swelling sort of waltz, strong enough to float off a whole Music Hall floor full of waltzers. The horn solo by M. TROISI was a remarkably smooth and clean performance.

Musical Chat-Chat.

BOUND VOLUMES of the past year of the Journal of Music are now ready.... We offer twenty-five cents each for perfect copies of No. 4, Vol. V., or No. 15, Vol. VI.

Do not forget the concert of our old friend KEYSER to-night; the memory of past services, respect for character, and a programme at once classical and novel, should attract a numerous audience.

The GERMAN TRIO, before leaving for their engagements in the English Provinces, intend giving a Farewell Concert here about the end of next week. We hope it will be well attended by their friends.—There will be a select programme, including a new trio of RUBINSTEIN. Full particulars will soon be announced.

MISS ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS is delighting Salem and other large New England towns with concerts.

The Paris papers are warm in praise of BISACCIANTI's performances at the Italian Opera. It is said that MARIO offered to sing with her her first night, but that owing to professional jealousy in some quarter, she saw fit to decline the aid.

The New York Academy of Music was re-opened last week, for a new season (four weeks) of Italian Opera, under the auspices of MAX MARETZKE as "sole director." BOLCIONI and COLETTI have been added to the troupe. Ernani was the first piece, with Mme. LAGRANGE, MORELLI, BOLCIONI and COLETTI in the chief rôles. The list of pieces promised is somewhat richer and more tempting than heretofore. It includes Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, Weber's Freyschütz, (in Italian, we suppose,) and "William Tell," besides a sufficiency of Verdi, (Travatore, Luisa Miller, &c.) The German operas came on the "off nights." "Tell" was given last night; to-night the piece will be Flotow's "Martha."... Messrs. MASON and BERGMANN are following up their Classical Matinées with some equally successful Soirées.... Mr. BERGMANN's Sunday Evening Orchestral Concerts grow more and more in public favor. The programmes remind one of the good old "Germania" days.... GOTTSCHALK gave his fourteenth piano soirée on Thursday evening.

The Gazzetta Musicale of Florence, under date of 11th October, 1855, contains a Life of LUIGI PICHIANI, Professor of Harmony and Counterpoint in the Academy of Fine Arts of Florence. After a brief biography and list of works of this eminent composer, the author gives a list of his most distinguished scholars, "as a proof," he says, "of his skill in teaching the art he professes." Among these we are happy to find that of our townsman, FRANCIS BOOTT, Esq., mentioned as an honorary member of the Academy. "Few masters," observes the author, "can boast of so brilliant a crown of scholars and disciples, and it is for this reason that we take pleasure in recording their names." There is an amusing apology in a subsequent paragraph, for some errata of the press, in which the editor "asks pardon for having unjustly Russianized Mr. Boott by printing his name Rooff instead of Boott."

A new German Opera House is to be erected in New York, at the corner of Crosby and Prince streets. It is contemplated to erect a Musical Hall, somewhat similar to the opera houses of Milan, Paris and London. The stage and parquette are to be portable, and the boxes (of which there will be four tiers,) will entirely surround the stage. The interior will be so arranged that it can be used for balls, concerts, public meetings, and a theatre. The whole cost will be in the neighborhood of $200,000, more than half of which sum is already raised.

Advertisements.

Mr. WM. KEYZER'S BENEFIT CONCERT,
At Mercantile Hall, Summer St.,
On SATURDAY EVENING, April 26, 1856,

ASSISTED BY A BOSTON LADY VOCALIST,
GUSTAV SATTER, Pianist: Messrs. SUCK, SCHULTZE, and MEISEL, Violins: ECKHARDT and EICHLER,
Tenors: W. FRIES and A. SUCK, Violoncellos,
All of whom have kindly volunteered.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.
Quartet,.....Haydn.
Allegro-Adagio-Scherzo-Finale.
Messrs. Keyser, Schultze, Eckhardt and Fries.
Grand Quintet, for Piano-forte solo, 1st and 2d violin, tenor and violoncello, (first time in Boston,).....Spohr.
Messrs. Gustav Satter, &c.

PART II.
Duo Concertante for Piano and Violin,.....Hers and Lafont.
Messrs. Satter and Keyser, (by request.)
Aria: "Qui la voce," from I Puritani,.....Bellini.
Sung by a Boston Lady.
Double Quartet,.....Spohr.
Larghetto-Scherzo-Finale.
1st Quartet-Messrs. Keyser, Schultze, Eckhardt and Fries.
2d Quartet-Messrs. Suck, Meisel, Eichler and A. Suck.
(The Quintet for Piano-forte, and the Double Quartet, by Spohr, are generally considered as among the best compositions of that great master.)

The Grand Piano-Forte used is from the Manufactory of Messrs. Hallet, Davis & Co.
Tickets 50 cents each, to be obtained at the music stores,
Tremont and Revere Houses, and at the door.
Concert to commence at 8 o'clock.

PROGRAMME
OF THE
SIXTH AFTERNOON CONCERT,
AT THE
BOSTON MUSIC HALL,
Wednesday, April 30th, 1856.

1—Symphony No. 5,.....Beethoven.
2—Overture: "Oberon,".....Weber.
3—Waltz: Die Elfen,.....Labitsky.
4—Andante, 9th Symphony,.....Haydn.
5—Galop: Une Fleur de Danse,.....Gung'l.
6—Overture: "Zanetta,".....Auber.

Concert to commence at 3½ o'clock.—Single tickets 25 cts.

THE GOLDEN WREATH.

A Choice Collection of Favorite Melodies, designed for the use of Schools, Seminaries, Select Classes, &c. Also, a Complete Course of Elementary Instruction, upon the Pestalozzian System, with numerous Exercises for Practice. By L. O. EMERSON. 24 pages. 16mo. Bound in boards, leather back. Price, 25 cts.

This is a new book, and judging from present appearance, will be the most popular work of its class published. There is an exceeding aptness about the instructions, and an attractiveness in the melodies that will at once commend it to all for whom it is designed.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
U. S. HOTEL.

Communications can be left at Mr. Ditson's music store.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

The Latest Publications of
J. A. NOVELLO.
ORIGINAL LONDON EDITIONS.

Novello's Complete Folio Edition.

RINK'S PRACTICAL ORGAN SCHOOL,
Op. 55. Carefully revised and corrected: with the German directions and terms translated into English. Price $3.75; or in Six Parts, 75 cents each.

PART I, price 75c., contains—
PREFACE.
Nos. 1 to 12. Short and easy pieces in two parts.
" 13 to 24. " " three parts,
" 25 to 36. " " four parts.
" 37 to 66. Preludiums, in various keys, for soft or loud stops.

PART II, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 67 to 122. Exercises for the pedals.
" 123 to 144. Twelve Chorales, or well-known German Psalm Tunes, with variations.

PART III, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 145 to 159. Fifteen easy Postludes, or Concluding Voluntaries, in the Fugue style.

PART IV, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 160 to 174. Fifteen Postludes, or Concluding Voluntaries for alternate manuals, in the Fugue style.

PART V, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 175 to 181. Seven Preludes and Fugues.
No. 182. The Flute Concerto.
" 183. Variations on "Hail dir Sieges Kranz," or, "God save the Queen."

PART VI, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 184 to 192. Nine Preludes and Fugues.
" 193 to 194. Fantasia and Fugue.

Please to order Novello's Edition, and quote the prices.

MEINELSSOHN'S

SIX GRAND SONATAS FOR THE ORGAN.

New Edition, complete in one Book, $1.75, or singly, as follows:

No. 1. Price 44c.	No. 4. Price 38c.
2. " 25c.	5. " 25c.
3. " 25c.	6. " 31c.

Composed and dedicated to Dr. F. SCHLEMMER, by FELIX MEINELSSOHN BARTHOLOMT. Op. 65.
J. Alfred Novello, London and New York.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY

FOR THE DIFFUSION OF

MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

Vol. 8. Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition with the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering (former price $5.25c.) In paper wrappers, $1.18c. By mail—$1.20c.

Volumes of this series already issued.

Vol. 1. Cherubim's Counterpoint and Fugue, $1.68c.
2. Dr. Marx' General Musical Instruction, 1 63.
3. Fétis on Choir and Chorus Singing, 35.
4. Mozart's succinct Thoro' Bass School, 21.
5. Cattel's Treatise on Harmony 63.
6. Albrechtsberger's Collected writings on Thoro' Bass, Harmony and Composition for self-instruction. Vol. 1. Harmony and Thoro' Bass, price 88c. Vols. 2 and 3. Guide to Composition, 88c., each. Three vols. bound in one complete, Cloth Boards—$2 63c.

J. A. NOVELLO,
Sacred Music Store, 389 Broadway, New York.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 18 MARION STREET, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

Apr 29 MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

ED. B. ROBINSON,
PIANO-FORTE TUNER.
Orders received at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington Street.

NEWS'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER,
Will be happy to give instruction in Piano-forte and Organ playing, and the Theory of Music. Address:—
No. 3 Hayward Place. May 28. if

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE
—GIVES—
INSTRUCTION ON THE PIANO-FORTE,
And may be addressed at her residence, 55 Hancock St.

CARL HAUSE
OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
25 Washington Street, Boston.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,
Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

G. ANDRÉ & CO'S
Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.
Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (128 lines) first insertion.....$12 00
Do do each subsequent.....$6 00
Special notices (loaded), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 213.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 5.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 283 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I. "
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O. "

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by
JOHN S. DWIGHT, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court
of the District of Massachusetts.]

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Translated from the French of Madame Dubouant, for the Journal of Music.

CHAPTER VI.

THE DUCHESS.

I expected Celio at the appointed hour, but I only received from him the following note:

"My Dear Friend—I send you money and papers that you may close up Mademoiselle Boccaferri's business at the theatre. Nothing is simpler. You have only to pay the enclosed sum and take a receipt, which you are to keep. Her engagement was almost over, and she is only responsible for the two performances which were remaining. She has found elsewhere a more profitable engagement. As for me, I am going away, dear friend. I shall be gone when you receive this adieu. I cannot endure the air of this town and the condolences of politeness for an hour longer. I should get angry and say or do something foolish. I am going elsewhere; I press farther on. Onward! onward!

With all my heart, yours,

CELIO FLORIANI."

I turned over the letter to see if it was really directed to me: Adorno Salentini, Place —, No. —. Nothing was wanting.

I fell back astounded, disturbed by dreadful anxiety and dark suspicions, shocked at having lost all trace of Cecilia and of him who might take her from me or help me to rejoice her. I believed myself duped. Days and weeks passed, and I heard nothing of Celio nor of the two Boccaferri. No one had minded their departure, as it took place almost at the close of the operatic season. I eagerly read all the musical and theatrical journals which came in my way. Nowhere did they speak of an engagement for Cecilia or for Celio. I knew no one who was intimate with them except Mademoiselle Boccaferri's old teacher, and he knew nothing or pretended to know nothing about her. I prepared to leave Vienna, where I began to grow sullen, and went to say farewell to the duchess, hoping that she might tell me something of Celio.

All this adventure had harmed me grievously; just when my heart was opening to love, trust and respect, I was pushed back into the regions of doubt, and felt the poisonous touch of scepticism and irony. I could not work; I sought excitement, and found it nowhere. I was more malicious in my conversation with the duchess than Celio himself would have been in my place. This gave her a passion for me—I should say against me; thus are coquettes made.

The ill-disguised anxiety with which I inquired for Celio made her think me still jealous and in love with her. She declared she did not know what had become of him since his unfortunate debut; but believing me fascinated with her, and seeing how firmly I denied it, she formed a great idea of my strength of character. She resolved to conquer it, and prepared herself for battle; a desperate combat with a man who showed no weakness, and who had abandoned her upon a mere suspicion, seemed worthy of her skill.

I left Vienna without seeing her again. I went to Turin; in two days she was there also; she compromised herself openly, and did for me what she had never done for another. This woman, who had held me in her balances with Celio, coldly weighing the chances of our budding fame, that she might choose him who would best flatter her vanity—this wise coquette, who kept us both in such a way that she might dismiss him whom the public cast off—this fine lady, until now very discreet and skilful in the management of her love affairs, threw herself heart and soul into the way of scandal, before I had gained an inch with the public, solely because I resisted her.

Yet Celio had been cruel with her too, and she had not been thus affected. So resistance alone would not make her thus enamored. She saw that Celio did not love her and perhaps was not capable of loving her seriously; but whether my character and savoir-vivre made her more sure, she had seen me really moved by her; she thought me capable of great passion, and imagined that she might inspire me in spite of my courage and pride. She was too late in the day, and did for me when I was cold what she would not have dreamed of during my zeal. Women are never so skilful as to keep away from the snare of their own vanity.

Thus I saw her thrust herself upon me when I did not care for her, and when I was suffering for another. I needed neither courage, virtue nor pride to repel her at first, and to strive to make her renounce her own ruin. I put myself to this work with an energy which only pushed her farther. Had I been a rascal, a roué, an enemy determined upon her downfall, I could not have acted more successfully to push her to extremes and make her trample under foot all care for her own reputation. She thought I was trying her love, and should place mine upon the result of this decisive final trial. This woman, so dangerous to others, suddenly became fatal to herself in the midst of a life of selfishness and calculation. She exerted all the strength of her will to conquer an aversion which she took for mere defiance. The crisis of her wounded pride carried her beyond her accustomed cold and disdainful vanity. Perhaps, too, she was weary of herself; perhaps she wished to feel the storm of a real passion or a terrible strife.

My continued resistance so enraged her that she declared that she would force me by surprise to fall at her feet. She sought insult in public, that I might defend her. She drove to see me in broad daylight in her carriage. She confided her pretended secret to three or four dear friends, women of the world, and she chose the most indiscreet. She dropped her mask in the midst of a ball, while she caught my arm; she even followed me into a box at the theatre, where she would have shown herself to the public gaze had I not insisted upon leaving with her.

These tortures lasted for a week, and all the time she kept up this incredible warfare. This indolent woman, superb in her languor, was suddenly seized by an unceasing activity. She neither slept nor ate, and was frightfully changed. She prevented my departure by making me believe that she came to bid me farewell and had renounced me. I would have liked to soothe the grief I caused her, bring her back to good resolutions, leave her nobly and manfully with friendly words. I only roused her despair, and it grew more terrible, more imperious, more entangling, at the moment when I had at last flattered myself that she had yielded to reason.

It is impossible to tell what I suffered in that week. The love of any woman is perhaps irresistible, and she was beautiful, young, intelligent and full of charms. The grief which had consumed her so rapidly gave a terrible character to her beauty, well made to work upon an artist's imagination. I had always thought her sensual;

she had passed for that; but to me she seemed dying for the want of a heart which might lull her senses and adorn her with the new charm of chastity. I felt myself on the edge of a bottomless abyss, for I knew if I loved her but one moment I was lost. Of that I had no doubt; I knew what a reaction of tyranny I should undergo after I had once yielded my soul to the perfidious syren. I knew myself and could foresee the future. Strong in combat, I was too artless in my defeat not to be harassed forever by my conscience, and I could still persist because I forbade myself to love her, she was so far from my ideal; it was devotion to be sure, but devotion in fever, energy in weakness, enthusiasm in forgetting self-respect, and no true strength, no dignity, no possible endurance in this sudden infatuation. She filled me with horror and pity, while she aroused wild emotions and severe curiosity within me. I saw my future ruined, my character lost, and myself an object of attack to all bold and coquettish women, to draw me away from a powerful rival, and to sport with me like panthers with a gladiator. I saw myself become an adventurer—I, who so detested that vile trade, considered a charlatan by chaste souls, who would accuse me of having sought fame in scandalous deeds instead of progress in my art. I felt myself yielding, and when the fire of passion mounted in my veins, a cold sweat of fear ran down my forehead. If this woman should be lost through me, or only accepted by me in her voluntary fall, I should be bound to her by honor and could not forsake her. In vain might I try to divert and exalt myself in striving for her; I should always drag about my feet the degradation of a love imposed by the weakness of a moment upon the grandeur of a whole life.

She had already threatened to poison herself, and in her present situation one hour of rage and delirium might drive her to suicide. Heaven suggested a mezzo termine. I resolved to deceive her in leaving a possibility of a performance of my promise. I insisted upon a return to her family and friends in Milan. I made it a condition of love, telling her that I should blush to profit by the fever into which she had thrown herself to obtain her, and that my conscience would be quiet if I saw her take her old place in the world and her old rank in public opinion—that I should stay in Turin, not to compromise her by following her, but that in a week I should be near her, to be hers in all the charm of mystery.

I had hard work to persuade her, but I was really touched, and so distrustful of my own strength as to make her believe that hers was not powerless. She departed, and I staid, exhausted by conflicting emotions, fatigued by my victory, uncertain whether I should flee to the ends of the earth or follow her to leave her no more.

I was weaker after her departure than in her presence. She wrote me insane letters. Her language and manners awoke an instinctive hatred within me, which passed off when I remembered her connected with so many proofs of sacrifice and passion; and then, too, solitude was insupportable. Worse follies tempted me. Cecilia had forsaken me; Celio was false. The world was empty without one being to love exclusively. When the week had expired I ordered a coachman to drive me to Milan.

They were putting on my baggage; the horses were waiting at the door. I went back into my studio to take a last look.

I had come to Turin intending to stay for a long time. I loved the town which called back my childhood, and where I had always kept up pleasant connections. I had hired delightful lodgings; my studio was charming, and the very day I arrived there I had worked with pleasure, flattering myself that I should forget my cares and make great progress. The arrival of the duchess had dispelled these sweet hopes, and I feared lest all happiness was dispelled from my life. I was overwhelmed by remorse, terror and regret, against which I strove in vain. I threw myself on the sofa; they were calling me in the street; the driver was getting impatient; his little horses, young and spirited, were pawing the pavement. I did not stir. I was not decided enough to say I would not go, but said to myself, with childish satisfaction, that I had not yet started.

At last the driver came himself and knocked at my door. I can see now his cap of otter-skin and his coat of fur. He had an agreeable face, both displeased and friendly. He was an old soldier, annoyed by my want of punctuality, but submissive to the idea of subordination.

"Ah, my dear sir, the days are so short at this season of the year! the roads are so bad! If night overtakes us in the mountains what shall we do? It is a full hour since I am at your commands, and my little horses only ask to run for your pleasure."

That was all his complaint.

"You are right, friend," said I to him. "Get up on your seat; I am ready."

He went out, and I intended to do the same. A paper which fluttered before me on the floor diverted my attention. I picked it up; it was a leaf from my album. I recognized the sketch which I had made the night when Celio went home with me after his fiasco. I saw the good and bad angel, both occupied by a sly looking personage, who had Celio's stage costume and mien. I remembered that sleepless night when the duchess had seemed to me so vain and false, and Cecilia so pure and grand. I do not know what reaction seized me. I ran to the door, ordered the coachman to unharness and go away. I came back; I drew a long breath; I put my album upon the table, as if to take fresh possession of my studio, my work, and my liberty; then the fear of solitude crossed me. Those bare walls of an unfurnished studio weighed upon my heart. I fell back upon the sofa and began to weep and sob even, like a child undergoing punishment, and miserable at the sight of the chamber which is to be its prison.

Suddenly I heard a woman's voice singing in the street the first words of this air from Don Juan:

Vedrai, carino,
Se sei buonino,
Che bel rimedio
Ti voglio dar.

Was it a dream? I heard the voice of Cecilia Boccaferri. I had heard her twice in the rôle of Zerlina, in which she had a charming simplicity, but lacked the necessary shade of coquetry. Just then she seemed to address me with a tender fondness she had never shown in public, and as if she called me with irresistible tones. I rushed to the door, ran out into the street. I only found the vetturino, who was taking out the horses. I made a thousand careful searches. The street was deserted. It was hardly day, and a sharp breeze came from the mountains.

"Come back to-morrow," said I to my driver, giving him a pour-boire; "I cannot go to-day."

I spent twenty-four hours in hunting for information. I inquired high and low for Cecilia, her father, and Celio. No one knew what I meant. One told me that the old drunkard died ten years ago; another that he had no daughter; all said that the son of Floriani must be in England, for he had passed through Turin three months since, saying he had an engagement in London.

I concluded that I must have been mistaken, that it was not Cecilia's voice which had sung those four lines, too tenderly for her; but during those twenty-four hours my feeling had changed; the duchess had lost her power over my imagination. At the dawn of day the brave vetturino was at my door. This time I did not make him wait. I myself put on my baggage; I got into his frail legno and told him to drive westward.

"But, my lord, that is not the way to Milan."

"I know it; I am not going to Milan."

"Then, master, tell me where you are going?"

"Where you will, my friend; go as far as possible in the direction opposite Milan."

"I could drive you to Paris with my horses; but still I should like to know whether you wish to go to Paris or to Rome."

"Go towards France, directly to France," said I, obeying an inward impulse. "When I am tired, I will stop you, or when the beauties of nature invite me to contemplation."

"Beautiful nature is ugly enough in this weather," said the brave man, smiling. "See how deep the snow lies below the mountains! We cannot easily pass Mont Cenis."

"We will see; perhaps we may not care to. Come, let us start; I am eager to travel. If your carriage takes me away from Milan as well as Turin, that is all I care for to-day."

"Alions! alions!" said he, whipping up his horses, who slid along the pavement, glittering with frost. "An artist's notions are a fool's notions! but prudent people are often stupid and always stingy. Long live artists!"

[To be continued.]

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Reminiscences of a Summer Tour.

IX.

DEPARTURE FROM COLOGNE—PARIS—THE SALLE BERTHÉLEMY AND THE HALL OF THE CONSERVATOIRE—DEARTH OF GOOD MUSIC ROOMS ON THE CONTINENT—MISS HENSLEY IN PARIS—MILITARY MUSIC OF THE FRENCH—ORGANS AT ST. DENIS AND THE CHURCH OF THE MADELEINE.

My latest experiences of Germany, as were likewise the first, are connected with the Cathedral of Cologne. And I would fain have lingered among the shadows of this grand old pile, about which so much has been written and said, and yet the half has not been told. But the limits of my allotted time did not allow. So, passing from the Cathedral direct, I took my departure from Cologne. An hour or two afterwards, straining out of the window of a car, I looked back upon the town, and watched the outline of the majestic structure, as it receded in the distance, growing more and more shadowy and indistinct, till it is merged at last in the mists of the Rhine.

A day and a night of tedious travelling has brought me again to Paris. Several times I tried desperately to get a hearing of the famous orchestra of the Conservatoire, but without success. Why is it, I could not but ask myself, that such an orchestra must needs be cribbed and cabined in so limited a sphere? And this question applies with equal fitness to most of the cities of Germany. Really, there is not on the continent of Europe, so far as I could learn, a concert room of sufficient amplitude to give to orchestral music its proper and legitimate effect. The rooms employed for this purpose in Dresden and Berlin, as is well known, are cramped in their proportions, ill-ventilated and uncomfortable, and hardly competent to contain a thousand auditors. The Gürzinich Hall at Cologne, the chosen locale, for many generations back, of the festival music of the Rhine, is described by CHORLEY as "a quaint old building, which commands its street almost like a castle, the burgher warlike aspect of which is enhanced by the turrets at its corners—having almost every fault which persons experienced in acoustics would denounce as fatal, being too low, too ill-proportioned, and divided down its centre by a row of squat pillars." The hall of the famous Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig is much of the same sort. Nor are Frankfort and Munich greatly superior in this respect.

I had heard of a Hall which had been recently constructed in Paris on a new plan—the Salle Berthélemy Rue du Chateau d'Eau, which its friends had predicted would prove the ultima Thule of acoustic success. The principle here adopted was the rejection of rectilinear surfaces, and the substitution of curves everywhere in their stead—walls, ceilings, floors and stage being made to conform to this theory. This is the building which a correspondent in a previous number of this journal, (No. 19, Vol. II,) under the signature of "C," quotes, in substantiation of a similar notion, as leaving nothing to be desired in point of acoustic effect! I took an early opportunity to visit this anomaly of acoustic construction and test its properties. Its interior figure is ellipsoidal, being that of a much elongated oval—a sort of colossal egg in fact. Its extreme length is 137 feet, its width 72 feet. It will accommodate an audience of perhaps three thousand persons. The building, as in ordinary theatres, is partitioned off into parquette, stage and galleries, the latter, of which there are two, running entirely around the sides of the apartment except the end appropriated by the scenes. In the middle of the concave ceiling, high up against the roof, is the hanging balcony, so called, a sort of basket-work suspended by iron rods and chains, capable of containing thirty or forty people. This has always been alluded to as one of the novelties of the building;—and so it is indeed. But of what possible use it can be, or what inducement it can offer to visitors, in compensation for toiling up a crooked stairway of some 60 feet, to descend again, through a hole in the roof, to their dizzy perch, it is difficult to conceive. To the amateur rigger or sea-faring man, perhaps, it might present peculiar attraction; but for seeing and the proper hearing and appreciation of sound therefrom, it is out of the question. From the peculiar conformation of the apartment, we might judge, a priori, it would possess, in an aggravated degree, that most serious of defects in a music room, excessive reverberation of sound. Such was indeed the case. To remedy, in some measure, this fault, the hanging gallery above named had been bandaged with cloth, festoons of which were also extended from the centre to the sides of the room at several points. It was soon abandoned as a concert room. At the time of my visit it was being used for the exhibition of a gigantic panorama of California, over which an orchestra of some twenty-five or thirty instruments presided, who played at intervals the national airs of America. The music, as might be supposed, was not of the highest excellence, but it served well to test the qualities of the room. There was, I imagined, a peculiar intensity imparted to the sound. The drums and the heavier brass instruments returned a distinct echo, and the effect of the whole, as in the case of the Court Church at Dresden, before alluded to in these papers, was inarticulate and confused. Touching its present condition, "Spiridion," the spirited correspondent of the Daily Atlas, says, in a recent letter from Paris: "The celebrated Salle Berthélemy, which was to open a new era in theatre building, after having ruined its builder, (he was worth 1,000,000 fr.,) and failed as a concert hall, show-room and ball-room, is about to be made into a church." After such experiences abroad, I recurred to our own beautiful hall with a new feeling of gratification and pride. It is thus by contrast with the boasted music rooms in other parts of the world, its superiority can be fully appreciated.

Miss ELISE HENSLEY was at this time pursuing her musical studies in Paris, under the direction of the eminent BORDOGNI. This distinguished master, as is well known, draws his pupils from all parts of the world. In voice-training, by which I mean the bringing out and developing, to their fullest extent, the vocal powers, he is still, I doubt not, unrivalled. Miss Hensley's voice, in these first six months of her pupilage, had gained greatly in fullness and strength. Just before I left I was present at one of her morning lessons. It was on this occasion, as I have somewhere before mentioned, after the successful performance of a long and difficult exercise, that her teacher, patting her upon the shoulder, turned aside to me and exclaimed, sotto voce, "La petite Sontag!" In one year more of such application," he continued, "that voice will double in power and volume." Whether fortunately or unfortunately, that year was passed, away from Paris, under other, possibly equally eminent masters. And in the subsequent and frequent changes which became necessary, it is not to be wondered at, perhaps, that the line of of action and prominent aim in the teaching of Bordogni, as suggested in the remarks above quoted, was for a time departed from; nor that, amidst the cares and duties incident to the successful and brilliant career of the young debutante at La Scala, it could not be immediately and systematically renewed. But this may yet be accomplished. Success, however flattering, will not, we are confident, be allowed to interfere with the hours of practice and study, in a young artist whose student life is as yet but just begun.

Between the hours of seven and eight o'clock, in summer, it is the custom of the military bands, connected with the various regiments stationed in Paris, to play in rotation at the foot of the Column of Napoleon in the Place Vendôme. These bands are commonly composed of about forty instruments. In some instances the number is increased to fifty. They comprise among their ingredients a proper proportion of reeds and brass, though in the latter I was sorry to observe a preponderating tendency towards the family of sax-horns and cornets. In this respect the military bands of the French compare disadvantageously with the well-appointed collections to be found in the Austrian and Prussian service; so, also, in the character of their music, which is light and trashy, in comparison with both the German and English military music. Snatches of French and Italian Opera and the national airs of the country are the most popular pieces on the programme of such out-door entertainments. The great fault of these band performances, here as elsewhere, is, they attempt too much, and grasp at effects outside their legitimate sphere and entirely beyond their reach. They are not content unless they usurp the part of an orchestra. How much better and more effective when confined to their own peculiar province; for there is a department of military, or harmony music, as the Germans call it, within which it is possible to produce unique and thrilling effects; nor is it confined, of necessity, to stirring and martial subjects, but has its temper and theme for every occasion of out-door music.

It was interesting to watch the effect of this martial serenade upon the excitable populace of Paris. The square was always thronged. The spot is well chosen, politically speaking, for such exhibitions. Nowhere else could the military tendencies of Young France be so aroused. A strong police force is always near at hand. At such times I have seen old men lean against the iron railing and weep. Others, who have come joyously to hang garlands upon the projections of the column, would sit down at its base and bury their faces in their hands at the sound of some familiar strain. But in itself considered, the place is ill adapted for music. The reverberation from the semi-circular rows of massive buildings, on either side, is tremendous and utterly destructive of all unity in effect, unless one pushes his way into the very midst of the players. Add to this the uproar of the twenty-four drums of the regiment, which come into the Place Vendôme at eight o'clock to escort the band to its quarters, and the noise becomes truly infernal.

There are some famous organs in Paris and its vicinity. Among those of recent date are the fine instruments in the churches of St. Vincent de Paul and the Madeleine, and that in the Abbey Church at St. Denis. These are the productions of the celebrated M. M. Cavallé Coll, of Paris, who hold the same position among the organ builders of France as that commanded by the Messrs. Walcker, of Ludwigsburg, in Germany. Among the instruments above named, that at St. Denis—the Westminster Abbey of the French—is the largest and most complete. It contains 69 sounding stops, arranged upon 8 manuals and pedal. "Among the most remarkable features in this organ," says HOPKINS, "is the adjustment of wind. Not only are the reed stops placed on a heavier wind than those of the flue species, but the upper octave of all the stops are in common supplied with a stronger blast than the lower; upon the principle that wind instrument players exercise a greater pressure of the muscles upon the lungs when producing the acute sounds." There are also several stops of a novel kind, called by Cavaillé "Harmonique," which sound the octave above the note that the length of the pipe would indicate. The organ has also the pneumatic lever attachment for lightening the touch. Its compass is, upon the manual, from CC to f in alt., 54 notes; on the pedal, FFF to tenor f, 25 notes.

The organ in the Church of the Madeleine, though smaller in calibre than the one just mentioned, is not inferior in excellence. It was completed in 1846, and in October of that year was opened and formally dedicated at the church with much ceremony. It has 4 manuals and pedal arranged as follows:

CLAVIER DU GRAND ORGUE.

Pieds.	Pieds.
1 Montre.....16	7 Prestant.....4
2 Violin-Basse.....16	8 Quinte.....8
3 Montre.....8	9 Doublette.....2
4 Bourdon.....8	10 Plein jeu X ranks.
5 Salicional.....8	11 Trompette.....8
6 Flute Harmonique.....8	12 Cor. Anglais.....8

CLAVIER DE BOMBARDES.

13 Sous Basse.....16	19 Bombarde.....16
14 Basse.....8	20 Trompette Harmonique.....8
15 Flute Harmonique.....8
16 Flute Traversière.....8	21 Deuxième Trompette.....8
17 Flute Octavante.....4	22 Clairon.....4
18 Octavin.....2

CLAVIER DU POSITIF.

23 Montre.....8	28 Dulciana.....4
24 Viola di Gamba.....8	30 Octavin.....2
25 Flute douce.....8	30 Trompette.....8
26 Voix Celestes.....8	21 Basson et Hautbois.....8
27 Prestant.....4	22 Clairon.....4

CLAVIER DE R&CIT. EXPRESSIF.

33 Flute Harmonique.....8	38 Voix Humaine.....8
34 Bourdon.....8	39 Trompette Harmonique.....8
35 Musette.....8	40 Clairon Harmonique.....4
36 Flute Octavante.....4
37 Octavin.....2

CLAVIER DE PÉDALES.

41 Quintaton.....32	45 Grosse Flute.....8
42 Contre-Basse.....16	46 Bombarde.....16
43 Basse-Contre.....16	47 Trompette.....8
44 Violoncelle.....8	48 Clairon.....4

COMBINATION PEDALS, &c.

1 Positif to Great.	8 Tremulant to Choir and Swell.
2 Great to Pedal.
3 Bombarde to Positif.	9 Great Reeds.
4 Pedal to Great.	10 Bombarde Reeds.
5 Gt. Organ Sub-octave.	11 Choir Reeds.
6 Bombarde Sub-octave.	12 Swell Reeds.
7 Pedal Octave above.	13 Pedal Reeds.

The compass of this instrument is, on the Manuals, from CC to *f*², 54 notes; Pedal, CCC to tenor d, 27 notes. The above is a fair example of the selection and arrangement of the stops in the large French organs. There is to be found in these instruments great variety and beauty of effect, conjoined with lightness and promptness of action, and a rare brilliancy of tone. But they lack character—are wanting in grandeur, dignity, profundity—and, on the whole, must be ranked as inferior to the great works of England and Germany.

Death of Bochs, the Harpist.

Robert Nicholas Charles Bochs, the celebrated harpist, died at Sydney, Australia, on the 7th of January. The only biographical sketch that we possess of this rather famous individual, says that he was born at Montmedi, in the department of the Meuse, in France, in 1789, so that his age was but sixty-seven, though he was generally supposed to be older. His father was first performer on the hautboy in the Grand Theatre at Lyons, and he began to learn music before anything else. Indeed some of the stories told of him remind one of the infancy of Mozart; for he is said to have publicly performed a concerto on the piano, when only seven years old, to have written "a duet and symphony for the flute" when only nine, to have composed ballet overtures and a quartet when only eleven, and an opera called "Trajan" when only sixteen.

His family having removed to Bordeaux, Bochs began to study composition under Beck, and marvellous stories are told of his progress, and of his rapidly acquired skill upon nearly every instrument of the orchestra, but especially upon the harp, the pianoforte, the flute, and the tenor. From Bordeaux he was taken to Paris, placed in the Conservatory, under Catel, and at the end of the first year, won the first prize in harmony. He then continued the study of composition under Mehul, but at the same time devoted himself greatly to the harp, receiving lessons from Nadermann, and afterwards from the Vicomte Marin. In a little while he not only surpassed his masters, but became the greatest living performer on the harp, maintaining this pre-eminence until years and rather premature infirmities, diminished his powers.

In the days of his youth and greatest skill Bochs was the pet of the leading courts of Europe. In 1813 Napoleon the Great appointed him the first harpist of his private concerts. In the following year, on the Restoration, he was appointed to compose an opera called Les Heritiers Michaux, which was graciously received by Louis XVIII. and by the Russian and Austrian Emperors. In 1815 he wrote a grand Requiem by command of Louis XVIII. He was also appointed harpist to the King and the Duc de Berri. In 1817 he went to England, where he became the pet of the court and nobility, performing frequently at concerts, and writing many compositions for the harp. In 1822 he was made director of the oratorios, and also a life governor, professor of the harp and secretary of the musical department of the Royal Academy. He retained these offices for many years, and derived a handsome revenue from his concerts and his publications.

During his residence in London, Bochs made the acquaintance of Madame Anna Bishop, an accomplished woman, and a charming singer, who had been raised from obscurity, educated, and afterwards married by Sir Henry R. Bishop. The great harpist was then a very handsome, as well as a celebrated man. The result of the acquaintance was that the lady deserted her husband and followed the harpist, to whom she has been a faithful and devoted servant ever since. Their visit to the United States is remembered by all our readers. Since they have left us, they have visited Mexico, South America and California, and finally, Australia; the great harpist who had been petted by Bonapartes and Bourbons, and had instructed empresses and princesses, finding at last a grave in the land whither, if all that is said of him be true, he should have been legally sent years ago; for among the eccentricities of his genius was one which used to prompt him to lay violent hands on finery and jewelry belonging to ladies who attended his re-unions—this peculiarity being one of the reasons why he could not venture back to the scenes of his early European triumphs.

Bochs was a vain, petulant, domineering, bad-tempered man. The hints we have given are sufficient to indicate his moral deficiencies, so we need not enlarge upon them. He was, unquestionably, a wonderful harpist, and a composer of skill. But he lacked genius and inspiration, so that among his couple of hundred works, there are none that will live, except as mere studies for the harp.—Phil. Bulletin.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 21st. On Saturday evening the Philharmonic season came to a worthy close in the finest concert which this winter has brought us, and which was particularly refreshing in contrast with its immediate predecessor. BEETHOVEN'S Fourth Symphony, in B flat, ever new, ever beautiful and grand, formed the chief feature of the evening. It was played with a great deal of spirit, and very correctly, with the exception of the few notes of the bass-viol (?) in the last bars of the Andante, which were on this occasion, as they had been at all the rehearsals, fearfully out of tune. The audience tried hard for a second hearing of this exquisite movement, but, after some hesitation, Mr. BERGMANN preferred to proceed with the Menuetto.

Besides the Melusina overture of MENDELSSOHN, which was fairy-like, undulating, graceful as ever, we had another overture, to Hans Heiling, by MARSCHNER, a composition full of vigor, pleasing melodies, and rich instrumentation, which was very favorably received. BADIALI sang two arias from VERDI'S Attila and MERCADANTE'S Normanni in Parigi, with his usual magnificent voice and excellence of rendering. The MOLLENHAUERS gave us one of their astonishing duets, and Edward rendered very finely the first part of a violin concerto by VIEUXTEMPS, a work of very great merit.

And so we have bidden farewell to the Philharmonic orchestra for another six months, heaving a sigh as the last notes of the Symphony died away, that so long a time must pass before we hear more of the same sort. We shall not, however, be quite bereft of our orchestral music before we scatter for the summer; one rich treat is promised us, in the shape of a concert by Mr. EISEL in the early part of next month. At this, the circulars say, calling it a "vocal, instrumental, and dramatic" concert, the whole of BEETHOVEN'S music to Egmont will be given, in connection with a dramatic reading. Rumor connects the names of some of our first artists, but as nothing is yet certain, I will not mention any of them at present.

There have been several concerts in the last week or two, as various in the character of the music performed as in its execution. The best of them have been the Sunday concerts. SCHUBERT'S Symphony and MENDELSSOHN'S in A minor have been performed at these, besides overtures and minor pieces of more or less merit. MASON and BERGMANN have advertised two soirées on the plan of their matinees. At the first, last Tuesday, BEETHOVEN'S Quartet, Op. 95, and that of SCHUMANN for piano and stringed instruments, were performed, with some solos by Mr. Mason, and a couple of songs which were quite spoilt, by Miss BEHREND. For the second one, to-morrow, more quartets of Beethoven and Schumann are advertised, with singing by Mrs. Brinkerhoff, which is certainly no attraction. GOTTSCHALK, in consequence of a disabled finger, has been obliged to suspend his soirées for a while.

APRIL 29th. The last of EISEL'S Soirées and of MASON'S Matinees came off respectively on Saturday evening and this afternoon. The former was one of the most enjoyable concerts we have had this season. Mozart's third Quartet, in B flat, and a Quintet for stringed instruments, in C minor, began and ended the programme—each a perfect specimen of its composer. Mr. BURKE took the first violin in the second piece, and although his playing might have been clearer and truer in some portions, yet the admirable manner in which he brought out an exquisite melody in the finale, which he had alone, must have delighted all. The members of the "Glee and Madrigal Union," i. e., Mr., Mrs. and Miss LEACH, and Mr. FRAZER, gave us a charming quartet of Mr. Eisel's, "A voice from the lake," and one of Dr. Callcott's glees very finely, and the soprano and tenor each sang a solo besides. The remaining number was Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor, in which the piano part was taken by an "amateur lady," who acquitted herself exceedingly well, and played with wonderful ease and self-possession, and yet at the same time in a very modest and unassuming manner. She is a young married lady, who, under her maiden name, was well known as one of the two best lady players—pupils, the one of SCHARFENBERG, the other of TIMM—in town.

She proved on this occasion that she had not lost her claim to this reputation in changing her name.

At the matinée we had, first, a curiosity in shape Beethoven's 13th Quartet, (one of his best works, if I mistake not.) which has, I believe, never been played before in this country. I found it much more comprehensible than I had supposed. It is unusual in form, consisting of six parts: 1. Adagio, Allegro; 2. Presto; 3. Andante con moto; 4. Alla Danza Tedesca; 5. Cavatina; 6. Finale, Allegro. Of these, the four middle ones were the most attractive—the Cavatina particularly beautiful. Mr. MASON played some solo pieces: his pretty "Silver Spring," charming little "Lullaby," and immensely difficult "Etude de Concert," and the piano part in Schumann's Quintet for piano and string quartet, Op. 44, a very fine composition. The Andante: "in modo duna Marcia," is to me almost unsurpassed in its kind. Of the singing on this occasion, the less said the better. Mad. v. BERKEL, "prima donna from the principal theatres of Germany, and of the new (future) German Opera in New York," must give the uninitiated but a miserable idea of those same "principal theatres," and of the promises for German Opera here. All the good I can say of her is, that she sings true, and evinces considerable skill in some of her floriture. Otherwise she is beneath criticism, and her gestures and motions while singing must strike every one, as they did me, as supremely ridiculous.

The above mentioned "Glee and Madrigal Union" are about to give a series of concerts at a very low price, for the production of old English music of the kind which their name denotes, as also ballads, duets, etc. Their voices harmonize finely, and as there is much that is beautiful and interesting among these compositions, much pleasure may be derived from these entertainments.

Music at Nazareth Hall.

BETHLEHEM, PA., APRIL 28. Your humble servant having been kindly invited to a musical evening given by the tutors of this venerable institution, and presuming you would have no objections to hear reports in matters of music from any obscure corner of the land where Euterpe may choose to fix her abode, I take the liberty of sending you a few notes of silent observation.

The edifice known as Nazareth Hall was built just a century ago, for the use of Count ZINZENDORF, and has been occupied, with some small intermission, for nearly ninety-seven years, as a boarding school for boys. Its history has therefore become somewhat eventful and even classic, and the poetry of age begins to surround it and its venerable grounds.

The reunion spirit has been awakened among its old pupils, and during the two past summers many of them have assembled here to live over in imagination old events, and realize once more many of the heart's lost and forgotten emotions.

But let us now to the music and the subject in hand. The principal music teacher of the Hall, Herr AGTE, aided by Mr. BECK and others, has opened a course of agreeable and genial soirées, held in the little chapel where the boys usually assemble for devotional and recitation purposes. Here, in company with the pupils as listeners, and in part performers, we met to enjoy a programme of classical and well selected music.

The opening Pot Pourri, a duet for the piano from Robert le Diable, was agreeably and skillfully performed by Messrs. AGTE and KLUGE, a composition which every critic might designate by his own peculiar fancy or idiosyncrasy, but which I will simply characterize as Meyerbeerian. A good English song by RUSSELL, "Man the life-boat," was well sung by Mr. Beck, to the no small delight and approbation of the ladies, so much so that they would have it repeated. Then among the "Airs Ecossais," Herr Agté gave us, in an extremely sympathetic vein and gentler touches of feeling, "Robin Adair," on the violoncello, accompanied by Mr. Kluge on the piano. Herr Agté is decidedly a virtuoso on the violoncello, and although he possesses the most versatile powers in several departments of music, he is most appreciable on this finest of all instruments. Although we have never yet heard him produce those remarkable flageolet notes which rendered KNOOP's instrumentation such a phenomenon, yet he responds to your inmost movements of musical thought by the precision of delivery and delicacy of touch that constitute the life of the violoncello. We next had a good selection of morceaux from FÜRSTER, STUNZ, MENDELSSOHN, DE BRIOT, WEBER and others, which rendered the entertainments of the evening chaste, joyous and spiritual.

The song: "Der Krieger und Sein Ross," by HOELTZER, is a sombre but popular piece here among us, and was well received by the select little audience. Then came, in conclusion, UHLAND's well known Wanderlieder, sung in Quartet by four of the gentlemen, calling up all the truly German feelings of that natural part through the interpretation of the equally German tone-master, VON WEBER.

The boys of the Hall were quite enthusiastic in their appreciation of the Wanderlieder, sung by as excellent a representation of the Vaterland as you could easily imagine.

The associations of the locale of this chamber concert are also of interest, as in this very chapel, somewhat modernized in contrast with its former appearance, the sounds of real and classic music have had an utterance for nearly a century. Here the "Creation" was performed upwards of thirty years ago, and all the good old symphonies of HAYDN, including one which brings up pleasant memories in the mind of your humble correspondent, by the extinguishing of lights until the last taper burnt alone, to the final cadences of the solitary violinist; and when his last sounds died away, he cast darkness over the scene by putting out his own light. We have the gratifying hope stored away that Herr Agté's Soirées are but the beginning of good things to come, and hope also, for the pupils' sake, that these ambrosial evenings may come often and increase in the interest they inspire.

Your special correspondent from these parts had indulged the expectation of sending you some account of ROSSINI's Stabat Mater, performed by the girls of the Bethlehem Boarding School, and which rumor spoke exceedingly well of; but the earth and heavens being unpropitious on the appointed day, the writer could not attend. When the next great musical feat shall come off, "may we be there to see.

Very truly yours,

T. H.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., APRIL 4. Thinking it might be interesting to yourself and your readers to know what kind of a place California is in regard to music, I will tell you what I have seen and heard in the four or five weeks I have been here. I left Boston on the last of January with many regrets, feeling it would be a long time before I should enjoy the delightful music of such concerts and operas as we had there. But I am agreeably disappointed to find much good musical taste and good music here in this new country.

I have attended two concerts of a series of six given by the "Germania Society;" and when I tell you the programme consisted of the compositions of Weber, Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn, and three movements from Beethoven's Grand Symphony in C minor, one or two lighter compositions to vary the performances, you will decide with me in my estimate of musical taste.

The orchestral performances, by thirty musicians, who seemed to feel what they had to do, were excellent, and, judging from the goodly number present, I should think, were well patronized. A flute solo by Mr. KOPFRTZ, I think was superior to any thing I ever heard upon that instrument.

The vocal part of the performance was decidedly poor. There is at present only one good female singer here—Signora GABATI, whom I have not yet heard. This is the first attempt of this kind, giving a series of concerts, and it meets with general satisfaction. One great trouble here I would were obviated; that is, the lack of good pianos. I heard, a few evenings since, a fine performer execute Mendelssohn's Concerto in D minor, upon an instrument said to be the best to be had. O how my ears ached for a sound something like those elicited from one of Chickering's Grands!

Mr. Atwill, formerly of New York, tells me he sells much first class music here; so all or any of your publishers and music dealers must not suppose the Californians will purchase any thing Bostonians would refuse.

One thing I must not forget to mention. We have here a musical prodigy, a native Californian guitarist, who executes wonders, having all the facility that Ole Bull has on the violin, and performs the "Carnival of Venice" with quite as much effect. Four years ago he had never seen a guitar. He reads music with considerable facility, but is able to play melodies and harmonies, after hearing them performed by an orchestra, accurately.

I think an English Opera company might do well here; can you send one?

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 3, 1856.

Mendelssohn's Organ Sonatas.

We have received from the publisher, J. A. NOVELLO, London and New York, "Six Grand Sonatas for the Organ," composed and dedicated to Dr. F. Schlemmer, by FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY. Op. 65." It is a work of rare interest and value, and the cheapness (see advertisement) of the edition, which is one of the most beautiful specimens of English musical publications we have seen, should place it in the hands of every student of true organ music. For true organ music it is, although it partakes enough of the form and character of some of the best piano-forte sonatas, to justify its title. The six Sonatas show the thoroughly Bach-ian culture of Mendelssohn; they breathe the spirit of Bach and the old chorale and fugue music, mingled with something of the form and something of the spirit of the modern romantic and even dramatic sonata style of Beethoven. Not precisely following the usual sonata division and sequence of three or four movements, they are nevertheless composed each of several movements related by the same sort of inner spiritual tie.

Among the thousand and one "improvements" kindly suggested in the newspapers for our late Beethoven Festival, the most amusing was, that it ought to have commenced with a Sonata of Beethoven, played upon the organ! Were there to be a Mendelssohn festival, the ingenious critic might be gratified. Here we have Sonatas written for the organ, by one in whom the art and spirit of the grand old organists resided as in no musician of these latter days. What Mendelssohn writes for the organ is surely organ music. A few very general directions are given in the composer's preface, and occasionally in the Sonatas themselves, as to the selection of stops or registers. We could wish these had been more precise, considering the various shades of feeling and dramatic contrast in the music. As to the special contents of the several Sonatas we cannot give the reader a better idea than by translating from an analysis by another distinguished German organist, A. G. RITTER.

"Sonata No. 1 (Allegro moderato e serioso, F minor, common time,) begins with full, strong chords, of a general and introductory character, which lead in the eleventh measure into a principal thought, which bears such an expressive stamp of character as to justify the epithet speaking. It is the sad complaint of a soul oppressed, sounding out in tones ever louder and more anxious, as the dreaded fate draws near. Then, after a close in C minor, there resounds a choral-like sentence, borne on angel voices. It brings comfort from the heavenly heights. To be sure, it is interrupted, now for a shorter, now for a longer time, by the more and more warmly wrought leading theme; to be sure, there is a tone of complaint even in itself; but soon the song of consolation rings out at a victorious height, far above all earthly sorrow. In soft chords, and then borne on by the mighty stream of the full organ tone, it closes the first part. Still it is no jubilant song of triumph. The minor third reminds us of the painful conflict just endured. It is only in the following Adagio (A flat major, 3-4 time,) and in the Recitative, which forms the transition to the last movement, that the heart finds rest. Complaint is silent. In tones as glad as mortal breast can feel, exults the redeemed (Allegro assai vivace.) Flashing, fiery chords resound in animated motion, borne on the roaring flood of bass. And as the heart, filled with lofty joy, strives in vain in its first enthusiasm after definite expression, and only finds the right words when it is more calm; so the chords at first sweep vaguely to and fro, but gradually gain in connection and in grouping, till they finally compass the jubilant melody, which now sounds on and on, below, above, and leads at last into the full, luminous F major chord with the Third above. Here is the proper conclusion of the whole. The arpeggi which now follow, filling four bars, and not entirely suited to the organ, are to be considered an appendix.

"The second Sonata opens with an introduction in C minor, (Grave, 4-4,) which leads, through a long organ-point upon the Dominant, into an Adagio, also in C minor. Here the thinking player has an opportunity to employ the different Manuals to advantage. The Adagio, with a characteristic and discriminating treatment of the several key-boards, (including the Pedal,) forms an orchestra-like movement. The melody, played by the right hand on the second Manual, is delivered by the wind instruments; the violins, accompanying in flowing, song-like passages, are represented on the first Manual by the left hand; finally, the basses—the Pedal—indicate the ground-tones pizzicato. * * * To an Allegro maestoso e vivace, (3-4 time) which, with all its musical beauty, to our feeling borders somewhat on the secular, succeeds a dignified, simple, and yet artistically developed Fugue, which brings the piece back to the true ground.

"The third Sonata, next to the first our favorite, and bearing in its poetic tendency a certain resemblance to the first, raises itself, supported by an interwoven chorale as if by a verbal text, to a truly dramatic expression; but for this very reason it presents the greatest technical difficulties, since of necessity just where the idea of the creative artist is so clear and definite, admitting of no shade of modification, the interpreting artist must hit exactly the right point if he would seize the true intention of the former. In bright chords, a full and swelling movement opens the Sonata, expressive of calm and joyful trust. A short solo passage of the same import is answered by the full choir in the still brighter and more flashing F sharp major, till the whole leads back through the Dominant into the prevailing key, and closes the brief movement. This is immediately followed by a movement in A minor, marked Un poco meno forte. The real Mendelssohnian theme :

maintains, by the twice recurring superfluous Fourth, just the right hostile, soul-disturbing expression, to be set against the Chorale afterwards delivered by the Pedal: Aus tiefer Noth schrei ich zu dir. Whether the leading character of this theme above noticed, being more suited for stringed instruments, can also find its fitting representation on our present organs, is a question which the player has to solve in view of the mechanical structure of said organs. With the direction: "Da questa parte fino a Maggiore poco a poco più animato e più forte," there enters an accompaniment to the Chorale in sixteenths instead of in quavers, as before. Finally, to the ever-increasing movement the Pedal too is added, after it has held out for a long time the concluding tone of the Canto fermo in an organ-point. While the Manuals repeat the main progression of the theme in full chords and in the highest registers, it burrows down in wild and thundering passages into the depths, to rise again from the ground-tone of E, through the tones, F, G sharp, B, d, f, g sharp, b, to the high d. Gentler and gentler it sinks gradually down from there and leads back again to the first movement, in A major, which, except some few but very effective and significant changes, (for example, in the fifth and sixth measures,) is repeated almost literally. The Andante tranquillo which now follows, also and with propriety in A major, closes the whole like a silent, deep-felt prayer of gratitude."

We must reserve the description of the remaining three Sonatas until next week.

CONCERTS.—Our musical season is now fairly over. Oratorios, Orchestral, Chamber music, each and all have made an end of it, and nothing more remains except such scattering, miscellaneous concerts and virtuoso visitations as a large city is exposed to in all seasons of the year. There is some hope, however, of Maretzke's Opera troupe, about the middle of this month. The week past has afforded two good concerts, bringing both the Classical Quartet and the Orchestral series to a worthy close.

Mr. WILLIAM KEYZER, the veteran violinist, and whilome leader of the old "Academy" orchestra, in the days of our first hearing of the Seventh and other noble symphonies, had a very large, intelligent, enthusiastic audience at his concert in the new Mercantile Hall, last Saturday evening. It was a marked testimonial to his long-trying character as a musician and a man. The Quartet by HAYDN, one of the last and best of the eighty, was played with great spirit and truth by Messrs. KEYZER, SCHULTZE, ECKHARDT and WULF FRIES. Our old friend bore the leading violin part throughout the whole evening, and surprised all by the energy and fervor of his playing. In the Adagio his breadth of tone, and well-sustained, expressive cantabile were quite remarkable. The Quintet by SPOHR, for piano solo, with quartet of strings, is one of the freshest and most enjoyable compositions of that master which we have ever heard. Mr. GUSTAV SATTER played the piano part with rare perfection; nothing could exceed the delicate precision, grace and brilliancy of those long passages in thirds and sixths. It was received with the warmest plaudits. It was with great regret we had to lose what doubtless was the most important feature of the programme, the Double Quartet by SPOHR, which we hear was highly relished by the best judges.

The sixth and last AFTERNOON CONCERT crowded the Music Hall. Beethoven's C minor Symphony, the old favorite, was played with remarkable spirit and effect, especially the last movement, which even made the gabbling fiats and butterflies listen awhile in spite of themselves. The overture to Oberon, whose romantic and imaginative charm wears even better than MENDELSSOHN's fairies, was beautifully rendered. The Andante to HAYDN's Ninth Symphony was new to us, and certainly one of the most pleasing and un-commonplace which we have heard. The dance pieces and the Zanetta overture of course were sunshine to the butterflies.—It seems a pity that these concerts cannot go on for another month; but we are told that the full hall does not always pay. To the managers, the orchestra, and especially to Mr. CARL ZERRAHN, the indefatigable, able, ever gentlemanly and conciliatory leader, our musical public is under lasting obligation.

New Music.

Prelude for Piano and Violin, or Violoncello, by C. C. PERKINS, pp. 7, (Nathan Richardson.) The piano part is simply what the name denotes, a prelude, consisting of the same arpeggio figure uniformly repeated in each measure, only the chord varying. Upon this background, after a few bars, the violin enters in a sweet, chaste, serious melody, in sustained notes, always legato, and only tasking the expressive art of the performer. It is an unpretending, pleasing little salon piece, free from ordinary clap-trap and poor sentimentality. Toward the close the piano part acquires more energy and fulness, and becomes polyphonal.

DE MONTI's favorite Mass, in B flat, with an additional Alto part and English Words. pp. 40. (O. Ditson.) Another of Mr. Ditson's uniform large octavo edition of celebrated masses. Of the composer we know nothing save what here appears. It seems to be one of those light, easy, warbling, almost secular masses, which are much in use here in our Catholic churches. You are constantly reminded of the lighter movements in Haydn's masses; but it is only a weak dilation of Haydn; Haydn has ideas, musical invention, richness of modulation, and occasional passages of imposing depth and grandeur; here it is all one level of sweet commonplace, with solos of a warbling and popular character, the charm being altogether melodic. Doubtless most congregations and most choirs would feel that they could better spare a better mass.

If the above belongs eminently to what is called the voluptuous and "secular" style of church music, we have here something from the opposite direction:

"The Psalter Noted, by the Rev. THOMAS HELMORE, M. A., carefully compared and made to agree with the Psalter of the Standard Prayer Book of the Church in the United States of America, by the Rev. E. M. PECK, M. A." (New York: J. A. Novello.) This is a Manual for the musical guidance of the responses of the congregation in the recitation of the psalms in the English Episcopal Church. It is the simplest form of Ritual Music. The 150 psalms are printed in small book form, under an old-fashioned staff of four lines, and over each syllable is set a note in antique characters. The object, as set forth in the preface, "has not been to obtain that which would please and amuse the curious, but to restore to the use of the Church Catholic these simple and sublime melodies, which are the most fitting accompaniments to our incomparable Liturgy, and which formed the Ritual Music of ancient days."

Les Vêpres Siciliennes—VERDI. Mr. Ditson has commenced publishing a series of eight selections from the last opera of Verdi, which was so popular in Paris. Nos. 5 and 8, now out, are two Romances: "Ami! le Cœur d'Hélène," and "La brise souffle," &c., with English version by THEO. T. BARKER. They are in a sweet, quiet, simple vein of melody, for Verdi, especially the last. Both are kept within moderate compass, saving the elaborate cadenza at the end of No. 5.

Music Abroad.

London.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The younger Philharmonic took the lead this year. The first concert was given in the Hanover Square Rooms, April 2, Dr. WYLDE conductor. The novelties of the programme were two compositions by MOZART, but recently brought to notice. The Times says of these:

The "sinfonia" in B flat for violin and viola (concertante would be a better name) is not only attractive as a relic of Mozart, but recently made known to the world; it is a composition of rare merit, and an extremely happy specimen of the master. The combination of solo instruments is unusual; and the orchestral score, in which the only wind instruments written for are oboes and horns, is equally worthy of notice, as an example of how much Mozart was able to do with small means. The accompaniments display astonishing variety, and set off the solo passages—which are brilliant, effective, and admirably dovetailed—to the highest possible advantage. The form is that of the symphony—invariably adopted by Mozart in his concertos—M. SAINTON and Mr. BLAGROVE, who undertook the principal instruments, played to perfection. The Litany is a work of greater pretensions than the "sinfonia," although not equally well balanced. The choruses, from the Kyrie to the end, are splendid, superior, indeed, to anything in the masses, and occasionally—as in the Tremendum ac vivificum, and the Pignus futura glorie—rising to the level of the Requiem itself. The Vaticum in Domino in which an old Gregorian melody (Pange lingua gloriosi) is given to the soprano voices, in unison, as a canto fermo, and accompanied in the most ingenious manner—must also be cited. The "Pignus" is one of the greatest specimens extant from the treatment of the words, "Miserere nobis," as an episode which becomes incessantly an interruption, and at the same time a relief to the contrapuntal progress (secundum artem) of the chorus. The execution of the Litany was unfortunately just as bad as that of the concertante was good. The chorus was sadly deficient; and this hitherto little known example of the glorious genius of Mozart has, consequently, yet to be appreciated. The solo vocal parts were intrusted to Madame Rüdersdorff, Miss Rüdersdorff, Mr. G. Perren, and Signor Gregorio.

The other selections were the overtures to Egmont, Freyshütz and Le Domino Noir; Beethoven's Symphony No. 4; Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto in G minor, played by CHARLES HALLÉ; Chorus of Derwishes, Beethoven; Air: Hat man nicht Geld, from "Fidelio"; and Scena from Spohr's Faust, sung by Mme. RÜDERSDORFF. The orchestral pieces were, it is said, extremely well performed. But it is encouraging to hear an English critic complain of the concert as "a third too long!"

OLD PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—These concerts commenced later than usual this year. There are to be only six, instead of the usual eight, concerts, and without reduction of price of season tickets. Professor STERNDALE BENNETT is the conductor, to the joy of the anti-Wagner-ites; and Mme. JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT has volunteered to sing one evening, which the Times thinks almost equivalent to insuring the whole expenses of the season. Mme. SCHUMANN (Clara Wieck) was the star of the first concert, which took place April 14th, with the following programme:

PART I.
Sinfonia in C minor (dedicated to the Philharmonic Society).....Mendelssohn.
Recitative and Aria: "Dove sono," (Nozze di Figaro).....Mozart.
Concerto in E flat, Piano-forte, Madame Clara Schumann.....Beethoven.
Overture (Don Carlos).....Macfarren.

PART II.
Sinfonia in A, No. 7.....Beethoven.
Recitative and Aria (Il Giuramento)....Mercadante.
Solo, Piano-forte (variations sérieuses), Mme. Clara Schumann.....Mendelssohn.
Overture (Preciosa).....Weber.

Mme. CLARA NOVELLO was the vocalist. The Times is delighted with Bennett's conducting, but says the orchestra has suffered by the loss of four of its best violins, (Sainton, Blagrove, Dando and A. Mellon.) It also complains of the want of graduation of power, of pianissimo, in the symphonies, and of the taking of some of the tempi too slow. Of the pianiste it says:

The novelty of the concert, and the great point of interest was the first appearance in this country of Madame Clara Schumann, the wife of Herr Robert Schumann, the well-known composer. This lady, many years ago, as Mademoiselle Clara Wieck, won universal renown in Germany. She was acknowledged to be the most admirable performer of her sex in the whole of that very musical and metaphysical country; and, what is still more to her credit, has retained her position undisputed ever since. Of all the famous continental pianists, Madame Schumann is the only one who has obstinately remained a stranger to England. Better late than never. Her performance last night more than justified the reputation she has so long enjoyed. Madame Schumann is not merely an accomplished and admirable executant, but an intellectual player of the highest class, with a manner and expression of her own as original and unlike anything else as they are spontaneous and captivating. We have never yet heard a lady play the E flat concerto of Beethoven entirely to our satisfaction; nor, so far as the opening movement is concerned, can Madame Schumann be said to have broken the spell; it wanted breadth, it wanted fire, and, above all, it wanted grandeur. All the rest, however, was enchanting. The slow movement was expressive throughout, the rondo sportive, capricious, and varied with exquisite delicacy and unerring taste. The applause at the end was not a bit more hearty than was due to the merits of the performer. In the "17 variations" of Mendelssohn Madame Schumann was quite as successful. Without accompaniments she evidently possesses as much the power to charm as with them. Mendelssohn has composed nothing to which it is more difficult to impart the proper expression and effect than these variations; but either Madame Schumann must have heard him play them very often, or she instinctively feels them as he felt them, since the style in which she executed them—except that in two or three places she took the passages faster (too fast)—was almost identical with his own.

ELLA'S MUSICAL UNION has entered upon its twelfth season. The first concert (April 2) was distinguished by the first appearance in London of the great Parisian violoncellist, FRANCHOMME. The programme consisted of Mozart's 7th Quartet in D; Beethoven's do. in F, op. 18; and Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor. M. HALLÉ, pianist; M. SAINTON and Mr. CARBODUS, first and second violin; HILL, viola; FRANCHOMME, cello. The News says:

It will be seen that, in the selection of these fine pieces, their fitness for bringing out the talents of the accomplished stranger was kept in view. In all of them the violoncello plays a prominent part, full of striking effects and beautiful solo passages. M. FRANCHOMME's performance was exquisite in every respect. We have heard greater strength and volume of tone, but never, we think, such a combination of sweetness, delicacy, and vocal quality. It was often like the singing of MARIO or GARDONI. And this tone had the further fine quality of blending charmingly with those of the other instruments. In style, phrasing, and expression, M. Franchomme's performance was perfect. The other performers, too, played their best, and we could not even imagine a more exquisite performance of all the chefs-d'œuvre we have mentioned.

In addition to his part in the concerted pieces, M. Franchomme played a short solo, consisting of a slow movement composed by himself, and a "Ballade" of Chopin's, arranged by him for his instrument. These he executed with the utmost grace and delicacy. M.

HALLÉ also played a pianoforte solo in his usual admirable manner.

Mr. Ella's excuse for the want of novelty in his programmes is not flattering to the composers of the day. "To those," he says, "who for the last thirty years have played or listened to the standard works of Haydn, Mozart, or Beethoven, more novelty in our programmes would be welcome; but among a pile of expensive music purchased by us for examination, with the exception of a few untried works by Spohr, there is not a single concerted piece that could stand comparison with the earliest production of the last of Nature's favored sons in the classic soil of Germany—Mendelssohn. In the present dearth, then, of creative genius, we must be content to repeat known and admired chefs-d'œuvre."

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Mr. GYE, in spite of the loss of Covent Garden Theatre, has issued his prospectus. He retains all the artists whom he had engaged, and announces performances, until further notice, at the "Theatre Royal of the Lyceum." The personnel is composed of Mmes. GRISI, JENNY NAY, BOSIO, (whom the London Court Journal calls "the most elegant, facile and brilliant of modern singers,") DIDIE, MARAI and TAGLIAFICO; and MM. MARIO, TAMBERLIK, (before his departure for Rio Janeiro,) GARDONI, GRAZIANI, LUCCHESI, TAGLIAFICO, POLONINI, ZELGER, HERR FORMES, RONCONI and LABLACHE. Conductor, M. COSTA. The star of the ballet will be Mlle. CERRITO. The repertoire consists of Rigoletto, La Gazza Ladra, Il Trovatore, Il Matrimonio Segreto, Il Barbiere, I Puritani, Norma, Lucia, La Favorita, Fidelio, Don Giovanni, Il Conte Ory, L'Elisir d'Amore, Don Pasquale, Lucrezia Borgia, and La Traviata, Verdi's last. To open April 15th, with the Trovatore, DIDIE, &c.—Mr. Gye, to employ his expensive company, gives twelve concerts at the Sydenham Crystal Palace; he underlets the Lyceum on the off nights to RISTORI. He further announces that he is about to take measures for the erection of a new Opera-house, with a large concert hall attached.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Mr. LUMLEY takes advantage of the Covent Garden catastrophe to try his fortune in opera once more, and has been to Paris to engage singers. The rumor that JENNY LIND has overcome her aversion to the stage enough to consent to sing for him, is scarcely to be trusted. JOHANNA WAGNER, too, and VIARDOT GARCIA are mentioned among the probable engagements. But the following appear so to be the only facts really known about it:

The prime donne engaged are ALBERTINI, PICCOLOMINI, and ALBONI, who re-appears after an absence of five years from London. Alboni will open the season on the 6th of May. Piccolomini will arrive on the 10th, and will soon afterwards appear in Verdi's last opera, La Traviata, which is new to this country. Albertini will arrive on the 18th of May, and will appear in a few days afterwards in the character of Leonora in the Trovatore,—Albani performing the part of Azucena, the gipsy. Albertini is a young Englishwoman, whose great powers as a singer and actress have recently created a strong sensation throughout Italy. In addition to these, there is a young lady of remarkable beauty and great promise, named FENOLI, and GIUDITTA RIZZI, a first rate prima donna, besides two seconde donne who are not named.

The tenors will be, SALVIANI, who has a remarkably fine voice, and sang the Prophète at La Pergola for forty nights, indeed during the whole season, with the greatest success; BAUCARDI, whose plaintive voice was heard some years ago at Her Majesty's Theatre; and CALZOLARI, already a favorite in London, who has just returned with fresh laurels from St. Petersburg. The baritone BENEVENTANO, who has a fine voice and is a first-rate actor(!), is likewise engaged. There are also the basso VAIRO, the buffo ZUCCONI, and other performers of note.

DRURY LANE.—The new operatic company, under the management of Mr. J. H. TULLY, opened with Il Trovatore, in English; Mrs. EASTCOTT, as Leonora; Miss FANNY HUDDART, Azucena; Mr. AUGUSTUS BRAHAM, Marico; and Mr. HENRI DRAYTON, the Conte di Luna. Everybody was recalled at the end of every act. After the opera a "musical magical sketch," entitled Marguerite, adapted from Goethe's poem, with music by Mr. Tully, was performed. This introduced Miss FANNY REEVES and Miss DYER, as Faust and Marguerite.

Concerts of every description are announced in such abundance, that we can barely mention the half of them. Mr. HULLAH gives "Orchestral Concerts," with an orchestra of fifty members, every Saturday evening, at St. Martin's Hall, and at the shilling price. He gives classical and modern music, with singing by Mrs. SHERRINGTON, SIMS REEVE, CLARA NOVELLO, &c. Among other novelties, Mr. Hullah was to bring out a new oratorio, entitled Jephtha and his Daughter, by Herr RHEINTHALER, a young German composer, lately arrived in England.....COSTA's oratorio, Eli, was to be again performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society on the 25th; principal singers, Mmes. VIARDOT and CLARA NOVELLO, Mr. SIMS REEVES and Herr FORMES.....HAYDN's birth-day was celebrated at the Royal Panopticon by a performance of his "Creation." The Monday evenings are to be devoted there to similar performances.....STERNDALÉ BENNETT has commenced his twelfth season of classical Chamber Concerts.....The "Reunion des Arts" (Sir GEORGE SMART, president,) is giving Soirées of a mixed character; and Mr. W. H. HOLMES, with his pupils, Piano-forte Concerts, in which Concertos by LITOLF, GADE, REINECKE, GOLDSCHMIDT, and other young German composers, alternate with works by older masters. Chamber Concerts also are announced by Mr. WALTER MACFARREN, by Mrs. JOHN MACFARREN, by Mr. and Mrs. ALFRED GILBERT, &c. &c.Orchestral Concerts are in progress by the "Amateur Musical Society," (HENRY LESLIE, conductor,) by the "Royal Academy of Music," and by the "Orchestral Union," (ALFRED MELLON, conductor.).... Mr. BENEDICT's annual concert, with the usual interminable length of miscellaneous programme, and all the great artists under the sun, from Mme. GOLDSCHMIDT down, was announced for the 21st inst.

Advertisements.

CONCERT BY THE GERMAN TRIO,
C. Gartner, C. Hause & H. Jungnickel,
On SATURDAY EVENING, May 3d, 1856,
At the Rooms of Messrs. Chickering,
ASSISTED BY MISS PAULINE MAIDHOF.

PROGRAMME.

- PART I.
1. Second Trio, Op. 15, For Piano, Violin and Violoncello, A. Rubinstein.
2. The Castle on the Sea, ("English and German," translated by Longfellow,..... Uhländ. Miss Pauline Maidhof.
3. Third Concerto, Op. 44, for Violin,..... De Beriot.
PART II.
4. Scherzo, For Piano, Violin & Violoncello,..... J. Brahms.
5. Grand Fantasia, For Violoncello,..... Kummer.
On Favorite Themes, from Meyerbeer and Molique.
6. Lafayette en Amérique, Reading in French, by Miss Pauline Maidhof.
7. Grand Fantasia for Piano,..... Liszt.
8. Musical Reverie, for Piano, Violin and Violoncello.
[Tickets $1.—To commence at 8 o'clock.

THE GOLDEN WREATH.

A Choice Collection of Favorite Melodies, designed for the use of Schools, Seminaries, Select Classes, &c. Also, a Complete Course of Elementary Instruction, upon the Pestalozzian System, with numerous Exercises for Practice. By L. O. EMMERSON. 24 pages. 16mo. Bound in boards, leather back. Price, 25 cts.

This is a new book, and judging from present appearance, will be the most popular work of its class published. There is an exceeding aptness about the instructions, and an attractiveness in the melodies that will at once commend it to all for whom it is designed.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
U. S. HOTEL.

Communications can be left at Mr. Ditson's music store.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALOH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

The Latest Publications of
J. A. NOVELLO.
ORIGINAL LONDON EDITIONS.

Novello's Complete Folio Edition.

BINK'S PRACTICAL ORGAN SCHOOL,
Op. 55. Carefully revised and corrected; with the German directions and terms translated into English. Price $8.75; or in Six Parts, 75 cents each.

PART I, price 75c., contains—
PREFACE.
Nos. 1 to 12. Short and easy pieces in two parts.
" 13 to 24. " " three parts,
" 25 to 36. " " four parts.
" 37 to 66. Preludiums, in various keys, for soft or loud stops.

PART II, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 67 to 122. Exercises for the pedals.
" 123 to 144. Twelve Chorales, or well-known German Psalm Tunes, with variations.

PART III, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 145 to 169. Fifteen easy Postludes, or Concluding Voluntaries, in the Fugue style.

PART IV, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 160 to 174. Fifteen Postludes, or Concluding Voluntaries for alternate manuals, in the Fugue style.

PART V, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 175 to 181. Seven Preludes and Fugues.
No. 182. The Flute Concerto.
" 183. Variations on "Heil dir Sieges Krans," or, "God save the Queen."

PART VI, price 75c., contains—
Nos. 184 to 192. Nine Preludes and Fugues.
" 193 to 194. Fantasia and Fugue.

Please to order Novello's Edition, and quote the prices.

MEINELSOHN'S

SIX GRAND SONATAS FOR THE ORGAN.

New Edition, complete in one Book, $1.75, or singly, as follows:

No. 1. Price 44c.	No. 4. Price 88c.
2. " 25c.	5. " 25c.
3. " 25c.	6. " 81c.

Composed and dedicated to Dr. F. SCHLEMMER, by FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY. Op. 65.
J. Alfred Novello, London and New York.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY

FOR THE DIFFUSION OF

MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

Vol. 8. Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition with the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering. (Former price $5.25c.) In paper wrappers, $1.18c. By mail—$1.20c.

Volumes of this series already issued.

- Vol. 1. Cherubim's Counterpoint and Fugue, $1.68c.
" 2. Dr. Marx' General Musical Instruction, 1 68.
" 3. Fête in Choir and Chorus Singing, 88.
" 4. Mozart's succinct Thoro' Bass School, 21.
" 5. Catal's Treatise on Harmony, 63.
" 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected writings on Thoro' Bass, Harmony and Composition for self-instruction. Vol. 1. Harmony and Thoro' Bass, price 88c. Vols. 2 and 3. Guide to Composition, 88c., each. Three vols. bound in one complete, Cloth Boards—$2 68c.

J. A. NOVELLO,
Sacred Music Store, 389 Broadway, New York.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 18 MARION STREET, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

Apr 29 BOSTON. 57
MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

ED. B. ROBINSON,
PIANO-FORTE TUNER.
Orders received at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington Street.

NEWS'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER,
Will be happy to give instruction in Piano-forte and Organ playing, and the Theory of Music. Address:—
No. 8 Hayward Place. May 26. 57

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
[PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE
—GIVES—
INSTRUCTION on the PIANO-FORTE,
And may be addressed at her residence, 55 Hancock St.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
245 Washington Street, Boston.

MR. AUGUST PRIES,
Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

G. ANDRÉ & CO'S
Depot of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

[A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. [Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (128 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 214.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 6.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I. "
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O. "

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by
JOHN S. DWIGHT, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court
of the District of Massachusetts.]

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Translated from the French of Madame Dubreuil, for the Journal of Music.

OMISSION.—The following important sentence, at the conclusion of the note in the beginning of the last chapter, was accidentally omitted:

"You shall soon hear from me and others who interest you still more."

CHAPTER VII.

THE CHERRY RIBBONS.

I do not absolutely believe in fate nor in instincts, and yet I am forced to believe in something which seems like a combination of both, a mysterious power, which is not unlike the attraction of destiny.

It happens sometimes in our life as if we crossed great magnetic currents without being borne onward by them, but towards which we rush ourselves, because our peculiar nature seems admirably predisposed to receive the influence of that which is our natural element, although long unknown and misunderstood. When we are drawn along by this irresistible power, it seems as if everything conspires to make us yield to the sovereign impulse, and that all around us tends towards it in such a way as to cause us to deny chance; in short, that the most natural circumstances, at other times insignificant, exist, only to press us towards the goal of our destiny, whether it be an abyss or a sanctuary.

The following facts seemed for a long time wonderful to me, and were nothing more than the meeting a circumstance corresponding to my ennui and uneasiness.

My coachman was married not far from the frontier, near Briançon, to a young and pretty wife, from whom he was often separated by his profession. I told him that I wished to go towards France, and I desired it because my route must be the very opposite from Milan, and also because I had heard a few vague rumors upon the recent passage of Celio through the country in which I was travelling. My vetturino saw that I did not know exactly where to go, and as he wanted to go to Briançon, he naturally took the road by Susa and Exille, crossed the frontier with the Dora, and entered into the department of the High Alps by Mt. Genève.

As we drew near Briançon he asked me if I did not intend to stop a few days, with the tone of a man determined that I should; and as I hesitated to answer him before I discovered his design, he told me that his youngest horse was ill and would not eat, and he was afraid he should be obliged to send for a surgeon to bleed him. I got out of the carriage and examined the horse; his eye was clear, his breathing calm; he was no sicker than the other.

"My friend," said I to master Volabù, (that was his name), "I beg you to be sincere with me.
You want an excuse to stop, and I am not obliged to wait for you. I shall not want your carriage if you do not want me. All I ask is to reach Briançon. There I shall determine what to do, and shall have at my disposal all the requisite means of travelling. If you insist upon leaving me here, (we were not more than five leagues from Briançon,) I may also insist upon your proceeding, for I engaged you for eight days. Be frank then, if you wish me to be kind.
In these environs you have business which concerns either your purse or your heart, and that is why your horse does not eat."

The honest man began to laugh, and then he bent his head with a melancholy look.

"I am no longer young," said he; "my wife is only eighteen, and I would have liked to surprise her. She only lives a short distance from here, in a place they call the Wilderness. By the cross road we can be there in a half-hour; the road is good, and since you like to stop anywhere, to walk at random in the snow, you will see a fine place there and fine snow, or the deuce take me! We shall start again to-morrow morning, and we shall be at Briançon before noon. There,
I have been frank, and will you be a good child?"

"Yes, since that was my agreement. Start for the Wilderness! The name pleases me, and the cross road too. I like those landscapes which are not to be seen on the highways. But, comrade, what if you should take a fancy to stay longer with your wife? What if your horse refuses to eat to-morrow?"

"Will you trust to the word of an old soldier, mon bourgeois? We shall start to-night if you like."

"I will trust you," answered I; "go on!"

You will know soon, dear reader, whither he conducted me, and you can tell me if in my fit of good-natured loitering, which impelled me to yield to his caprice, there was not something which a more presumptuous man might have called divine inspiration.

And in the first place, the clever Volabù had not deceived me. The scenery through which he led me was both grand and simple, and enchanted me
the more that I had not counted upon my guide's discernment of the picturesque. No doubt it was his love for his young wife which made him instinctively like the country in which she lived.
He wished to prove himself grateful for my kindness by showing me all possible hospitality.

He possessed a few acres of land and a very neat cottage, whither he drove me, and when he had found his young housekeeper at work, very gay, very good, and very pure, (that was easily seen by the unfeigned joy with which she threw her arms about his neck), there was nothing which they did not do for me. They made great exertions to prepare a better repast than I could have had at the village inn, and when I told them I should be satisfied without so much trouble, they declared it was none of my business, which meant that they should lodge and board me gratis.

I left them at their frying, intermingled with sweet words and loud kisses, that I might admire the surrounding view. It was simple and superb.
Steep hills, serving as a first approach to the great mountains of the Alps, all covered with pines and larches, encircled the valley and sheltered it from the north and east winds. Beyond the village and half way up one of the nearest and most sloping hills, stood a proud and ancient castle, probably an old frontier defence, now a peaceful and comfortable dwelling; for I saw,
from the fresh look of the oaken window sashes, framing large and clear panes of glass, that the old mansion had a civilized proprietor. A vast park, nobly thrown on the slope of the hill, the harsh outline of its boundaries veiled by that excess of vegetation becoming so rare in France, formed one of the happiest parts of the picture.
Notwithstanding the severity of the season, (it was the last of January, and the ground was covered with hoar frost,) the evening was mild and pleasant. The skies had that rosy flush peculiar to frosty evenings; the snowy horizon glittered like silver, and the soft, pearly clouds awaited the sun, slowly sinking to plunge into them at last. Before hiding himself in these soft mists, he seemed to long to smile once more upon the valley and shed upon the high roofs of the old castle a ray of purple, which transformed the sober and moss-covered slating into a dome of resplendent brass.

As I was dressed according to the weather, I took great delight in walking upon the glistening snow, brightened by the cold, and crackling under my feet. As my shadow fell upon the broad surfaces, hardly marked by the footsteps of birds, I studied attentively the greenish reflections which were cast by this dazzling white, beside which ermine and swan's down would seem yellow and soiled. I now thought only of painting, and thanked Heaven for turning me from Milan.

In walking along, I drew near the park, and could see the great lawn, outlined by black walls, stretching before the castle. They had modernized the surroundings of this severe dwelling by filling the old trenches and raising up the grounds, and in continuing the garden, the lawn and the gravelled walks to the court-yard and to the door of the apartments, as we do in the present time, that we may feel at once the comfort and poetry of castle life. The enclosure was well secured by great walls; but in front of the mansion they were lowered for some thirty metres to allow a prospect of the country. This opening formed a terrace of moderate height and was defended by an exterior ditch. A little staircase, contrived in the thickness of the stones of the terrace, descended to the water, as if to allow the gardeners to draw therefrom in the summer. As the water was covered with very strong ice, I remarked that it would be an easy matter to gain access to the lordly residence; it seemed that its owners placed great dependence upon the discretion of the villagers, for no precaution had been taken to secure this weak spot of the castle.

As the place seemed deserted, I was tempted to enter it and admire more closely the trunks of those magnificent yews and centennial pines, whose groups formed, within the enclosure, a great many landscapes, just as true, although better composed than those of the surrounding country; but I prudently and respectfully restrained my painter's rashness, as I heard two women approach the terrace, who at a nearer view proved to be two charming girls. I watched them running and frolicking in the snow without their noticing me. Although they were enveloped in cloaks and furs, they were as agile as the white hound which gambolled around them. One of them seemed old enough to be married, although one could see by her insouciance that she was not, and did not think of such a thing. She was tall, slender, fair, pretty, and by her manner of dressing her hair and her attitudes, she recalled to me the marble nymphs which adorned the gardens of the age of Louis XIV. The other seemed still a child; her beauty was striking, although her figure seemed less elegant to me. I cannot tell why I was moved in beholding her, as if she recalled a well known and beloved form. Yet it was impossible then, and has been since, to discover whom she resembled.

These two beautiful girls frolicked so that they passed me without seeing me. They spoke Italian, but so fast, and often both at a time, and every phrase was so interrupted by long and loud shouts of laughter, that I could not make any sense out of their talk. Further on they stopped and pitilessly began to break off superb branches from a green tree. They made a parcel of it, the fair Vandals! and after all left it on the snow, saying:

"Faith! let him come and get them himself; they are too cold to handle!"

They were just passing out of my sight, to my deep regret, I will confess, for there was something exciting and sympathetic to me in the petulant gaiety of those sweet girls, when one of them cried out:

"Good! I have lost his bow, his famous sword-knot, which I pinned on to my hood!"

"Well, what of it?" said the elder; "we can make another; that is nothing!"

"O, he made that himself! he says that we don't know how to make bows, as if he was so very wise! He will scold!"

"Well, let the old cross thing scold!" answered the other.

And both began to laugh, as young girls laugh, without any reason, but simply because they must laugh at something.

"O, there! I see it—my bow! his bow!" cried the child, bounding towards the ditch; "there it is, spread out on the snow. O, the beautiful red poppy!"

She reached the end of the terrace, but just as she was picking up the knot of red ribbons, which I had noticed, she laughed again; a sudden breeze caught it and laid it at my feet upon the ice of the ditch. I took it up to give it to the lovely laughter, and then she saw me for the first time and blushed as red as her cherry ribbons.

"To bring it back to you, mademoiselle," said I, "I must cross the ditch; will you allow me?"

"No, no, don't do that," said the child, in whom a roguish assurance had quickly conquered her first timidity, "it would be dangerous. The ice may not bear you."

"Is that all?" said I; "it would be nothing to risk so slight a danger to do you a service."

I boldly crossed the ice, which cracked a little. In seeing that there really was a little danger, the child blushed and came half way down the steps to meet me. She laughed no longer.

"What are you about? What are you doing there, little sister?" said the other, who had come back for her, and was looking surprised and displeased.

She was evidently a young lady, and had some prudence. She was at least twenty years old.

"You see, mademoiselle," said I, in reaching to her sister the ribbons on the end of my cane, "I stop at the boundaries of your empire. I do not even put my foot upon the first step."

She saw at once that I was well-bred, and thanked me with a sweet and lovely smile. As for the child, she seized the ribbons quickly and motioned to me not to stay on the ice. I turned back slowly, and bowed to them from the other side. They cried out, "Thank you! thank you, sir!" with a great deal of grace, and then I heard the elder say to the little one:

"If he had seen that, how he would scold!"

"Let us run away," answered the child, beginning to laugh, as fresh and clear as a silver bell.

They took hold of hands and ran towards the castle. When they had disappeared, I sought the modest abode of Monsieur and Madame Volabù, somewhat occupied with my little adventure.

I found my supper ready. Had I been Grandgousier himself, they could not have treated me more handsomely. I am afraid Mme. Volabù's poultry yard suffered for it. I could not complain of this prodigality when I saw the air of honest triumph with which these good-hearted people did the honors. I insisted upon their sitting down with me—also Mme. Volabù's mother, Madame Peirecote by name, still a robust virago, who seemed to take upon herself the responsibility of her son-in-law's honor.

I had to keep up a violent combat to keep myself from an attack of indigestion, for my brave vetturino seemed determined to stuff me. As soon as I could obtain any respite, I profited by it to make some inquiries about the castle and its tenants.

"The chateau is very old," said Volabù, with a shrewd look, "and ugly too; don't you think so? It looks like a great dungeon. But it is prettier inside than one might think; it is very well kept and arranged, although the furniture is out of date. There are furnaces in it, upon my word! The old marquis denied himself nothing. He was not very generous to others, but he liked his comfort, and he staid here almost all the year. In the winter he only went to Paris for a short time, never to Italy, although it was his native land."

"And who owns the castle now?"

"His brother, the Count of Balma, who has just become marquis by the death of the eldest. Faith! he is no longer young! It is the fate of our village to have nothing but an old castle and old people in it."

"Bah! youth is not wanting at the castle," said Mme. Volabù; "the new marquis has five children, and the oldest is no older than monsieur here." While speaking, she pointed at her husband, whose eyes were wide open, while his mouth was twisted into a rather laughable pout.

"Oh, ho!" cried he; "M. de Balma has sons now! When I left, only a month ago, he had but one daughter."

"So it seemed then," spoke Mme. Peirecote in her turn. "In that month a large family has arrived—two other daughters and two sons, all handsome as little loves; but what do you care, Volabù?"

"I don't care at all, mother; but at the same time our old marquis is mightily reserved, for I heard him tell the curé that he had but one daughter, she who came with him the day after the late marquis died."

"Very well," said the old lady, "perhaps the others are not his lawful children. That is no sign of a bad heart, to bring them all together, now he is rich and noble. No doubt he means to establish them well, that he may atone for his old sins before God."

"And perhaps they are not his," observed Mme. Volabù.

"He calls them all 'my children,'" answered mother Peirecote, "and they call him 'papa.' It is not easy to find out the exact truth. That house is full of secrets—more than ever now, under the present marquis. Nobody knows anything sure about him. But they say all sorts of things. 'M. de Balma had a brother who died in the Indies,' say some. Others say it is not so. 'The younger brother is not dead, nor so far off as some think. He has changed his name because he has got into debt and committed many extravagances, and it is many years since the marquis would even see him.' Others say again: 'He could not pardon his bad conduct, but he sent him money secretly.' Others answer: 'He never sent any thing. He was too hard-hearted for that. He is not the worst of the two, who is so considered.'

"And can no one throw light upon this matter?" asked I. "Is there no one in the country better informed than you? It is strange that a member of a great family should so suddenly rise from the ground."

"Sir," answered the old lady, "nothing can be found out about them. I will tell you what I know and saw in my youth. There were two brothers Balma, of a Piedmontese family, anciently settled in this country. The eldest was very upright, but not very kind-hearted. The youngest was wild, but not proud. He had no property, and I never saw so handsome a child. The Balmas lived away a long time. One day the oldest came and took possession of the estate, and lived in the castle, without allowing any one to ask questions, and put every one out of doors who inquired for his brother. He lived eighty years without marrying, without adopting any child, or having any relation near him. He died without making a will, like one who thinks: After me comes the end of the world! But lo! the young man arrives with all the necessary deeds to prove his inheritance of the name, the castle, and the large family estate. There are at least two, three or four millions of property. That was something for a man who was, as they say, in great poverty. Poor child! I went to greet him; he remembered me, and was as gallant as if I was but fifteen."

"But this young man, this child of whom you speak, mother—do you mean the new marquis?" said Monsieur Volabù. "Diantre, he does not look like a dandy, however."

"He may be seventy-two years old now," answered Mme. Peirecote naively; "and he has changed a great deal. They say he has reformed, and that his daughter is prudent and economical, which is surprising in people who were supposed to make way with every thing in one day."

"Plague! I should think it high time to reform," cried Volabù. "Seventy-two years! the young man must have put water in his wine."

Seeing that I had finished eating, the Volabùs began to clear off the table, and I drew near the fire, managing to detain mother Peirecote there to make her talk more. I could not imagine why this story of the Balmas so excited my curiosity.

[To be continued.]

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Reminiscences of a Summer Tour.

X.

RETURN TO ENGLAND—RURAL FUNERAL AT FOLKSTONE—THE BIRMINGHAM TOWN HALL AND ITS ORGAN.

Late in the afternoon of a September day I landed, or rather was pitched on shore, at Folkstone. There had been a storm raging for a couple of days previously, which had served to stir up, in an unusual manner, the never too placid channel that separates the envious shores of England and France. Tom Hood has said all that can be said of the horrors of a passage at such a time, and yet, methinks, if I would, I could add another chapter of trying experiences. Even when our dogged little steamer had got quite within the piers on the English side—safe, as I thought, beyond a peradventure, from further troubles, we were again "unsettled all," by a swash and parting surge from old Neptune, that would have done him credit in mid ocean.

It wanted yet two hours of the time for the departure of the train, which I determined to while away in explorations about the town. Those who have had the curiosity to inform themselves in this particular, will remember Folkstone—that portion of it out of the immediate vicinity of the harbor and railway station—as a quaint old place, in a state of semi-dilapidation, with a look of having been asleep since the period of the Middle Ages. A certain air of antiquity pervades and broods over it like a cloud. After a ramble of half an hour, I found myself in the vicinity of a high walled churchyard, enclosing within its ample space a picturesque-looking church,—“one of those rich morsels of quaint architecture,” in the language of Washington Irving, “which give such a peculiar charm to English landscape.” Church and churchyard, like their surroundings, wore the aspect of age and profound repose. A couple of vagabond boys, were balancing themselves on the edge of a tombstone hard by; else there was no sign of life. I passed into the enclosure through a turnstile in the wall. The door of the church stood open and I entered. The clouds had now dispersed, and the sun, near its setting, was throwing a flood of golden light, through the windows of stained glass, upon the floor.

At this point my attention was arrested by the appearance of a funeral train, approaching by a direction opposite to that by which I had entered. It wound its way slowly among the graves, and halted just in front of the church. The retinue was not large; it consisted of the immediate friends only of the deceased, and a few stragglers from the village, attracted thither by idle curiosity. I stood leaning against the porch, but a few paces distant, and could read the lines of sorrow graven on the faces of the mourners. In solemn accents the ritual for the burial of the dead was commenced. It was the first time for many months I had witnessed such an event, except it were attended with popish ceremonies uttered in an unknown tongue. I was never so affected by the sublime and touching burial service of the English Church. Circumstances favored these impressions. The hour of rest after a day's weariness and care—the serenity and beauty of the autumn evening—the distant voice of the sea subsiding from the storm—the almost supernatural repose of the spot—all conspired to lend an indescribable interest to the scene.

I have already given some account, in these pages, of such concert-rooms as I could gain access to, both in England and upon the continent. To this catalogue should be added last, but by no means least, a description of the noble Town Hall at Birmingham, which took the lead among the public buildings constructed with some regard to acoustic principles, in England, and still holds the preëminence. This structure was completed and opened with a grand festival concert in 1834. It stands in a central part of the town. Exteriorly there is nothing to command especial attention. Its interior dimensions are 140 feet in length, by 65 feet in width, and 65 feet in height. It will seat comfortably 2,600 persons, but at the grand Festivals, which are given here triennially, it is made to accommodate an audience of 3,000. The floor of the apartment is level. Its walls are rectilinear, divided, at equal intervals, into compartments, by pilasters, and are surmounted on all sides by a coving deeply groined, which terminates in the flat roof above. The ceiling, which is framed in wood and plastered in the ordinary manner, has panels sunk deeply into its substance. A narrow gallery extends along the sides and across one end of the room. The orchestral platform at the opposite end, is in the same plane as the gallery, being elevated some ten feet from the floor. From this platform the choral seats rise, in a semi-circular form, extending backward to the wall. This stage (or orchestral gallery, it should be called,) will accommodate a band and chorus of 500 performers. Placed against the wall, and partially enclosed in a recess constructed to receive it, stands the magnificent organ, so often alluded to. The front of the instrument projects into the hall eight or ten feet, and is composed of clusters of pipes grandly grouped. There are no chandeliers or pendants, the room being lighted at evening from the sides by gas jets upon brackets placed against the walls. It is warmed by means of hot water cockles beneath the floor, which diffuse a mild and pleasant heat through a series of gratings opening under the galleries at each side. The system of ventilation, which is ample and effectual, is connected with the warming apparatus, and is, in principle, similar to the plan adopted in our own hall.

The total cost of this hall was £56,000, exclusive of the land. Mr. Hansom, the architect, who had contracted to build it for less than half the amount, soon became bankrupt, and was obliged to retire. The town of Birmingham (to their credit be it said) assumed the enterprise, borrowing £25,000 upon the property, and assessing their treasury for the balance. The idea of the structure was first suggested by an association of scientific and music-loving gentlemen, (headed by Mr. JOSEPH MOORE, well known in the musical circles of England,) who determined the principles that should govern its architecture. As originally designed, the figure of the apartment was that of two cubes in juxtaposition, (i. e. 130×65×65), but, at the earnest solicitation of the Festival Committee, for the better accommodation of the organ and the choral forces, ten feet were added to its length. The Managers of the Festival paid £1,100 towards this alteration. The gross receipts of this opening festival, which lasted several days, were £13,000 sterling.

I have before spoken of the Grand Organ, which adorns the Birmingham Hall. For many years it held its place as the largest and most powerful, if not the best, of the British instruments. It has 53 sounding stops, and a total of about 4,200 pipes. The principal metallic pipe (32 ft.), standing in front of the organ, is five feet eight inches in circumference. The largest wood pipe CCC, is twelve feet in circumference, and, in its interior measurement, two hundred and twenty-four cubic feet. Originally the great and choir organs (says Hopkins) were of sixteen feet compass; but these were afterwards altered to the CC or 8 feet range; the great being at the same time converted into a "16 feet manual," in the German acceptance of the term. The organ has a fourth manual, in connection with a combination or solo organ, upon which can be played any stop or stops out of the swell or choir organs, without interfering with their previous arrangement on their separate manuals. The dimensions of this instrument, as it stands in its case, are 40 feet in height by about 35 feet in width, and 15 in depth. Its weight is 40 tons.

The Hall is open on two or more days in the week, between 11 and 12 o'clock, for the exhibition of the organ to strangers, as at Haarlem and Freyburg, in consideration of a small admission fee. Organ concerts are also given, at cheap rates, one evening in the week during six months in the year, which, I was informed, are always fully attended. On these occasions, Mr. Stimpson, the excellent organist of the Hall, presides at the instrument. These exhibitions, I was told by both the organist and the superintendent, yield a sum sufficient to pay the ordinary current expenses of the building.

OPERA LIBRETTOS.

BY MEISTER KARL.

LUCRETIA BORGIA.—[Tune, "Old Dog Tray."]

Oh, once there was a Pope,
Had a daughter, all his hope,
And she was very pretty, but too fast, as one might
And she, too, had a son [say,
Named Gennaro, (i. e. John);
And her name was Lucretia Borgia—
Singing, d'un pescador ignobile
Esser figluol credei;
Maffio Orsini Signora son io
Passi primi anni mei.

Now Gennaro didn't know
If he had a 'ma or no,
But he went into the army and did uncommon well,
Till in Venice, on a bender,
He met a lady, tender

And as gentle as a crab without a shell.
Singing Ama tua madre tenera,
Esser figluoi credei, &c.

Now, while talking and a kissin',
His friends came round a hissin'
And said it warn't becoming to consort with such as
When Gennaro asked "Why so?" [she,
Says his friend, "I'll let you know,"
And pulled away her mask, quite bold and free.

When Lucretia's husband found
That his wife was running round,
And showing of attention to a bold soger boy,
He told a Star to watch her,
And if he could, to catch her,
And to spot the chap he wanted to destroy.

Now Gennaro's friends, when "sprung,"
Used to go it while you're young,
And cut up most owdacious, as history doth tell.
So they went to Borgia's dwelling,
And while hollering and yelling,
They twisted off the handle of her bell.

But trouble came at last,
The Duke got Gennaro fast,
And says he, quite deceitful, "young feller—what
This quarrelling's all folly: [d'ye think?
It's better to be jolly—
Suppose we block the game and take a drink!"

But the worst part of the fix
Which turned up among his tricks,
He made his lady go and put pison in the rum,
And pour it—only think,
For her only son to drink,
And smile and be politeful too, by gum!

But Lucretia wasn't slow,
For med'cine she did go:
And gave it to Gennaro till she'd fixed him off O. K.
Then says she, "my dear," says she,
"If you'll take advice from me,
You'll travel off like winkey, right away."

Then Lucretia gave a supper,
And invited all the upper-ten, which included Gennaro's sassy friends.

Gennaro he went too
For to help 'em put it through,
Though no soup ticket to him the lady sends.

When they'd drunk away sobriety,
And got to being rioty,
They heard an awful growling and saw a curtain fell:
There stood Lucretia Borgia—
Says she, "At this here orgy, You've been pisoned for a stealing of my bell!"

But when Lucretia found
That her son had got aground,
Once again, with her med'cine she wasn't no ways
But Gennaro wouldn't take, [slow.
Then says she, "dear, for my sake,
I'm your 'ma, you know what's good for you, you know!"

"Son' Borgia!" he did cry,
(That means Borgia's son,) "oh my!
That makes the matter worser by a jug full!" he
So the pison got to working, [cried.
And Gennaro got to jerking,
And he rolled, and jerked, and hollered till he died.
Phila. Bulletin.

MUSINGS OVER THE COVENT GARDEN THEATRE RUINS.—Dickens thus quaintly alludes to that great conflagration, and gives his contemplation while witnessing the spectacle:—"If Covent Garden Theatre was fated to be burnt down, the fire should have burst out—provided all could have got away—in the last scene of Le Prophète, with Mario singing the drinking song, surrounded by his beautiful bacchantes, as the flames began to lap and twine about the gilded doors and costly draperies of the palace of Munster. But it was saddening to think of the low, dull, brutal orgy that had immediately preceded, and perhaps hastened the catastrophe. I heard that such a scene of vicious riot and rampant snobbery had never before been witnessed in London. 'It's burst out again over the property room,' said a fireman to his fellow, as they passed. Here was enough matter for speculation connected with departed glories. Many were thinking of the manuscripts, the scores, and the documents destroyed: my mind wandered to humbler things. I wondered at what time was burnt the letter B, that Gennaro cut with his dagger from over the Borgia's door, always of a different color to the 'orgia,' and palpable as to its destination. I wondered, also, how long it took to melt the Norma gong; how soon to consume the fish that were thrown up to the pescatori on the sunny strand of Portici; how rapidly the red candles must have melted that adorned the chandelier in the act of the 'Huguenots;' and whether the 'Der Freischütz' owl winked when the flames deranged his machinery. And I pictured the general and hurried destruction of the Druids' beards, and Mario's long chocolate-colored boots, and the bright breastplate in which Soldi sang the 'Rataplan'—the Somnambula mill-wheel, with the candlestick that Viardot let fall from it, and the padded bricks she pushed aside with her feet when the plank cracked; the sword that Tagliafico cracked across his knee when he declared he was not an assassin; the profile horse of the statue in 'Don Giovanni;' and the pony chaise that brought on Ronconi in the 'Elisir.'"

Ferdinand Hiller.

A correspondent of the London Musical World, writing from Brunswick, March 31st, gives the following account of some recent doings of one of the best musicians of Germany.

Last week was marked by various musical performances worthy of notice. In the first place, the Ducal Chapel most worthily concluded, on Thursday, the series of its Symphonie-Concerte for this year. Herr Ferdinand Hiller, Capellmeister, from Cologne, who had undertaken the direction of the concert, produced his overture to Ein Traum der Christnacht, and his symphony Es muss doch Frühling werden; he performed, also, a pianoforte concerto of his own composition.

Lastly, the programme included Weber's masterly overture in Euryanthe. With regard to Herr Hiller's compositions, of which we had previously received a very favorable account, the opinion of the assembled audience, consisting mostly of excellent judges of music, was decided during the concert, as was proved by their frequent applause. We never joined, indeed, in opinion with greater delight and a more intimate conviction than we did in this case. A great many specimens of tone-poetry (Tondichtungen)—if indeed we can call them tone-poetry—have been presented to us in the course of the present as well as of the past year, but they left nothing for our feelings and our mind save a sentiment of wild discomfort and disconsolate emptiness, and, consequently, a painful longing after some fresh vivifying oasis in the wide and barren sandy desert. To this oasis has the genius of Herr Hiller conducted us, by offering to our notice creations distinguished by profundity and clearness of thought, carried out in a masterly and invariably correct manner, and marked, lastly, by an admirable and noble instrumentation, free from all straining after mere effect. These compositions, without ignoring the present, are connected, in all their attributes, with a period of art, whose productions and influence a more modern race of dwarfs would willingly consign to oblivion, in order to pass for Titans themselves. Into what details shall we enter, after having thus recorded our opinions? We have already given the reader to understand that Herr Hiller's compositions have nothing to fear from the most searching critical examination; we are, moreover, contented with that answer which our heart gives to our question. We will only especially say thus much, that, in the symphony, we assign the first place to the noble Adagio, so full of profound feeling. The pianoforte concerto, a concerto in the highest sense of the word—that is to say, a work of art not made up of a thousand eccentric leaps and jumps, destitute of all inward sentiment—was executed by Herr Hiller, in addition to great technical perfection, with a grace and depth of feeling such as are not to be found among modern virtuosos with few exceptions (one of these exceptions, an artist holding a prominent position, both as composer and virtuoso we may proudly boast of having among us). The performance of the Capellmeister was faultless, and we can, therefore, not do otherwise than conclude this account with the wish that the Symphonie-Concerte of next year may begin in the same manner as those of the present year have ended. I will only add, that, after the concert, an entertainment was given by the members of the orchestra and several lovers of art in honor of Herr Hiller, and that, in the course of the evening he was presented with a laurel wreath. May he look upon it not only as a most appropriate emblem of his talent, but as a memento of the high artistic enjoyment he has afforded the public of this town.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 10, 1856.

M. Fétis on Abuses of the Church Organ.

On the 11th of March a new organ, built by M. Cavallé Coll of Paris, for the Church of St. Nicholas in Ghent, was inaugurated in that city by a grand performance, the organist being the celebrated Parisian player, M. Lefébure Wely. The Ghent Messenger, in giving an account of the effect produced upon the large audience, which filled the church, by the performance of the organist, makes certain remarks to this effect—viz: that the Parisian organist's style has less religious austerity, &c., &c., than that of the German organists, nourished as they are upon classical traditions and principles. "Leaving to the great German masters the Fugued style, he adapts himself to the sensual necessities of the public. In a word, he tries to please, and he succeeds, proof being the warm applause and the bravos which saluted his offertory in C sharp minor, and especially his effect of a storm." The paper also thanks the organizers of the concert for the ingenious idea of lowering the gas in the midst of the storm, which scenic effect added greatly to the illusion."

In an article written for the Musical Gazette of Paris, and headed, "The Organ Mundane, and Sensual Church Music," M. Fétié, the Director of the Brussels Conservatoire, handles this double degradation of the church and the organ in a very righteously indignant mood. His remarks seem so sound that we have been induced to translate them for the Journal of Music. He asks, after reprinting the paragraph from the Ghent paper: "What do you say to that? It is not to you, artists, who are inspired with a pure love of art, men of science and taste, who have like myself the conviction that the purposes of art are only valuable in so much as they conform to its true ends, that I address this question. Like me, you have sighed over the degradation of the art of organ playing in France, as shown in the lists of the "Universal Exhibition." Doubtless you blushed then like me in perceiving the contempt of the strangers who listened to the vulgarities which were poured into their ears on every side. To you I have nothing to say that you do not know as well as myself. But you, Christians, what have you to say about it? You see, it is no longer necessary to possess a style redolent of religious austerity and classical gravity. There is no longer any dissimulation in stating that church music should give satisfaction to the "sensual instincts and necessities." Pagan divinities of Paphos and Lampsacus, Christians, Catholics, undertake to do for you what Julian the Apostate could not with all his efforts succeed in. The recompense of the organist when he has sufficiently moved the sensual instincts of his audience, will be their prolonged bravos and warm applause. God will be no longer glorified in his church, but in his stead, the man, the artist, will be venerated. The congregation, no longer an assembly of faithful worshippers, will become the organist's audience, his public, and no doubt applauders will be hired to magnify the glory of his triumph. And it will not stop here—for to complete the illusion of the storm we shall have a consecration, a communion, with scenic effect, and the Divine offices will be rendered with all the attraction of a ballet. There is no half way possible; if you admit a gross sensualism into religion, there, where man should only approach his object despoiled of his passions, and seeking to elevate himself to an ideal beatitude, religion must disappear and its outward seeming only remain.

"Leaving aside the ingenious intricacies of Art, let us speak only of Sentiment, which lies at the very antipodes of sensuality. Which of us does not remember to have been at some time while at church, deeply penetrated and moved by a prelude, deep and solemn, played upon the lower register of the organ, and serving as introduction to the majestic chant: Tantum ergo. Who has not felt his soul penetrated, at such an hour, by a pure and religious sentiment? Such are the feelings which the organist should seek to excite in the hearts of his listeners—feelings widely separate from sensual instincts and wants. When the Fathers of the Council of Trent wished to furnish music for the church services, they did not dream that the day would come when a share in the worship of God would be openly demanded by such wants and instincts."

He adds towards the end of his article: "None of the French organists are capable of playing the great Organ Fugues of Bach; none of them know what style is, or can distinguish one school from another. All their attention is directed to instrumental effects, oppositions of sonority, and other means of satisfying and exciting sensual instincts. Since the seventeenth century the art of organ-playing has been lost in France. F. COUPERIN was the last of the great organists. Since his time agreeable or surprising effects have been the object in view. The "Storm" effect came in with the eighteenth century."

Mendelssohn's Organ Sonatas.

The analysis in the Leipzig Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, which we commenced translating in our last, proceeds as follows:

"The first movement of the Fourth Sonata (in B flat major, Allegro con brio, 4-4,) consists for the most part in the elaboration of a rather orchestral than organ-like principal theme, accompanied partly by single strokes in full chords, partly by a running motive in semi-quavers, introduced at the very outset. Well as this movement in itself is worked up, and little as it falls short of the effect sought by massive organ music, still it seems to lack the breath that quickens and warms up the hearer. But for this we are fully compensated by the Adagio religioso, which again makes admirable use of the alternate Manuals, and by the Allegretto, 6-8 time, into which it leads, and which is as charming and as tender as only Sebastian Bach's Pastorella can be. A middle voice executes upon the first Manual the ductile accompaniment, written in fleeting semi-quaver figures; the Pedal marks the ground-tone in single crotchets, separated by pauses. The melody, in F major, lies at first in the upper voice, and is also played on the first Manual; then there enters a counter-theme, situated in the tenor and performed upon the second Manual, of a wonderful, romantic expression in its more sombre minor coloring. At last both voices unite in continuous and unbroken companionship, and so the movement ends as a duet. An energetic, skilfully wrought Finale of considerable compass closes this Sonata.

"No. 5 is introduced by an earnest, devotional Chorale, whose perhaps rather artificial closing turns are as remarkable in a harmonic point of view as they are suited to the organ. In the orchestral manner again, but not the less organ-like, is conceived the following somewhat gloomy and constrained Andante con moto, in B minor, with its pizzicato basses, and which finds a fresh and glad solution in the appended Allegro maestoso in D major. The tempo of this Finale must indeed be fiery, but it cannot be taken too fast without compromising its effect upon the organ, which does not admit of very great rapidity in the somewhat piano-like triplet figures here employed.

"The Sixth Sonata contains, besides the plain Chorale: "Our Father who art in Heaven," several variations of the same, a fugue upon a theme taken from the Canto fermo, and lastly, a Finale, Andante, D major, 6-8 time. The Chorale, which belongs to the Dorian mode, is here treated throughout in D minor. The first variation is like so many written by Bach; for three voices, each of which pursues its own self-determined course, entirely characteristic and distinct from that of the others. In the second variation the Pedal has a figured bass in triplets, while the Manual bears the simple Chorale in full harmony. In the third the tenor takes the melody; the Pedal, in a short, fragmentary manner, accompanies the right hand, whose movement is now short and broken, now more or less bound, for the most part duet-wise, in Thirds and Sixths. The two treatments of the Chorale which now follow, in the first of which the Pedal executes the Canto fermo, while in the second it is divided among the several upper voices, have for their accompaniment a figure in broken chords, whose so extended use we cannot altogether like. On the other hand, the Fugue, which follows, with its spirited and lively rhythm, and in its dignified and simple keeping, brings us back to the right ground. With this we would have gladly ended the sonata. Truly beautiful, full of childlike piety and devotion as the following Andante (Finale) in itself is, and much as we recognize the deep significance which the composer meant to give to this movement in this place, yet it seems to us, in its ever modern, although noble coloring, to contrast too strongly with the antique Chorale of Luther, which, as treated in this Sonata, tells far better than the one incorporated in the third. It does not seem to set the right seal on the whole as the concluding piece.

"And so we close our notice of a work in many respects so new and so peculiar. It conceals a great wealth of things excellent and beautiful, and must surely have a weighty influence on our present organ literature, which cherishes the traditional forms more than it does the ancient spirit."

"Superlatives" again.

When Dwight's Journal of Music again has occasion to refer to the "extravagance of eulogy" which, according to the opinion of its editor, is "the common staple of musical criticism in the amiable and independent press of these United States," it may find a forcible illustration, much more forcible than any to which it has referred, in an article in the following number of its own issue, headed "A Compliment to Otto Dresel." What a difference it makes whether "my ox gores your cow," or your ox gores my cow!"

N. Y. Musical Review.

We have carefully read the article referred to, and find that we are quite willing to stand by it. It contains no such "extravagance of eulogy" as we objected to in a previous article upon "Superlatives." It is to be sure a rather enthusiastic description of a private complimentary concert given to Mr. Dresel;—not more enthusiastic than might have been heard from most of the best judges of good music in this city, who were largely represented at that concert. Two thirds of the article related to the compositions performed, (by Mendelssohn, Schumann, Gluck, Weber, &c.) and spoke of them with admiration. Does the Review think that extravagant? The manner in which they were performed, too, was highly commended. Was there more than one opinion about that? Where then was the "extravagance of eulogy"? Point out where "our ox has so gores your cow." Doubtless it was in the high estimate expressed of Mr. Dresel as an artist; and, as the strongest thing we said of him was to call him the "musician par excellence among all who have ever resided among us," we must presume that to be the sore point. All the comfort we can offer is to deliberately repeat the remark. We believe it to be simply true. The statement is by no means extravagant, at least in the sense above referred to. We spoke from sober conviction, not carelessly or lightly formed. Our conviction may be at fault; but in this case it happens to be a conviction which we share with the largest number of those who have had opportunity to judge, and whose opinions are the best worth having on our side. The statement belongs not at all to the same category with those which we had been denouncing as extravagant. We did not hint that Mr. Dresel was another Bach, another Mendelssohn, or even another Ferdinand Hiller, or Liszt, or Robert Franz. We did not make him out a "Michael Angelo" of music! We did not pronounce him "without a rival in the world"; nor did we apply to him any of those wild statements of which we had before cited specimens from the American press. We placed him at the head of the musicians who have resided here. Will anybody undertake to say that any really great musician ever did reside here? Clever and accomplished ones we have and have had; but one need not have risen to the point where he can once be mentioned with the great names, to merit to be acknowledged as the head and master of all the representatives of "the divine art" hereabouts. Call you it extravagant to say so much of Mr. Dresel? Then it is because you know of others here, it may be in New York, who are his superiors. Name them; we shall be too glad and proud to know them and believe so much of them. But no more, if you would persuade us, no more of your Michael Angelos!

A New Piano-Forte.

The New York Mirror of April 30 gives a glowing account of the trial, before a large party of musical professors, editors, critics, &c., of a New Piano-forte, invented and patented by Mr. SPENCER B. DRIGGS, of Detroit, and now of No. 505 Broadway, New York. The improvements claimed are said to be "vital to the future of the instrument." They seem to have proceeded from an attempt to resolve the piano, so far as its body (case, sounding-board, &c.) is concerned, into a variety of the Violin family; to reduce its ponderosity till it shall have all the lightness and vibratory freedom of the belly of the violin. The points of difference between the old and the new instrument are thus summed up by the Mirror.

THE CASE.—In the old system the case is from one and a half to two inches thick; in the new, the case is only half an inch thick.

INTERIOR OF THE CASE.—In the old system the case is almost filled up by large and ponderous blocks of wood for the double purpose of strengthening the case and deadening the vibration; in the new, there is not a single piece of wood inside the case, except the wrest plank, and therefore nothing to eat up or absorb the tone. The strength in the new system is derived from a light upper and lower iron frame, firmly bolted together, which sustains the strains of the strings, which cannot give, nor yield, nor warp, and is entirely independent of the thin case, upon which there is no strain whatever.

THE BOTTOM.—In the old system, the bottom of the Piano-forte is usually made of three layers of wood, each from one and a half to two inches in thickness glued together, forming a body of wood six inches thick, not very well calculated as a sensitive and sympathetic medium for the transmission of sound; in the new, the bottom is composed of a single veneer of wood about the eighth of an inch in thickness, which is rendered stiff and sonorous by being pressed into a strong scantling frame a little too small for it, thus preserving a concave form, like the back of a violin. This highly sensitive sounding medium has a clean sweep of the whole length and breadth of the instrument.

THE SOUND BOARD.—In the old system, the sound-board is glued to the case, and rendered stiff or resonant by ribs of wood traversing its under surface; in the new, its stiffness is secured without the aid of ribbing, by means of a delicate iron frame into which the sound-board, being purposely made somewhat too large for it, is pressed, thus stiffening it, arching it, and imparting to it a vibratory power fully equal, in a larger degree, to that of the belly of the violin. The sound-post, which connects the upper and the lower sounding-boards, and by means of which the slightest vibration of the one is instantaneously communicated to the other, is an entirely new and valuable application to the piano-forte.

THE STRINGS.—In the old method of resting the strings zig-zag upon the wooden bridge, a side-bearing is unavoidable. Side-bearing is thus explained: When the hammer strikes the string, the vibration communicated thereby is perpendicular; but when this vibration meets the bridge, it is checked by the zig-zag thereon, and the string receives a new or side motion. These two opposite motions merge eventually into a circular motion, thereby disturbing the direct vibration, which becomes immediately impure and incapable of evolving the true and perfect individual tone. In the new system, metallic saddles are placed over the bridge, each end being fastened to the sounding-board, on which the strings rest, and through which they pass, in a clear, unbroken run, from end to end, offering no obstruction to the pure and direct vibration, and banishing all side-bearing or impure vibration from the piano forever.

To our understanding the difference in favor of the Driggs' method over the old system is as a Violon, clear and open, as made by the old masters, and one, the same in form, with bottom and sides ten times as thick, filled up with blocks of wood and strings all awry. The illustration is a strong one, but to those who have read carefully the above stated comparison, item by item, it will not seem either forced or strained, but on the contrary, a fair and apposite figure in illustration.

The principle involved is certainly a good one. Whether the practical difficulties of reconciling so much lightness and vibratory freedom with the strength required by the enormous strain of all the wires of a piano, have been really and fairly overcome, is what time alone can show. We derive all our present information from the Mirror, which declares its satisfaction in the most enthusiastic terms:

The tone is wonderful in every respect—in melody, sympathetic, singing quality—in sparkling brilliancy, each note being a point of pure tone, no matter how rapid in its passage—in richness, and sonorousness and power of sostenuto. The bass is like the booming of some great bell, or the satisfying depth of musical intonation of a dozen double basses, but although its power is so great, the purity and the gravity of its tone forbid it being too prominent when in connection with the upper notes of the instrument.

GOTTSCHALK says, that it is the most important improvement he has seen—that with the exception of —'s grand pianos, it is the finest instrument he ever heard.

MASON says, it is a perfect poem in its power of expression and sentiment.

WOLLENHAUPT pronounces it beyond all comparison, the most perfect square piano he has ever played on. We could multiply these oral testimonials ad infinitum.

Musical Chat-Chat.

We are now able to supply bound volumes of the Journal for the past year. Also on hand a few sets bound from the beginning (four years.) Many of our subscribers, who commenced with the second year, may wish to complete their sets from the beginning. We have a large quantity of all the numbers of the first year remaining on our hands, which we will furnish (unbound) at half price.

Concerts are not entirely over, as we were led to declare in our last weekly review. We had barely room in that very number at the last moment to give place to the announcement of the concert of the "GERMAN TRIO," at Chickering's, last Saturday evening. The room was very full. The Trio by RUBINSTEIN, for piano, violin and 'cello, which was played with great spirit by Messrs. HAUSE, GAERTNER and JUNGnickel, seemed to us a much more striking composition than the Quartet which we heard in the winter by the same composer, and appeared to give great pleasure generally. Miss PAULINA MAIDHOFF, a young and pretty German blonde, who recited Uhland's "Castle on the Sea," first in English and then in German, has a sweet and musical voice, and one would think a gift for language, but the rendering was not very spirited. The remainder of the concert we were unavoidably compelled to lose. The German Trio are bound for a summer tour in the British Provinces, where we doubt not they will do not a little to inspire a love for fine chamber music.... The AFTERNOON CONCERTS at the Music Hall, too, have been resumed for three more weeks, by the members of the orchestra on their own account, with Mr. ZERRAHN for conductor as before. On Wednesday they played Beethoven's Second Symphony (in D) for the first time this season. The other selections, including the Freyschütz and Semiramide overtures, and the usual admixture of the dance element, were familiar and good. As to the manner of performance, it is enough to know that it was the same orchestra from which we have been hearing these things all the winter. It is a good season for such concerts, and we wish them all success.

A Musical Service will be given by the Choir of St. Paul's Church, under the direction of Dr. TUCKERMAN, on Wednesday evening next. The object of this performance is to show the decline of Church Music, during the last two centuries, and its gradual approach towards the secular school. Examples in the different styles of the English and Italian schools will be given. The public are invited.

Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON (Musical Exchange) has at last issued the eight "Prize Songs" of the New York Musical Review, to which we have more than once alluded. Our readers will now have an opportunity to judge of them for themselves. They average quite above the common run of songs produced in this country; and two or three of them would hold their place in most of the collections called "Gems of German Song," which have appeared here and in England. We have not time now for a close comparison, which it will be an instructive exercise for each purchaser to make for himself. They are engraved in the most beautiful style of any musical publications in this country, with tasteful vignette title pages, headings, &c., and do great credit to the enterprising publisher.

Music entered largely here into the juvenile festivities of May-day. The Music Hall was filled day and evening by the children of the Warren Street Chapel and their friends, under the kindly auspices of Rev. Mr. BARNARD. Music by the Germania Band, dances, flowers, &c., made summer within, however easterly and cold the wind without. A Floral Concert of children, under the direction of Mr. J. C. JOHNSON, was given at the Tremont Temple.... The operas in New York the two last weeks have been I Puritani, "William Tell," Lucia, Ernani, Norma, Trovatore. Flotow's Martha drew crowded audiences of Germans the two last Saturday nights. To-night the Freyschütz, for the first time, with Mme. LAGRANGE as Agatha. Luisa Miller is in active preparation. BADIALI took his old part of William Tell; Miss BEHREND, the German singer, appeared as Adalgisa. We hear no more said of the Nozze di Figaro.... Mme. LAGRANGE and GOTTSCHALK have been giving a concert with their unaided strength, in Philadelphia, exciting great enthusiasm. PARODI and the STRAKOSCHES are there too, and announce among other things "the extraordinary musical novelty, The Star-Spangled Banner," arranged as a duet. Mr. ARTHURSON is with them. The Harmonia Sacred Music Society (Philadelphia) announce LEOPOLD MEIGNEN's new oratorio, "The Deluge," for the 7th inst.

The Courier and Enquirer speaks highly of the Piano-forte Soirées of Mr. BASSFORD in New York: "Mr. BASSFORD, though quite a young man, has greater command of his instrument than many pianists of mature years who in time past have won great popularity here, and the high appreciation in which his talents are held by those who know them best cannot fail to be soon shared by the public at large."

A successful series of Saturday Afternoon Orchestral Concerts has been given in Providence, R. I., under the direction of Mr. HENRY AHNER—so successful that a second series is to be commenced this afternoon. We have had occasion before this to allude to Mr. Ahner's earnest efforts in the cause of good music in that city, which he has made his home since the dispersion of the "Germanians." He has organized a small orchestra, with which he treats the public to mixed programmes of "classical" and "light" music. The newspapers that were so scandalized at the idea of his Sunday evening concerts of sacred music, now speak warmly in his praise. They have compromised upon Saturday afternoon; so music at all events will get a hearing, and perhaps prove whether it is altogether unworthy of the most sacred seasons. Mr. Ahner is also giving a series of evening subscription concerts, the last of which will come off on the 14th inst., for which occasion he has engaged Miss HENSLEY, Mr. SCHULTZ, Mr. CARL WEISE, the pianist, residing in Providence, and others.

The Worcester Palladium has the following:

The Mozart Society, after their successful closing concert, have counted their gains, and already there is a talk about the production of Haydn's "Creation" for another season. But here is a result of their late efforts, so humble, that no one else will chronicle it. We heard, the other day, a boy on his way home from school, whistling the air of the "Wonderful" chorus, "For unto us a child is born," as accurately as the most fastidious could desire; and a little prattler, at another time, listening to the song of a robin, said: "He's singing 'All we like sheep.'" The Society is sowing seed in new soil. May the seed be of the best!

Musical Journals are springing up in all parts of the country. Two new ones lie upon our table.—The first is the "PHILADELPHIA MUSICAL JOURNAL AND REVIEW," which is issued every other Wednesday, at $1.25 per annum, J. M. WILSON, publishing agent. It is plainly a very near relative of the New York Musical Review, almost twin-like in appearance, and made up largely of the same reading matter, music, advertisements, &c., with the exception of a few columns devoted to musical matters of local interest in Philadelphia. Five numbers are already issued.—The other, and the newest comer, is the "CANADIAN MUSICAL REVIEW," published on the first of each month at Toronto, at 7s. 6d. per annum. "Communications and subscriptions to be forwarded to Mr. GEORGE F. GRAHAM, Professor of Music, Toronto, C. W." From which we infer that that gentleman is the proprietor and editor. Each number contains eight small quarto pages of letter-press, very beautifully printed, and four pages of music. No. 1, for May, contains brief editorials on the importance of Music to the Canadas, on the desirableness of forming Choral Societies, and on music in Congregational worship; a letter from New York; scraps of musical news filling two or three columns; selections, anecdotes, &c.; and notices of new music sent by the (Canadian) publishers. These latter, it is stated, will be "so arranged that parties purchasing music may rely upon being able to select it, on reference to the Review, without any hesitation as to its merits or difficulties." Rather a formidable undertaking, that! The musical portion will be chiefly devoted to the publication of "meritorious compositions by Canadian authors." Success to music in Canada and to the new Review!

A friend learns by private letter that JOACHIM, the great violinist, has married GIESELA, the youngest daughter of BETTINA VON ARNIM, authoress of the celebrated "Correspondence of a Child with Goethe."

"Gamma," of the New Orleans Picayune, writing from Paris, April 3, says:

Dramatic performances are not the only—I should, perhaps, say, are not the favorite methods of amusing company at parties here. Comic singers are more in demand than any other class of performers. For example: Levassor, of the Palais Royal Theatre, makes $12,000 a winter by his evenings in society, for he sometimes sings at three or four parties a night. Some of the other comic singers ask from $20 to $40 a séance, and nearly all of them have engagements; but unless they have a good deal of tact, they cause some droll scenes. Some years ago there was an ex-farmer of lotteries over here, who was trying, by dint of good dinners and splendid balls, to reach New York society. via Paris. Levassor was at all of his balls, and Levassor would invariably sing twice or three times of an evening. "On n'y vient que pour manger votre rôti," that being his newest and most popular song. There was more than one suppressed titter in the room. Last week, one of M. Offenbach's comic singers was engaged at the house of a stock-broker, who is known for the most obstinate operator for the "fall," and, as a matter of course, his friends are chiefly among the operators for the "fall." In the course of the evening he sang the popular song, "La Bourse," which is a biting satire, directed against the operators for the fall. It represents them as ferocious beasts, who delight in their country's misfortunes, who dream of but disasters and catastrophes. No laughs greeted the comic song, I warrant you, and the poor singer, disappointed to death, sunk into his seat, and was unable to raise another note that evening. And a somewhat similar accident occurred recently in one of the most aristocratic drawing-rooms of the Faubourg St. Honoré. Levassor himself was singing an epigrammatic song about old women. In the midst of his song, an elderly English woman, who resembled Mrs. Caudle in person, attire and voice, bounced out of her seat, furious. She abused him in the roundest terms, and walked out of the room with offended dignity. The first feeling which prevailed in the drawing-room was consternation, for "scenes" are rare in well bred parlors; but when the company recalled the odd costume, the queer face and the whimsical character of the departed guest, they burst into a fit of uncontrollable laughter. No one would have discovered the joke if the old lady had not been at the trouble to "wear the cap."

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The journal L'Europe Artiste brings together the opinions of the various Parisian journals upon the recent début of our Boston prima donna, ELISE BISCACCANTI. We translate from a few of them.

Le Moniteur.—"A young lady, of a very great talent, made her début March 16, 1856, at the Théâtre Italien. Mme. Biscaccianti sang the Sonnambula. She has a soprano voice of the greatest compass and the greatest flexibility, which reaches, without any effort, the mi and fa in alt, and plays with passages the most difficult and complicated. She phrases with much elegance, and vocalizes with as much purity as agility. She was warmly applauded and recalled after the finale so dramatic and entraînant, and after the rondo: Ah! m'abbraccia, which she sang perfectly. We regret that Mme. B. arrived so late; prior engagements, it is said, call her to Italy; but she will return hereafter."

Revue et Gazette Musicale.—"Mme. Biscaccianti possesses a soprano sfogato voice, really rare in its extent, its timbre and expression. Never have we heard a sound sustained with more power and purity than her's, twice in the rôle of Amina. She has the instinct of song, she has the fire, the dramatic passion, and we believe her called to take rank among the illustrious lyric artists."

Messenger des Théâtres.—"The public could admire in Mme. B. a beautiful soprano voice, very extensive in compass, very agile, very pure, traversing with extreme facility the higher register, a method elegant and correct, passages of a rare hardihood and irreproachable accuracy, slan, accent, taste."

Le Théâtre says: "Of all the singers we have heard for some years in the Sonnambula, Mme. Biscaccianti is perhaps the only one who has the most approached the perfection that disappeared with the divine Sontag."

La Verité.—"Mme. B. is not only a cantatrice of talent, taste and expression, but she acts with intelligence and a profound feeling of the dramatic situation. She is destined next year to become one of the most precious elements in M. Calzado's troupe."

L'Union.—"Mme. B. came to demand the Parisian sanction of the brilliant successes which she had already obtained. Her hope was not deceived, for she had one of the most sympathetic receptions, and there was decreed to her with one accord the brevet of a great artiste. . . . From the first measures the audience perceived that they had to do with an artist of superior merit; that beautiful manner of phrasing and shading the melody and of caressing the note, that rich and brilliant vocalization, all revealed the artist of taste and knowledge, thoroughly familiar with all the secrets of her art."

We might multiply these citations still further; the same tone runs through them all. Mme. Biscaccianti had intended to sing only once as she passed through Paris, but this success compelled her to appear once more.

Our theatres are taking advantage of their last "good days" to bring out new pieces, for they must press now or the fine spring weather will seduce more people out of doors than their most elaborate paste-board groves and canvas parterres of flowers. What do you think they have brought out at the Ambigu? Paradise Lost, "a drama in five acts," in which Eve appears in paradisaical costume! It is a sort of pot pourri of Milton, De Chateaubriand, De Lamartine, Gessner, (death of Abel,) and reaches an incredible height of sublime—fun! It opens with the fallen angels thrown from Heaven; then comes a revolt in hell, Satan on his throne, &c. Oh! Frenchmen! Frenchmen! what droll animals you are! In music we have had a fair début at the Grand Opera. Mlle Donati, soprano, sent us by Italy. At the Italiens we have had Mme. Grisi in "Semiramide;" "Norma" and "Lucrezia Borgia," with Mario (her success has not been great.) At the Opera Comique, a pretty one act opera by M. Besanzoni, a young composer. At the Theatre Lyrique, a new opera by M. Ad. Adam, for the reappearance of Mme. Meillet. At Notre Dame last Monday, M. Gounod's mass was executed by eight hundred performers: and it rains! concerts—the walls are covered with concert bills.—Corr. of N. O. Picayune.

The Gazette Musicale says: "Never was historical and retrospective music more in honor than just now. DELSARTE, the able singer and professor ultra classic, would fain go to the chamber music of the old French king Pharamond to prove that the past is worth more than the present. It is a conviction like any other, and which has its arguments. For the present he has only gone back to the fourth century, to the hymn of St. Ambrose (Creator alme), to redescend to the sixth century, and let us hear the hymn (Lucis Creator) for four voices, by St. Gregory the great, Pope and doctor of the Church. In the curious concert which he gave us on the 27th of March, this zealous explorer of the music of the past transported us from the fifth to the fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Lulli, Rameau and Gluck were laid under contribution. Francois Delsarte is not only the publisher of this retrospective music in his Archives du Chant—he is the naïve and true singer of it, comical and tragical; he touches you and makes you laugh in the delicious chansons: Languirai-je toujours, mon bon laboureur, as he strongly moves and shakes his audience with terror in the recitative of Medea in the ninth scene of Lulli's Thésée. Mme. Viardot and Mme. Gaveaux-Sabatier lent their aid in the execution of this curious music. * * * * Of all the concerts of the season, this, with its old music, has presented the most novelty."

Advertisements.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.
AFTERNOON SERIES.

At the request of numerous parties the Orchestra have decided to give

THREE MORE CONCERTS, at the BOSTON MUSIC HALL, the first to take place on Wednesday, May 7th.

PROGRAMME of the SECOND CONCERT,
Wednesday, May 14th.

- 1—Symphony No. 9, in B flat,..... Haydn.
- 2—Overture: "Jemondia,"..... Spohr.
- 3—Waltz: "Kammer Hall-Tänze,"..... Lanner.
- 4—Duet from "Norma," (for two cornets),..... Bellini.
Performed by Messrs. Pinter and Heinicke.
- 5—Champagne Galop,..... Lumbye.
- 6—Overture: "La Sirène,"..... Auber.

Packages of three Tickets, 50 cents; single admission 25 cents—to be had at the Music Stores and at the door.
Doors open at 2½—to commence at 3¼ o'clock.

READY FOR DELIVERY.

THE EIGHT
NEW YORK MUSICAL REVIEW
PRIZE SONGS.

The best collection of Songs ever before published in America, the history of which may be found in the Illustrated Catalogue of RICHARDSON'S MUSICAL EXCHANGE (to be had gratis). Owing to the great pressure of advance orders, we have been unable to get these songs ready for delivery before. The following is the complete list:

- No. 1—SWEET AND LOW. By O. Dresel—(took the first prize of $200.)
- No. 2—ONE HEART FOR ME. Author unknown.
- No. 3—WHERE, WHERE ARE ALL THE BIRDS THAT SANG. By Frank Sewall.
- No. 4—MY GENTLE MOTHER'S SONG. By C. C. Converse—(took the second prize of $100.)
- No. 5—THE BABY. By B. D. Allen.
- No. 6—THE FLOWERS. By Frank Darley.
- No. 7—THE PARTING. Author unknown.
- No. 8—SERENADE. By Robert Stöpel.

N. B. These eight songs were selected from 400 which were sent in for competition.
Price 25 cents each.

PUBLISHED BY

NATHAN RICHARDSON,
Musical Exchange, 282 Washington Street.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

ORGANIST.—A Gentleman who has had twenty years' experience as Organist and Conductor of a small Choir, wishes a new situation. Enquire of Mr. DWIGHT at this office.

THE GOLDEN WREATH.

A Choice Collection of Favorite Melodies, designed for the use of Schools, Seminaries, Select Classes, &c. Also, a Complete Course of Elementary Instruction, upon the Pestalozzian System, with numerous Exercises for Practice. By L. O. EXAMSON. 24 pages. 16mo. Bound in boards, leather back. Price, 25 cts.

This is a new book, and judging from present appearance, will be the most popular work of its class published. There is an exceeding aptness about the instructions, and an attractiveness in the melodies that will at once commend it to all for whom it is designed.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
U. S. HOTEL.

Communications can be left at Mr. Ditson's music store.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,
(Imported from England)
389, Broadway, N.Y.

The Latest Publications of
J. A. NOVELLO.

ORIGINAL LONDON EDITIONS.

Novello's Complete Folio Edition.

RINK'S PRACTICAL ORGAN SCHOOL,
Op. 55. Carefully revised and corrected; with the German directions and terms translated into English. Price $3.75; or in Six Parts, 75 cents each.

PART I, price 75c., contains—

- PREFACE.
Nos. 1 to 12. Short and easy pieces in two parts.
" 13 to 24. " " three parts,
" 25 to 36. " " four parts,
" 37 to 66. Præludiums, in various keys, for soft or loud stops.

PART II, price 75c., contains—

- Nos. 67 to 132. Exercises for the pedals.
" 133 to 144. Twelve Chorales, or well-known German Psalm Tunes, with variations.

PART III, price 75c., contains—

- Nos. 145 to 159. Fifteen easy Postludes, or Concluding Voluntaries, in the Fugue style.

PART IV, price 75c., contains—

- Nos. 160 to 174. Fifteen Postludes, or Concluding Voluntaries for alternate manuals, in the Fugue style.

PART V, price 75c., contains—

- Nos. 175 to 181. Seven Preludes and Fugues.
No. 182. The Flute Concerto.
" 183. Variations on "Heli dir Sieges Kranz," or, "God save the Queen."

PART VI, price 75c., contains—

- Nos. 184 to 192. Nine Preludes and Fugues.
" 193 to 194. Fantasia and Fugue.

Please to order Novello's Edition, and quote the prices.

MENDELSSOHN'S

SIX GRAND SONATAS FOR THE ORGAN.

New Edition, complete in one Book, $1.75, or singly, as follows:

No. 1. Price 44c.	No. 4. Price 88c.
2. " 25c.	5. " 25c.
3. " 25c.	6. " 81c.

Composed and dedicated to Dr. F. SCHLEMMER, by FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY. Op. 65.
J. Alfred Novello, London and New York.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY

FOR THE DIFFUSION OF

MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

Vol. 8. Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition with the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering (Former price $5.25c.) In paper wrappers, $1.18c. By mail—$1.20c.

Volumes of this series already issued.

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue, $1.68c.
- " 2. Dr. Marx' General Musical Instruction, 1 68.
- " 3. Fétis on Choir and Chorus Singing, 88.
- " 4. Mozart's succinct Thoro' Bass School, 21.
- " 5. Cappel's Treatise on Harmony, 68.
- " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected writings on Thoro' Bass, Harmony and Composition for self-instruction. Vol. 1. Harmony and Thoro' Bass, price 88c. Vols. 2 and 3. Guide to Composition, 88c., each. Three vols. bound in one complete, Cloth Boards—$2 68c.

J. A. NOVELLO,

Sacred Music Store, 389 Broadway, New York.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 18 MARION STREET, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $80 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

ED. B. ROBINSON,
PIANO-FORTE TUNER.

Orders received at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington Street.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER,

Will be happy to give instruction in Piano-forte and Organ playing, and the Theory of Music. Address:—No. 8 Hayward Place. May 26. tf

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE
—GIVES—
INSTRUCTION on the PIANO-FORTE,
And may be addressed at her residence, 55 Hancock St.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
215 Washington Street, Boston.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,

Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

G. ANDRÉ & CO'S

Depôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,

19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. [Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 215.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 17, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 7.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 223 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row, "
" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I. "
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
" G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by
JOHN S. DWIGHT, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court
of the District of Massachusetts.]

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Translated from the French of Madame Dubéant, for the Journal of Music.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE REVELS.

"And the two young ladies," said I to my old hostess; "do you know them?"

"No, sir, I have as yet only seen them. They have been here but a fortnight, and the last of the young men, who cannot be over fifteen, arrived night before last. This makes the villagers say that perhaps he is not the last, and they do not know where this family will end.
Every one has a word to say. We have to laugh some to console ourselves for knowing so little."

"Then the new marquis has the same mysterious ways as the former?"

"Nearly the same; if anything, worse, for he is doubtless even more interested than his brother in concealing what he has been and what he has done for so many years; but then he is a different man. People begin to believe me when I say the present marquis is the best of the two, and they will do him justice some time. The other one's heart was dried up as well as his person; this one is rather brusque in his manners and detests long speeches. He does not trust to every one; he seems to understand all the tricks and turns of those who beg needlessly; but he seeks information and consults with his daughter, and help comes quietly to those who really need it. The priest has remarked that, and he was so troubled at the arrival of this reported bad man; now he begins to say that the poor have gained by the change."

"Now you are coming to an explanation, Madame Peirecote, and the story gains in morality what it loses in wonder. This proves the old proverb, you know of course: Bad heads make good hearts."

"You are right, sir, and it is sad to say that good heads often make bad hearts. He who thinks only of himself profits no one else. . . .
But still there is enough of the wonderful going on in that house. A great many things have always happened in the Castle of the Wilderness which poor people like me could never understand. In the first place they say that the Balmas are all magicians from father to son, and if they should tell me that the eldest daughter had her share, I should not wonder, for she neither speaks nor acts like other people; she does not dress according to her station; she wears neither plumes nor cashmeres, like the other fine ladies of this country; she is almost as pale as death. The two other young ladies are more elegant and seem gayer; but the eldest of the young men acts like a perfect fool. He talks to himself all alone, and has been seen making frightful gestures; and charitable as the marquis may be, he has rather an evil look. Indeed, sir, you may believe me or not as you choose, but the servants of the castle are very glad to be sent away at 7 o'clock in the evening, that they may pass the night and sleep with their families, for the marquis brought no servants with him to be questioned. Those who are employed at the castle are hired by the day, for all the old servants were dismissed. So, for twelve hours during the night, no one can find out what happens in the castle."

"And why do they suppose that anything does happen? Perhaps the Balmas are merely great sleepers and dread the noise of the office."

"Oh, no indeed, sir! they do not sleep. They go all over the castle, up stairs and down, crossing the old galleries and staying in chambers which have not been inhabited for a hundred years perhaps. They move the furniture, carry it from one place to another, talk, cry, sing, laugh, weep, dispute—they even say that they fight, for I tell you there are riotous revels going on there."

"How is this known, when every one is sent off so early?"

"Yes, and they shut themselves up, bar everything, doors and shutters, after having gone the rounds to see that no one is peeping. The gardener's son, who hid in a wardrobe out of curiosity, barely escaped being thrown out of the window, and he was so frightened that it made him ill, for he pretends to say that the young men,
the young ladies, and even the marquis himself, were dressed like devils, and it made his hair stand upright to see them so, and to hear them say things unlike anything he had ever heard before."

"Ah, that is fine, Madame Peirecote! Now I begin to be interested. Old castles where nothing supernatural happens are good for nothing."

"You laugh, sir; you do not believe me. What if I should tell you that I went as near as I could to listen with my daughter, and saw something?"

"Really! tell me about it."

"Through the cracks of an old shutter, which did not shut so closely as the rest, and which opens into the old guard room of the castle, we saw lights pass back and forth so swiftly that spirits alone could carry them as fast without extinguishing them, and then we heard the sound of thunder and wind whistled through the castle, although it was a beautiful, frosty evening, calm as to-night. Then we heard a loud shriek, as if some one was being murdered, and our blood ran cold. It was only last week, sir! We ran away as fast as we could, for we believed some great crime had been committed, and we did not wish to be brought forward as witnesses, for it hurts poor people to witness against the rich. We could not sleep a wink all night; but in the morning every one was well at the castle; the young ladies laughed and sang in the garden as usual, and Monsieur le Marquis went to mass, for it was Sunday. Only the servants told us they had burned more than fifty candles in the night, and the supper was all eaten to the very bones."

"So it seems that they entertain the devil right joyfully."

"Every night a good supper of cold meats, cakes, confectionary and excellent wines is set for them in the dining room as soon as they have cleared away the dinner. No one knows at what hour nor with what guests they sup; but they are not spirits who live upon air. In the morning the arm chairs are found placed in a circle round the fire in the great parlor, and in the rest of the house there is no trace of the confusion of the night. But there is one part of the castle which has not been used for a long time, which is so locked and bolted that no one can even peep into it. Besides, they have very few servants for so great a house and so many people.
They have received no visitors yet, except the mayor and the curé, and they simply saw the marquis in his own room, without any of the children except his eldest daughter. The young ladies have no lady's maids, and they seem accustomed as the gentlemen to wait upon themselves. The house work is done by women, who go away as soon as they have swept and arranged everything, and you know, sir, that men are so stupid! When there are no women interested in the affairs of a household, nothing can be found out."

"That is really discouraging, my dear Madame Peirecote," said I, hardly restraining a hearty laugh.

"Yes, sir, yes! Ah, if I was young and was not afraid of catching the rheumatism while I watched, I should soon find out what to do. For instance, the other day the girl who makes the beds found at the foot of that of one of the young ladies mis-mated slippers. Let them do their best to conceal everything, they forget sometimes; and, sir, guess what there was in place of the slipper lost during their revels."

"What? a great green toad with eyes of fire, or a horse-shoe which burnt the poor girl's fingers?"

"No, sir—a pretty little white satin slipper, with a bow of pink and gold ribbons!"

"The dence there was! that seems more like a revel. The young ladies must have been to a ball on a broomstick."

"With evil spirits or somewhere; there was a ball too at the castle, for people heard dancing tunes, and the floors showed marks of it; but who were invited? and how did the fine company leave the castle? For neither visitors nor carriages had been seen, and unless the merry guests came down and went up the chimney, I cannot see for whom the young lady should have put on white slippers with pink and gold ribbons."

I could have listened to Madame Peirecote all night, so much did her stories interest me; but I saw that the kind people wanted to retire. I set the example. Volabù showed me his best room and best bed, and his wife favored me with a thousand little services, and they would not leave me till I had assured them I wanted nothing more. Volabù asked me outside my door at what time I wanted to start for Briançon. I begged him to be ready at seven, as I did not wish to be at any further expense to him.

I had not the least inclination to sleep, for it was only seven in the evening, and I had twelve hours before me. A good pine fire crackled in the chimney of my little room, and a large pile of resinous branches on one side, allowed me to keep off the cold breeze which whistled about the loosely swung casement. I took out my pencils and sketched the lovely Mesdemoiselles Balma in the costume and attitudes in which I had seen them; neither did I forget the beautiful white hound, nor the background of immense dark cypresses covered with heaps of snow. All this passed over my imagination more swiftly than my pencil the paper, and I could not resist a sensation similar to that which we feel in reading one of Hoffmann's fantastic tales, in associating these charming figures, so pure, so merry, and apparently so happy, with the strange recitals and fiendish stories of my hostess. As in those German tales angels upon the earth constantly struggle against the snares of an evil spirit, full of envy, anger and sorrow, I saw these sweet children proper, unawares, under the evil influence of some old alchemist covered with crime, who brought them up delicately, that he might sell their souls to Satan, to free his own from some fatal agreement. The little one was yet unsuspecting; the other began to rebel. In the midst of their gayety they seemed afraid of some master whom they dared not name.

"Let the cross thing scold!" they had said.

And then again, when they spoke of my crossing the dangerous ice, the oldest had said:

"If he had seen that, he would scold us."

Was it their father whom they so dreaded, while they pretended to laugh at him? Nothing had proved that they were daughters of this old marquis, restored by magic, after having passed for dead. What did I say? after having probably been dead for fifty years. He must be a vampire. He tormented them every night, and in the morning, thanks to his power, they had forgotten their tortures, and went back to life again. Alas! it would not last much longer, poor little dears! Some morning they would be found strangled in some fountain near the old mansion.

Some realities were mingled with these foolish reveries. I do not know what the ribbons had to do with it; but the pink and golden bow of the little slippers coincided somewhat with the cherry ribbons I had picked up.

"His bow!" she said, "his sword-knot!"

Who in the castle still wore the costume of our ancestors, the sword and the sword-knot? It was really wonderful, and he had made it himself! He pretended that those lovely little fairy hands could not make a bow worthy of him! So this tyrant of youth and beauty was imperious and hard to please! Whether he was old or young, this man of the sword, this knot-maker, was ungallant and unfatherly. He must either be the devil or one of his foul instruments.

A great many fantastic ideas came into my head, but I did not sketch them. Mother Peirecote had breathed the poison of her curiosity into my veins. I thought it must be late, I had dreamed so much in so short a time. My watch had stopped, but the village clock struck nine, and I knew not how to pass the rest of the night, for I did not want to draw; I could not read, and I longed to go out, student-like, to seek some poetical or ridiculous adventure under the castle walls.

First, I wished to assure myself of a noiseless exit, and I found one before I had decided to make use of it. The window blinds moved without creaking, and opened upon a little garden, fenced only by a very low hedge. The house was but one story high. This was so easy and so tempting that I could not resist. I armed myself with a tinder-box, a bundle of cigars, and my leaden-headed cane. I hid my face in a large foulard handkerchief, I wrapped my cloak about me, and, to disguise myself farther, I took down from the wall an old Tyrolean hat belonging to Monsieur Volabù; then I jumped out of the window, pushed back the blinds, and leaped the hedge; the snow deadened the sound of my footsteps. All were sleeping in the village; the moon shone in the sky. I reached the open country by simply going around the outside of the house.

I reached the ditch, which I already knew so well. The night had strengthened the ice. The little staircase was so slippery that I ascended it with difficulty. I resolutely entered the park and drew near the castle like another Alma viva prepared for anything. I touched the glass doors of the first story, which opened upon a long terrace covered with vines, dried up in the winter, which seemed at night like huge black serpents climbing the walls and twining around the balusters. Without hesitation, I mounted the staircase, adorned with large terra-cotta vases, which marked the broad landing on both sides. All the blinds were closely shut; I did not fear being seen from within. I longed to hear those strange noises, those shrieks, those peals of thunder, and the dancing of furniture, with which the old lady had filled my head.

I did not wait long without discovering that something energetic was going on within the house, which seemed so silent and deserted from the outside. Great strokes of a hammer, and the sound of voices, like people arguing together or ordering as they worked, struck my ear confusedly. All this was going on very near me probably in one of the rooms on the ground floor; but the oaken shutters were cushioned with hair and covered with leather, and did not permit a word to reach me.

The bark of a dog warned me to keep at a distance. I left the landing and soon heard the door opened which I had just left. The dog barked; I thought it was all over with me, for the moonlight was too bright for me to cross the smooth ground which separated me and the wall.

"Do not let Hecate out!" said a voice, which I instantly recognized to be that of my youngest heroine. "The moonlight makes her mad, and she will break all the vases on the staircase."

"Go in, Hecate!" said the other, whose voice I also remembered.

She shut the door in the face of the great dog, who warned them of my presence, and groaned at not being understood.

The two young girls stepped out upon the landing. I hid myself under the arch formed by the two ascending staircases.

"Don't put your bare arms on the snow, little one—you will take cold," said the oldest. "Why do you need to lean upon the balustrade?"

"I am tired and I am dying with heat."

"Then you must come in."

"No, no! It is so fine to-night, the moon and the snow too! It will take them at least a quarter of an hour to arrange the cemetery—let us breathe the fresh air."

The word cemetery made me open my ears; the night was so clear that not one word escaped me, and I was about solving the whole mystery, when some one within, annoyed by the barking of the dog, opened the door and let out the miserable animal, who bounded towards me and stopped at the entrance of the arch, enraged by my presence, but kept back by the cane with which I threatened her.

"Oh, how provoking they are to let out Hecate!" said the young ladies calmly, while I was in such a forlorn condition. "Here, Hecate! stop now! you always make a noise for nothing."

"But how enraged she is! perhaps there is a robber about," said the little one.

"Are there any robbers here?" called out the oldest to me, laughing. "Sir Robber, answer."

"Perhaps it is only a spy," suggested the other. "Sir Spy, you are wasting your time; you are taking cold for nothing. You will not see us."

"At him, Hecate! bite him!"

Hecate would have asked nothing better if she had only dared it. Noisy, but timid, as hounds are, she drew back, bristling with anger and fear, although she was large enough to strangle me.

"Bah! it is nobody!" said one of the young ladies; "she is barking at the statue in the grotto."

"What if we should go and see?"

"Goodness, no! I am afraid."

"So am I; let us go in."

"Let us call our boys."

"Yes, indeed! they have enough else to do, and would laugh at us, as usual."

"I am cold—let us go away."

"I am afraid—let us run."

They went in, calling the dog after them. All was tightly closed, and for a quarter of an hour I heard nothing; but suddenly I heard the screams of a person who seemed struck with fear. I heard loud talking, but could neither distinguish voices nor words. Then all was still; then came shouts of laughter, and then silence reigned again; so I got out of patience, for I was numb with cold, and that wretched dog might again betray me if they should want to put their arms on the snow. I went back to the Volabü's cottage, certain that they were not wholly mistaken, and that some unknown and inexplicable work was going on at the castle; and I was a little ashamed at having found out nothing except that they were arranging a cemetery and laughed at all spies.

The night was far advanced when I was back in my little chamber. I spent some time in relighting my fire and warming myself before going to sleep; so that when Volabü came to wake me at dawn, he dared not do it, I was paying so soundly for my wakefulness of the early evening. I rose late. They had had ample time to prepare my breakfast, and I was obliged to accept it for fear of displeasing the good man and Madame Volabü, who had considerable pretensions to culinary talent.

At noon, some business came to my host; he was ready to give it up and keep his word with me; but, without boasting of my adventure, I had a fiasco upon my conscience, and was much less eager to reach Briançon than I was yesterday. So I begged my host to give himself no trouble, and I put off my departure till the morrow, provided that he would allow me to pay him for the trouble he was giving himself for me. This gave rise to great dispute, so truly liberal was he in his hospitality. He would have argued with me for a sou on the journey, had I been disposed to bargain with him; but at home he was ready to set fire to his house to prove his good manners to me.

[To be continued.]

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Reminiscences of a Summer Tour.

XI.

THE PANOPTICON ORGAN IN LEICESTER SQUARE—
ENGLISH AND GERMAN ORGANS COMPARED—RE-TURN VOYAGE—THE ADVENT OF THE INDIAN SUMMER.

Among the most complete and celebrated of the modern English organs, is that at the "Royal Panopticon of Science and Art" in Leicester Square, London. It was constructed by the Messrs. Hill & Co., who were also the builders of the organs in York Minster and the Town Hall, Birmingham. This instrument, by far the largest and most comprehensive in the metropolis, consists of four manuals, each extending from CC to a in alt, and a pedal organ from CCC to f, 32 notes. It contains, also, all the modern improvements, together with some new inventions in mechanism, an improved system of composition pedals, and a pedal for drawing the stops in succession, so as to form a gradual and complete crescendo without the aid of the swell box. It comprises 60 complete registers, among which are many of the novelties of the continental organs never before introduced in England. The wind is supplied from six pairs of bellows, at different pressures. The swell, choir, and solo organs are provided with duplicate manuals, so that several performers may play at once, if desired. The number of pipes is 4,004.

At the time of my visit the Panopticon organ had been just set up in the hall, and was receiving its finishing touches from the hands of its builders. Through the abundant kindness of Mr. Hill, I was permitted to examine its mechanism as thoroughly as I desired. Under his able guidance I was conducted over every part of the structure, and explored leisurely its interior mysteries; descending now deep into its cavernous recesses—now threading along artful and devious passage ways, and anon scaling inaccessible heights with ladders, till I emerged at length at the summit of the vast pile, full fifty feet above its base. I had here an opportunity, for the first time, to become acquainted with the curious mechanism of the pneumatic lever—a contrivance of recent date, by means of which a perfect lightness of touch is ensured, and which should hereafter form a part of every organ of the first magnitude. The powers of the instrument were then displayed by Mr. Best, one of the most celebrated of the London organists. Its tones speak forth with magnificent and telling effect. This with the colossal instrument recently erected by Willis at St. George's Hall, in Liverpool, must be ranked among the greatest triumphs of modern organ-building in England.

It may not be impertinent in this connection, to consider briefly the comparative condition of organ-building, as an art, in England and Germany. My attention has, not unfrequently, been directed to this subject, in my experiences among the famous instruments of the Old World. But it is a subject upon which, in the nature of the case, it is difficult to arrive at results entirely satisfactory and conclusive—much more to speak definitely of them; since of necessity a considerable interval of time must elapse between the opportunities which may offer for the examination of the principal organs in different countries, and even of different specimens in the same locality. In all that pertains to the action of the organ and the mechanical details of its structure, the palm has by common consent been yielded to the English. In this respect, the eminent artists, Hill, Willis, and others, who might be mentioned, would certainly seem to have reached the acme of perfection. But here the Brothers Müller of Breslau, and the Messrs. Walker of Ludwigsburg, are but little if at all behind. More of the grand improvements in the mechanism of the instrument have originated in England. On the other hand Germany has been more prolific in originating and diversifying the striking and splendid tone effects embodied in the complete organ during its progress through a series of generations back. The pneumatic lever and the perfected bellows-action are copied by Walkers from the English specimens. The Messrs. Hill, in the Panopticon instrument, have in their turn taken from the former his famous crescendo and diminuendo pedal, which was attached to the colossal organ at St. Petersburg fifteen years ago.

But in purity and opulence of tone—in the felicitous combination of stops—in beauty of expression and telling grandeur of effect, the surpassing excellence of the German instruments (the best of them) is placed in my mind beyond a doubt. I cannot better express my own feelings and views in this respect, than by quoting the language of Chorley in his admirable work on Modern German Music. "I will not libel any musician," he prefates, "by asking him if he be fond of the instrument. The farther removed he be from personality in his preferment of Art—the more devotedly addicted to thought in its noblest, if not most excursive flights—the more exquisitely will he relish, the more eagerly will he return to those grave and sublime pleasures—to those oracular utterances, as it were, in which musical truth and poetry, of the highest order, make themselves known." Speaking of the Silberman organ in the Sophien-Kirche, or Evangelical Church at Dresden, he says: "The sound of the first handful of keys put down, informed me of the neighborhood of something surpassing after its kind; never heard I pipes of such a ripe and fascinating sweetness of tone, from the lowest elephant pedal C to the skylark C altissimo;—no hissing, no wheezing, no lumbering, no growling—none of that ferocity of sound which makes some of our famous English specimens surgical to the ear. Compared, indeed, with aught in modern organ-building, the Silberman instruments at Dresden" (and he might have added with equal truth the splendid structures at Hamburg, at Frankfort, at Stuttgart, and elsewhere, of both ancient and modern build) "are what the sumptuous ruby glass of the middle ages is to the ripest-red piece of new Bohemian manufacture. Only a few weeks before, I had been listening to our own noble organs, at Christ-Church in London, and in the Town Hall at Birmingham. A few weeks afterwards I was admiring a magnificent musical structure in progress of erection in the Cathedral of St. Denis; so that I was not without some opportunity of comparison to warrant me in simile-making; and it is to be remembered that, as regards tone, the difference between player and player is little to be felt in the case of the instruments in question." "Subsequent experience and opportunities for comparison," he adds, "would dispose me to emphasize rather than mitigate the foregoing panegyric." "If Music" he discourses in another place, "had as many poetical, as the art has practical writers, a more fascinating subject would hardly be found than a pilgrimage to the great Organs of Europe—with their localities, their histories and their associations duly counted. For the instrument is like a church or other edifice—a thing which becomes of itself a shrine of resort and recollection, gaining thereby an adventurous and legendary and progressive interest."

Leaving London by the express train at five o'clock one murky evening, I reached Liverpool at eleven the same night, and the next morning stepped aboard the steamer "homeward bound." What a blessing if we could but sleep away the long and dreary interval between shore and shore! At least so it would prove to me, who, in my state of bodily discomfort at such times, can find nothing of interest in the eternal monotony of the sea. And I need but look around at my fellow passengers, and note their listless inactivity, to convince me that this feeling is shared by nine tenths of all who make the voyage. What trivial circumstances go to make up the incidents of each day's life on shipboard! What small accidents become the absorbing topics of conversation and attention! Fortunate, indeed, is he who descries a sail on the distant horizon; or who can swear that he saw but now a whale's back, or the snout of a porpoise above the brine. He is straightway the cynosure of all eyes—a very Captain Cook in importance, in the estimation of the whole idle community abaft the smoke pipe. See, upon the pilot house, yonder, a fellow idler at the end of "a long string," having at its other extremity a hook baited with a piece of raw pork. For four mortal hours he has patiently watched, without winking for a bite, though from what, "or fish or fowl," he is conscious of no preconceived idea. And his chance of success is paralleled only by that of the Noddy in the ancient rhyme, who "Went a fishing

For to catch a whale;
And all the water he had got
Was in his mother's pail."

(I am aware that the analogy does not hold if we take into consideration the extent of the field of operation in the two cases employed.) Such in the main, were the stirring incidents of our voyage.

The arrival at Halifax, and the couple of hours range about the dismal town was an event to be chronicled with delight. There is a remark attributed to Edward Everett, when he had seen the wonders of all lands, that, after all, the architecture of the good old Boston light-house hath not its superior in attractions. This, in my mind, is based on sound philosophy. And it recurred to me with especial force as we neared the shores of Massachusetts Bay on this mellow October evening. The sound of the sea, at length, had ceased. Its surface was now like a mirror. The sun had sunk low into the hazy atmosphere. A few golden clouds lay in parallels along the western horizon, and a light breeze came to us from the land with a musical cadence, laden with the breath of forests. It was the greeting of the Indian summer—

"That beautiful season
Called by the pious Acadian peasants the summer of All-Saints!
Filled was the air with a dreamy and magical light;
and the landscape
Lay as if new created in all the freshness of childhood;
Peace seemed to reign upon the earth, and the restless heart of the ocean
Was consoled."

SCRIBE.—M. Scribe was left an orphan at an early age, with a pittance of $400 a year; his guardian desired him to study for the bar, but the footlights fascinated him, and he has been faithful to them above thirty years. He works—and has worked—every day of his life, from five o'clock in summer, and six o'clock in winter, until ten o'clock of the morning, when, as he says, his day's labors are over, but the whole of his life is taken up by the stage; for his social commerce, the long hours of rehearsals, his business relations, are all turned to the profit of the theatre; he is always on the lookout for new characters and situations, suited for comedy or drama; he takes notes of good sayings and subjects of pieces, wherever he finds them. He observes and listens more than he speaks.

He has written 400 vaudevilles, operas comiques, comedies, dramas and ballets, and has earned a fortune of $600,000 by his pen, a fortune which is so rapidly increasing, he will probably leave an estate at his death of more than a million of dollars. M. Poirson, the founder of the Gymnase Theatre, early divined his talent, and monopolized it by a curious contract. By it M. Scribe engaged to write for twelve years for that theatre exclusively, twelve new pieces a year, and he not only fulfilled his contract, but several times presented eighteen new pieces in a twelve-month.

At the expiration of these twelve years, M. Scribe was at liberty to cease writing for the Gymnase, but he was under an engagement that he would not during his life write any pieces for the secondary theatres. He still receives, and has received, for a great many years, his annual pension of 6,000*f.* from the Gymnase theatre, exclusive of his percentage on his pieces played there, and of the premium he receives for a new piece. It was, as M. Scribe often confesses, this contract, which made it impossible for him to work for the secondary theatres, that engaged him to write for the grand opera and French comedy.

M. Scribe spends the winter in Paris; during the summer he travels three or four months for the triple purpose of recruiting his health, affording him pleasure, and enlarging his sphere of observation—with profit to his dramatic labors. For many years he passed away the spring and autumn at a villa near Meudon, but of late years, these periods of the year are spent in a fine chateau in Brie, which for the last eighteen years he has been building, rebuilding and embellishing, as the retreat where the last years of his busy life shall flow away, tranquil and happy, among his books, his family and friends.

M. Scribe determined to exhaust several times all the letters of the alphabet as the initial letters of his plays: hence the strange titles—Xacarilla, Yelva, Zee, etc. He delights in theatrical performances; where he amuses himself by re-casting in his mind the pieces he sees played; and when he witnesses the performance of some of his old pieces, whose plot has escaped his memory, he criticizes himself, follows with curiosity the vicissitudes of the plot, and as a catastrophe approaches, he tries to think how he will extricate himself from it.—Paris Corr. of the Atlas.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

THE LION'S RIDE.

FROM THE GERMAN OF FREILIGRATH.

Desert monarch is the lion! Would he through his realms go riding,
Down to the lagoon he wanders, in the lofty sedges hiding,

Where gazelles and cameleopards drink, his reedy ambush making,
While above the lofty beast the shadowy sycamores are shaking.

When among the Hottentots' low kraals the evening fires are glowing,

When the Table Mountains' colored fluttering flags no more are blowing,

When the solitary Kaffer hurries o'er the wide Karroo,

When the antelope in thicket sleeps, and by the stream the gnu;—

See! along the moonlit desert comes majestically marching

The giraffe, within the dark and sad lagoon his heated, parching

Tongue to cool, and panting o'er the desert's naked stretches hasten,

There with out-thrust neck to kneel and suck from out the slimy basin.

Suddenly the rushes rustle—on his back, with roar arousing,

Leaps the lion. What a rider! Was there ever richer housing

In the imperial harness chambers, mid the choicest trapping counted,

Than the spotted runner's hide is, where the king of beasts is mounted?

In the muscles of his shoulders greedily his teeth are planted;

On the giant courser's neck the rider's tawny mane is flaunted;

With a hollow shriek of pain he wildly starts and flees affrighted.

See! the swiftness of the camel with the leopard skin united!

Down the moon-illuminated level how his light, swift feet are rushing!

From their sockets start his eyeballs, wildly strained, and, trickling, gushing

O'er his brown-bespeckled shoulders, great black drops of blood are sweating,

And the vast and silent desert listens to his quick heart-beating.

Like the cloud that Israel's children to the promised land went guiding,

Like a spirit of the desert in an airy vortex striding,
Like a wind-spout sweeping onward o'er the desert's stiffened sea,

Whirls a yellow, sandy column, following swiftly where they flee.

In their wake the vulture follows, croaking on, with whirring pinions;

On their track the hyæna follows, plunderer of the dead's dominions,

And the panther, who amid the herds of Capeland brings disaster;

Blood and sweat attest the fearful progress of their savage master.

They behold their monarch swaying on his living throne, and rending

With his sharp, fierce claws the checkered cushion over which he's bending;

And the doomed giraffe must bear him, till his strength exhausted fail him;

With a rider like the lion, what will plunge or rear avail him?

Staggering on the desert's edge, he with a gurgle falls, and dank, wet, Smear'd with sweat and gore, at last the steed becomes the rider's banquet.

Eastward far o'er Madagascar morning twilight glimmers brightly.

Thus unto his empire's limits rides the desert monarch nightly.

W. W. S.

Goethe on Dilettantism,

OR PRACTICAL AMATEURSHIP IN THE ARTS.

(From "Essays on Art," by GOETHE, translated by SAMUEL GRAY WARD.)

[Translator's Introductory Note.—In giving a translation of this singular work, it seems desirable to say a few words by way of presenting it to the reader in the right point of view. It may be said, that in this country we have nothing of that wide-spread Dilettantism, that forms so remarkable a feature in European civilization, and that, whether it be good or evil, we are too busy a people to anticipate its having any deep hold among us. But whoever reads with attention this masterly short-hand analysis of the clear-sighted German, will be surprised to find that the subject has the strongest possible bearing on our present condition, and that in fact, with rare exceptions, all our art, all our literature, falls inevitably within his definition of Dilettantism.

It was the belief of our author, and, though opposed to the common belief, it is worthy of deep consideration, that, what we call genius, may and does appear in any age, but that the most fortunate conjunction of circumstances, conducive to the development of such genius, is required to educate the great artist, the great poet. From his belief naturally follows, in the second place, that it is of immense importance that the artist should take hold of art by the right side. This true side is distinguished as Art, in opposition to the false side, which is Dilettantism. Now, in our country, every tendency is opposed to a true artistic culture, yet there is an intense thirst for the gratification that all men derive from works of art; and this demand our so-called artists and poets supply, after their fashion. But true art springs not from an outward demand of the public, but from an inward demand in the soul of an artist.

This Essay may be defined as an inquiry concerning the true and false point of art; and with a degree of fulness of knowledge, of sharpness and refinement of view, that perhaps no one but Goethe ever combined, it is carried into every art. Even gardening and dancing, which, as fine arts, we are so little acquainted with, are not omitted. At the same time, it must be admitted, that an almost algebraic brevity of statement prevails, and that it is a work to be studied rather than read. If the reader do not at first discover its drift, we would only suggest, that whatever other question is made concerning Goethe, no one doubts his infinite critical acumen; that, in his circumstances, there was a remarkable analogy with that of every artist or literary man, who is born in a period of false direction in art, and that, therefore, if there be an appearance of obscurity, there is always a strong probability that a more careful study will elicit a meaning that will repay the effort.]

INTRODUCTORY AND GENERAL.

The Italians call every artist Maestro.

When they see one who practises an art without making a profession of it, they say,—Si diletta. Their expression of polite amusement and wonder, shows their thoughts on the subject.

The word dilettant is not found in old Italian. It is found in no dictionary, not even the Cruscan.

It is found only in Jagemann. According to him, it means a Lover of Art, who is not satisfied with viewing and enjoying, but would also practise it.

Traces in ancient times.

Traces after the revival of the arts.

Widely extended in late times.

Cause thereof.

The practise of art made a requisite in education.

In speaking of Dilettants, we except the case of one born with a real talent for art, but prevented by circumstances from receiving an artistic cultivation.

We speak only of those who, without any particular talent for this or that art, only give way to the natural imitative tendency in them.

Upon the German word pfuschen (to botch).

Its derivation.

Refers to handicraft.

Handicraft expresses, that a certain dexterity has been acquired according to rule, and is practised in the exactest fashion, after the prescription and under the protection of law.

Institution of Guilds (Innungen), especially in Germany.

The various nations have no proper word therefor.

Idea expressed by the term.

The Dilettant holds the same relation to the Artist, that the botcher does to the craftsman.

It may be maintained of Art, that it is in like manner, learned according to rules, and practised according to law; only that its rules are not, like those of a handicraft, every where recognized, and the laws of the so-called free arts are spiritual and not civil.

Derivation of botch-work (pfuscherei).

Advantage.

Genealogy of Dilettantism.

Dilettant honored.

Artist neglected.

Cause.

Certainty of a widely extended enjoyment of life, is commonly the basis of all empirical estimation.

We have taken such certainty-maxims into our morale, without being aware of it.

Birth, valor, riches.

One sort of possession, ensures outward enjoyment.

Genius and Talent have an inward certainty, but in their outward relation are peculiarly uncertain.

They are not always in harmony with the conditions and wants of the time.

In barbarous times they were prized as something wonderful.

They are not certain of applause.

Which must be secured by begging or flattering.

On which account those artists are worst off, who must in person court the applause of the moment.

Rhapsodists, players, musicians.

With rare exceptions, artists live in a sort of voluntary poverty.

It was obvious in all times, that the condition of the artist had in it something desirable and enviable.

Origin of Dilettantism.

General prevalence, I will not say of a high regard for the arts, but of its mixture with civil existence, and a sort of legitimization of the same.

The Artist is born so.

He is by nature a privileged person.

He is obliged to practise something, that every one cannot do like him.

And yet he cannot be thought of as alone.

Neither would be alone.

The work of art calls for men to enjoy it.

And for wider participation in it.

All men have an inexpressible inclination for the enjoyment of works of art.

The nearest participator would be the true connoisseur, would have a lively and full enjoyment.

As great as any, nay, greater.

Because he sees at the same time the cause and effect.

Transition to practical Dilettantism.

Man experiences and enjoys nothing without forthwith becoming productive.

This is the most central property of human nature; nay, it may be said it is human nature itself.

Unconquering impulse to the same.

The passion for imitation has no connection with inborn genius for these things.

Example of children.

They are allured by every species of activity that comes before their eyes.

Soldiers, players, rope-dancers.

They take an object impossible for them to attain, such as they see attained only by the practice and capacity of riper years.

Their means become their aims.

Aim of children.

Mere sport.

Opportunity to exercise the passions.

How near the the resemblance between them and Dilettants.

Dilettantism of women.

Dilettantism of rich people.

Dilettantism of people of quality.

Is a sign of a certain degree of progress.

All Dilettants take hold of art on the weak side (by the weak end).

Immediate wish to exhibit fancy pictures.

Passion instead of earnestness.

Relation of Dilettantism to Pedantry, handicraft.

Dilettantic state of the Artist.

Where lies the distinction.

A higher or lower degree of empiricism.

False praise of Dilettantism.

Unjust blame.

Means by which the Dilettant can find his proper place.

Born artists, prevented by circumstance from cultivating themselves, we have already excepted. A rare case.

Many Dilettants flatter themselves they are of this class.

But with them there is always a false direction, which comes to nothing.

They do little good to themselves, to artists, or to art.

But, on the contrary, much harm.

Yet neither man, the artist, nor art can forego an enjoying, understanding, and in some measure practical participation.

Object of the present writing.

Difficulty of execution.

Brief description of an embodied dilettantism.

The philosophers needed.

The schoolmasters.

Benefit for the next generation.

Dilettantism presupposes Art, as botch-work does handicraft.

Idea of Artist, in opposition to Dilettant.

Practice of Art scientifically.

Adoption of an objective Art.

Legitimate progress and advancement.

Calling and profession.

Connexion with a world of Art and Artists.

Schools.

The Dilettant does not hold the same relation to all the arts.

All the arts have an objective and subjective side, and according as one or the other of these is predominant, the Dilettant has value or not.

Where the subjective of itself is of great importance, the Dilettant must and can approximate to the artist. For instance, oratory, lyrical poetry, music, dance.

Where the reverse is the case, there is a more marked distinction between Artist and Dilettant, as in architecture, the arts of design, epic and dramatic poetry.

Art itself gives laws, and commands the time.

Dilettantism follows the lead of the time.

When masters in art follow a false taste, the Dilettant expects so much the sooner to reach the level of art.

The Dilettant, receiving his first impulse to self-production from the effect of works of art on him, confounds these effects with the objective causes, and motives, and would now make the state of feeling he has been but into, productive and practical; as if out of the fragrance of flowers one should try to reproduce flowers themselves.

The speaking to the feelings, the last effect of all poetical organization, but which presupposes the concurrence of the whole of art, seems to the Dilettant to be the thing itself, and out of it he endeavors to produce.

In general, the Dilettant, in his ignorance of himself, puts the passive in the place of the active, and because he receives a lively impression from effects, thinks from these impressed effects to produce other effects.

The peculiar want of the Dilettant, is the Architectonic, in the highest sense,—that practical power which creates, forms, constitutes. Of this he has only a sort of misgiving, and submits himself to his material, instead of commanding it.

It will be found that the Dilettant runs particularly to neatness, which is the completion of the thing in hand, wherefrom a sort of illusion arises, as if the thing itself were worthy of existing. The same holds of accuracy (accuratesse), and all the last conditions of Form, which can just as well accompany the formless.

General ground, upon which Dilettantism is allowable.

When the Dilettant subjects himself to the severest rules in the outset, and undertakes to complete all the successive steps, with the greatest strictness; which he can the better afford to do, inasmuch as, 1. He will not be hankering after the end; and, 2d. if he would retreat, he has prepared the surest path to connoisseurship.

In opposition to the general maxim, the Dilettant will also be exposed to more severe criticism than the Artist, who, resting upon a secure basis of art, incurs less danger in departing from rules, and may even by that means enlarge the province of art itself. The true artist rests firmly and securely upon himself. His endeavor, his mark, is the highest aim of art. In his own estimation he will always be far from that aim, and necessarily, therefore, will be always modest in regard to art, or the idea of art, and will maintain that he has as yet accomplished little, no matter how excellent his work may be, or how high his consciousness of superiority, in reference to the world, may reach. Dilettants, or rather botchers, seem, on the other hand, not to strive towards an aim, not to see what is beyond, but only what is beside them. On this account they are always comparing, are for the most part extravagant in their praise, unskilful where they blame, have an infinite deference for their like, thus giving themselves an air of friendliness and fairness, which is in fact only to exalt themselves.

[To be continued.]

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 17, 1856.

CONCERTS.

AFTERNOON CONCERTS.—The second of the new series, on Wednesday afternoon, drew a large, but by no means crowded audience. HAYDN'S Ninth Symphony, in B flat, the slow movement of which was played with so much acceptance a few weeks ago, was this time presented entire. We believe it was quite new to Boston audiences—at least of this generation—and we must con-fees to having been more deeply interested by it than by either of the symphonies by which it has been customary here of late to represent the name of Haydn. To most music-lovers who had grown familiar with the richer inspirations of Beethoven and Mozart, Mendelssohn and Schubert, Haydn had seemed almost too child-like; there was the charm of style, of uniform fluency, elegance and clearness, with the further recommendation of a wholesome, cheerful spirit, but no great wealth of thought or imagination, no great depth of inspiration, nothing to communicate the thrill of any new, significant experience. In the ninth symphony, however, there is more meat, more musical substance to digest. The first and the last movements, full as they are of the usual gayety of child-like "Father Haydn," and with motives which at first seem ordinary, yet develop with a richness and variety of effect which does not let you drop them listlessly. In the finale indeed one is even reminded of Beethoven (say the fourth symphony) by the nervously persistent reiteration of certain pregnant phrases. The Andante is a deeply sad and pensive meditation, large and full of dignity. It is one of those inspirations in which Haydn sometimes goes beyond himself, as in certain passages in his Masses, and seems to anticipate some of the glories that were to succeed him. It was played with much expression, especially those large and and generous violin passages in the Andante, which are so violin-like.

The overture to "Jessonda," by SPOHR, had not been heard here since the earlier days of the "Germania." With all the peculiarities of Spohr, his characteristic, long-drawn, sweetish vein of melody, his fondness for wild, chromatic harmony and continual modulation, and his contrast of brilliant Frenchy effects with his own sombre monotony, it is one of his most interesting works, romantic, and in one part highly impassioned. Some of the wind instrument passages were rather roughly played, and especially the octave flute splashed its bright, saucy yellow over the rest of the picture with too little stint. The duet from Norma requires a very long musical drought to make itself refreshing to us even with the two best of voices; but as sung by two cornets—no doubt finely played—it offered less attraction than the sunshine and the budding green out doors. So that we not unwillingly lost, with the "Champagne Gallop" and the "Syren" overture by Auber.

Only one more Wednesday afternoon concert remains, and then we suppose the orchestra will hang up their fiddles till another winter.

A MUSICAL SERVICE, by the Choir of St. Paul's Church, under the direction of Dr. S. P. TUCKERMAN, took place at the church on Wednesday evening. Something curious and instructive was expected, judging from the fact that all the pews and aisles were crammed with listeners, among the most eagerly attentive of whom we noticed not a few amateurs, leaders of choirs, &c., from neighboring towns and cities. The object of Dr. Tuckerman was to show forth the excellence of that old English school of church music, in which he is a warm disciple, and in which he received his musical doctorate at Cambridge, England. Or rather, in the words of the explanatory note upon the back of the programme, "to compare the old and ecclesiastical school of Church harmony with that of more modern times, and to show that Church Music has fallen from its original purity, simplicity and grandeur, and for the last two centuries has been gradually approaching the secular school." With this view the following programme was presented:

PART I.

1. Organ Voluntary.
2. A portion of the Choral Service, as performed in the English Cathedrals. Music by Thomas Tallis, A. D., 1568.
Introductory Sentence—Intoned.
"If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us; but if we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."—1 John, 1, 8, 9.
The Confession.—The Lord's Prayer.—Versicle: O Lord, open Thou our lips.—Response: And our mouth shall show forth thy praise.—Gloria Patri.—Versicle: Praise ye the Lord.—Response: The Lord's name be praised.—Venite Exultemus Domino, sung to the 8th Gregorian Tone, composed by Gregory the Great, A. D., 580.
3. Full Anthem,.....Farrant, 1564.
"Hide not thou thy face from us, O Lord, and cast not off thy servants in thy displeasure, for we confess our sins unto thee, and hide not our unrighteousness. For thy mercy's sake deliver us from all our sins."
4. Lamentatio Jeremie Prophetæ, 4 voices.
"Sanctus," Chorus,.....Palestrina, 1571.
5. Full Anthem,.....Creyghton, 1674.
"I will arise and go to my Father, and will say, Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son."
(This Anthem is considered one of the finest specimens of pure church music, learned in its construction, and highly devotional in its character.)
6. Verse Anthem,.....Weldon, 1708.
Chorus.—"In thee, O Lord, have I put my trust; let me never be put to confusion; deliver me in thy righteousness."

Duet, Bass and Tenor.—"Bow down thine ear to me, make haste to deliver me, and be thou my strong rock and house of my defence, that Thou may'st save me. Be Thou also my guide, and lead me for thy name's sake."

Chorus.—"Draw me out of the net that they have laid privily for me, for thou art my God. Into thy hands I commend my spirit, for thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, thou God of truth."

PART II.

1. Organ Performance. a. Chorale from the } Fifth Motet, } Bach
b. Dead March in Saul, Handel
c. Fugue in E,.....Bach
2. Full Anthem, (without accompaniment,).....Farrant
"Lord, for thy tender mercy's sake, lay not our sins to our charge, but forgive that which is past, and give us grace to amend our sinful lives, to decline from sin, and incline to virtue, that we may walk with a perfect heart before thee, now and evermore."
3. Tenor Solo and Quartet, from the Verse Anthem,.....S. P. Tuckerman
"I looked, and behold, a door was opened in heaven."
Solo.—"Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve Him day and night in His temple."
Quartet.—"Their sun shall no more go down. The Lord shall be their everlasting light, and the days of their mourning are ended. For the Lamb shall feed them, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."
4. Verse Anthem,.....S. S. Wesley
Recitative.—"The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose."
Chorus.—"For in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert."
Recitative.—"And a highway shall be there; it shall be called the way of holiness. The unclean shall not pass over it. But the redeemed shall walk there."
Chorus.—"And the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads."
Quartet.—"And sorrow and sighing shall flee away."
5. Quartet,.....Dr. Crotch
"Comfort the soul of thy servant, for unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul."
6. Verse Anthem,.....S. P. Tuckerman
Organ Introduction.—Recitative.—"I was glad when they said unto me, we will go up into the house of the Lord; our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem."
Quartet.—"For thither the tribes go up, even the tribes of the Lord, to testify unto Israel, and to give thanks unto the name of the Lord."
Chorus.—"And to give thanks unto the name of the Lord."
Trebble Solo.—"O, pray for the peace of Jerusalem, they shall prosper that love thee!"

Quartet.—"Jerusalem is built as a city, that is at unity with itself. Peace be within thy walls."
Chorus.—"And plenteousness within thy palaces. Amen."

In a general comparison of the music in Part I. and in Part II., the case of Dr. Tuckerman was certainly made out. We think there could have been but one opinion in the audience, that the advantage was in favor of those older pieces, as being more impressive by their very simplicity, more edifying and sublime. There was the look of deeper satisfaction and preoccupation over the whole crowd during the first part. Particularly grand, and beautiful at the same time, was the "Lamentation," and still more the Sanctus, by PALESTRINA. It was our misfortune to arrive too late for the oldest specimen; we only caught the closing strains of the old Gregorian Venite, which we regretted most of all to lose. The pieces by FARRANT, CREYGHTON and WELDON, too, were good illustrations of what Dr. CROTCH calls the "sublime," which he says characterizes these old church compositions, while the more modern music (since the middle of the seventeenth century) has declined, through the "beautiful," to the "ornamental." This sublimity the learned doctor derives, it must be confessed, from very opposite sources; one being negative, mere simplicity, "a few simple notes in unison or octaves, by a variety of instruments or voices;" another lying at the opposite pole of this mere music of nature, and being artificial, scientific, "where the harmony and modulation are learned and mysterious," and "the ear unable to anticipate the transition from chord to chord," &c. The "beautiful" he defines as "soft, smooth and flowing." The "ornamental" explains itself. This classification is hardly satisfactory. If those older pieces were sublime, we also found it quite as natural to call them, some of them at least, beautiful. And we can see no reason why all three kinds may not co-exist, in various proportions, in any age which has sufficient artistic mastery of materials, and in any music the effect whereof should be religious and inspiring. The simplest, gravest strains require a certain inspiration of sentiment, they must have come out of the heart, and out of real spiritual experience, to make them sublime with any other than the mere physical sublimity of great masses. And on the other hand, if the more complex, ornate compositions are not always elevating and inspiring, if they are secular in the sense of merely voluptuous and sensual, it is not always because they are complex and ornate, but because the deeper inspiration dwelt not in the authors; the fault is not in the structure, but more in the source, in the pervading tone. A Handel Oratorio, a Bach fugue or motet, or, to take an example wholly outside of church music, a Beethoven symphony, gives you at once the ornate, the beautiful and the sublime, and, when appreciated, may affect the soul quite as profoundly and religiously as that which strictly forms part of a religious service.

Whether the selections of Part II. proved as much as those in the first admits of doubt. For in the first place they did not exhibit anything like gradation in decline; and in the next place, would it not be easy to find modern music, if not in the English school, yet outside of it, which, while it is equally "ornamental," &c., shall yet be found impressive, the utterance of profound feeling and experience? Of the pieces given we liked best the anthem by Farrant, and the Tenor Solo and Quartet (for soprani) by Dr. Tuckerman. The other pieces seemed to us too elaborate for the amount of musical ideas or inspiration of any kind contained in them; although there were some striking effects in the Anthem by WESLEY.

The organ performances of Dr. Tuckerman, on the rich and powerful instrument of the Messrs. Hook, were impressive, especially that Chorale by BACH. But, whatever traditional ground there may be for it, we could not feel the propriety of introducing that hoarse, terrific Trumpet sub-bass in Handel's Dead March. It is an effect of mere terror, physical at that, which seems not to be in harmony with the spirit of the music.

The choir seemed to be under excellent training, and comprised some of our most cultivated voices. One or two sopranos were particularly rich and telling. We thought we recognized the fine voice and style of Mr. MILLARD in a tenor solo, and Mrs. WENTWORTH once in the soprano.

In conclusion, we must thank Dr. Tuckerman for a very interesting musical occasion, such as we wish might be made more frequent, so as to illustrate more satisfactorily than can be done in one short evening, the characteristics of so wide and various a field of music.

Two concerts are announced for this day. Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS gives an Afternoon Concert, at 3 o'clock, in the Music Hall, at the same popular prices as the Wednesday orchestral concerts. It will be the only opportunity of hearing her this season, as she is just about departing on a summer tour through the West. We hope to see the great hall full. For the evening, Mr. HARRISON MILLARD, just returned from remarkable success in Philadelphia, announces a farewell concert on the eve of his departure for England. Mr. Millard is, to say the least, one of the very best tenors that we have among us, always persevering in the effort to improve, and therefore well deserving of success. Assisted as he will be to-night by our two native prime donne, Miss ELISE HENSLER and Miss PHILLIPS, he presents a strong attraction. Other valuable aid, including Mr. SATTER, the all-challenging pianist, appears on the programme, which will be found on the last page. We shall be truly sorry to lose Mr. Millard in our oratorios and concerts, for there are not many who can fill his place. The more the reason for availing of this evening's opportunity.

Oliver Ditson has published complete, in a bound volume, Mr. WILLIAM H. FRY'S Stabat Mater: the work which was to have been brought out a year ago at the New York Academy, and the failure to produce which, after a distinct promise and several rehearsals, created the newspaper controversy between composer and manager. It is in truth a formidable work to make report on. Our first impression, from a very cursory perusal, is that it contains a great deal of hard music in two senses: hard to execute, and hard to hear—strange, ungracious passages, which strain and fatigue the ear; that, in other parts, where there is melody and clear movement, it is very decidedly of the present Italian operatic school, reminding you once almost too palpably of the Lucia sextet, but more frequently of Verdi; that in its conception and musical illustration of the poetic text and subject, it deals in very literal correspondence, very physical description, the bare external image of a crucifixion and a piercing sword being uppermost; that it shows, however, great grasp of large musical combinations, indicating throughout broad, full orchestral effects, on the most modern scale, and even torturing the voices sometimes to wind through very instrumental channels (as the bass in the first movement). While it abounds in talent of a certain kind, we cannot believe it in a true direction of art. We doubt if the total impression can be either beautiful or sublime; it may surprise, but not inspire. This is only the first impression; it could hardly be a different one, without denying the master-works of Art which we have been accustomed to revere as models of true musical expression. We do not offer it as a final criticism, hoping to examine more in detail.

In noticing "The Psalter Noted" (published by J. A. Novello) we called it a manual for worshippers in the English Episcopal Church. We should have been more explicit and have stated that it is also specially adapted to the Episcopal service in this country.

Music Abroad.

London.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The second concert was conducted by Mr. Benedict. The novelties of the evening were the Second Symphony of the French composer, Gounod, and Mr. Macfarren's new Overture to "Hamlet." The Athenæum seems wonderfully well pleased with the former; indeed Mr. Chorley has long been as much an admirer of Gounod and of Gouvy, as he has a hater of Schumann and Wagner. He says:—

We have been always at variance with those who hold that Music can only be continued by destruction, and who maintain that, to be new in symphonic writing, it is necessary to begin where Beethoven ended, —forgetting that subsequent to the close of his career and the diffusion of his last works, such events have taken place as the disinterment of Bach and the acceptance of a genius in Mendelssohn, entirely distinct from Beethoven's, and, in some sort, retrogressive. Such preachers of strange doctrine must be greatly discomfited by such a work as M. Gounod's Second Symphony. Now it is, though not modish;—fresh in feeling and clear in idea, though, as regards profession of discovery, not more audacious than Haydn's later and Mozart's earlier Symphonies. When we name these great Germans and speak of M. Gounod as new, and yet in their style, it is that we may set him apart from the Fescas, Rombergs, Winters, and the tribe of second-hand respectable writers of the German classical school, whose works could not now be tolerated, owing to their absence of individuality. There is nothing "perruque" in this French Symphony, though it be behind its time, so far as noise, obscurity and ugliness are concerned. It is simple, yet includes contrasts;—it is easy in its flow and scientific in its construction, without any pedantic extracts from the exercise-book dragged in to show that the symphonist has studied "the strict" as well as "the free" style.—Written for a young Society—and we believe, too, its composer's second instrumental essay, it is not difficult to play, not impossible to understand;—but it is charming to hear, because the master-hand which entitles an artist to his diploma is to be recognized throughout.

The finale, he says, "in its sustained and arch vivacity approaches nearer Beethoven's finales than any modern music we recollect, save it be Mendelssohn's Saltarello." Of Mr. Macfarren and his overture he says:

He has now become settled in his manner—which is not to our taste. Of this manner his last composition is, we think, his most exaggerated expression,—the good that it contains being totally outweighed by the outbreaks of crude and strident sound perpetually interrupting the flow of the work (possibly on the plea of painting madness in music).

The solos were Spohr's seventh Concerto (violin), played by M. Sainton, and one of Beethoven's Piano Concertos, by Mr. J. Barnett. The singers were Miss Sherrington, "an earnest musician, but not yet a finished singer," and Herr Rotikansky, than whom the Athenæum never heard "a nobler and richer basso profundo voice," but "he has much to do ere he can rank among the artists."

AMATEUR SOCIETY.—That clever young Lady in her musical transactions known as "Angelina," performed at this concert on Monday evening last a Concerto for the pianoforte of her own composition. This we believe to be the first production of its class by an Englishwoman, and its good points are many. The writer has shown constructive skill and nice feeling for the contrasts of orchestra and solo instruments. Her fancy in passage-music, too, is good,—a merit especially to be commended, seeing that of late years there has been too much disposition to confine all passage-writing for the pianoforte to scales and arpeggi. Clever and creditable as is this Concerto, however, in no common degree, the hare (to adopt Mrs. Glass's well-used direction) caught by Angelina was hardly worth the dressing. First ideas, we know, are disregarded in these days, or else considered as so many revelations which there is no courting, averting, or amending,—nevertheless, first idea is almost as requisite to a composition as voice is to a singer. So well does Angelina know how to manage her subjects, that it is worth her while to look out for subjects worth managing. The Amateur Orchestra played the Symphony (Beethoven's in D) better than we have heard it play any symphony on a previous occasion.—Athenæum.

OPERA. Mr. Lumley's programme is now out, by which it appears that Sig. Donetti, and not Mr. Balfe, is to be the conductor at Her Majesty's Theatre. Sig. Belletti has engaged with him for three years. Mme. Amadei and M'lle Johanna Wagner are promised, the latter to make her debut in Bellini's Romeo.

The Athenæum speaks very favorably of Reinthaler's new oratorio, "Jephtha," which was brought out by Mr. Hullah at St. Martin's Hall.

There is much that is very good in the new Oratorio. What there is less good is referable, we imagine, to inexperience, not to incompetence, and in part, perhaps, to circumstance. To the last cause may we owe the arrangement of the book, which seems to have been put together bit by bit, rather than to have been created by working out a master idea. This manner of craftsmanship is apt to lead, not merely to disproportion, but to want of variety. Where the outline is not clear, detail must jostle detail where a single passage should suffice. Then it may have been owing to the paucity of German tenors, not merely that Jephtha was made a bass, but that the bass voice in general has been allowed to overgrow the Oratorio; hence a certain heaviness and monotony, which no pruning or interpolation can finally relieve. In treating the daughter of Jephtha, where Handel thought of the maiden's youth, (his Iphis being a notable example of innocence in music,) Herr Reinthaler has studied her as the daughter of a Jewish chieftain, who went out to greet her father with the timbrel of triumph in her hand and prophecy in her mouth. There is something Hebraic and stately in his conception of this character, which is individual, and gives a color and a certain loftiness of tone to the whole oratorio. Her hymn, "When Israel out of Egypt came," her cantilena, "Lo, blessed thou shalt be," (encored,) her "comfortable" song (to use the word in the old English sense), "Why art thou cast down?" her canticle of greeting to her father, "As the sun when he goeth forth," and the recitative which precedes her "Song upon the mountains," have in them something of the Princess, something of the Priestess. If Handel's Jephtha's Daughter may be likened to a holy maiden such as Fra Beato drew, Herr Reinthaler's has its parallel in some of the gorgeous and graceful creations of Domenichino, with their jewelled turbans and magnificent robes and elaborate phylacteries. The older conception may have been the truer and more spiritual one, but then it was exhausted by the older master; the younger one has shown modesty as well as courage in throwing a totally different light on the same biblical figure.

Advertisements.

GUSTAVE SATTER

MAKES THE FOLLOWING PROPOSITION TO ALL THE PIANISTS IN THE UNITED STATES.

1. He CHALLENGES them to play on three evenings in succession with him at the Tremont Temple, Boston, next fall.
2. He PROMISES to PAY Three Hundred Dollars to any one whom public approbation will declare as the victor.
3. EVERY PIANIST SHALL HAVE THE CHOICE OF HIS OWN SIX PIECES, with the condition that three must be classical, and three modern compositions.
4. THE NAMES OF THE PIANISTS AND OF THE PIECES must be communicated to Mr. Satter before the 1st of July.
5. For further particulars inquire of
GUSTAVE SATTER,
ADAMS HOUSE, BOSTON.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

AFTERNOON SERIES.

The Last Concert of the Series will take place at the Boston Music Hall, on WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, May 21st.

Packages of three Tickets, 50 cents; single admission 25 cents—to be had at the Music Stores and at the door. Doors open at 2½—to commence at 3 o'clock.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, (in compliance with numerous requests,) respectfully begs to announce that she will give a

GRAND AFTERNOON CONCERT,

at the above Hall, on SATURDAY, May 17th, assisted by Mr. MAY, Pianist, Mr. ADAMS, Tenor, and an Orchestra. For particulars, see programme.

Single tickets 25 cents: Family tickets, to admit six persons, $1.00: to be obtained at the music stores and at the door.

Doors open at 2; to commence at 3 o'clock.
[?] Positively no postponement on account of the weather, this being the only opportunity Miss P. will have of appearing before a Boston public previous to her departure West.

Mercantile Hall, Summer Street,
SATURDAY EVENING, May 17.

Mr. HARRISON MILLARD begs leave to announce a FAREWELL CONCERT, on which occasion he will be assisted by Miss ELISE HENSLEY, Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, Mr. GUSTAVE SATTER, Mr. B. J. LANG, and AN AMATEUR.

PROGRAMME.

- PART I.
1—Solo: Piano-forte, Mr. B. J. Lang.
2—Aria: 'Ah! ben mio,' from Il Trovatore, Verdi.
Mr. Millard.
3—Aria: 'Ah! non credes,' from La Sonnambula, Bellini.
Miss Elise Hensley.
4—Grand Fantasia d'Ernan, Satter.
Mr. Gustave Satter.
5—Duo: 'Si la stanchessa,' from Il Trovatore, Verdi.
Miss Phillipps and Mr. Millard.
6—Terzetto: 'Te sei quest' anima,' from Attila, Verdi.
Miss Hensley, Mr. Millard, and an Amateur.

- PART II.
1—Solo: Piano-forte—a, Tarentella, —b, Fair Helen,
'Polka de Salon,' Satter.
Mr. Gustave Satter.
2—Aria: 'Non piu mesta,' from Cenerentola, Rossini.
Miss A. Phillipps.
3—Romanza: 'Quando le sere,' from Luisa Miller, Verdi.
Mr. H. Millard.
4—Barcarole: 'Il Pescatore,' Millard.
Composed expressly for and sung by Miss Elise Hensley.
5—English Ballad: 'Then you'll remember me,' from Bohemian Girl, Balfe.
Mr. H. Millard.
6—Grand Trio: Finale from Il Trovatore, Verdi.
Misses Hensley, Phillipps, and Mr. Millard.

The Piano-fortes are from the celebrated manufactories of Messrs. Hallet, Davis & Co., and Jacob Chickering.
Tickets 50 cents each, to be had at the usual places.
Concert to commence at 8 o'clock.

READY FOR DELIVERY.

THE EIGHT NEW YORK MUSICAL REVIEW PRIZE SONGS.

The best collection of Songs ever before published in America, the history of which may be found in the Illustrated Catalogue of RICHARDSON'S MUSICAL EXCHANGE (to be had gratis). Owing to the great pressure of advance orders, we have been unable to get these songs ready for delivery before. The following is the complete list:

- No. 1—SWEET AND LOW. By O. Dresel—(took the first prize of $200).
No. 2—ONE HEART FOR MR. Author unknown.
No. 3—WHERE, WHERE ARE ALL THE BIRDS THAT SANG. By Frank Sewall.
No. 4—MY GENTLE MOTHER'S SONG. By C. C. Converse—(took the second prize of $100).
No. 5—THE EAST. By B. D. Allen.
No. 6—THE FLOWERS. By Frank Darley.
No. 7—THE PARTING. Author unknown.
No. 8—SERENADE. By Robert Stüpel.

N. B. These eight songs were selected from 400 which were sent in for competition.
Price 25 cents each.

PUBLISHED BY NATHAN RICHARDSON,
Musical Exchange, 282 Washington Street.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

ORGANIST.—A Gentleman who has had twenty years' experience as Organist and Conductor of a small Choir, wishes a new situation. Enquire of Mr. DWIGHT at this office.

ADOLPH KIELBLOCK,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
U. S. HOTEL.

Communications can be left at Mr. Ditson's music store.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S COLLECTIONS OF GLEES, MADRIGALS, PART-SONGS, &c.

Novello's Glee-Hive.

A Collection of Popular GLEES and MADRIGALS, in Vocal Score, with ad. lib. Accompaniment for Piano-forte. Complete in 8 vols. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt lettering. Price $2 each volume.

These volumes contain eighty-three of the best GLEES and Madrigals by standard ancient and modern English composers. Among them will be found some of the finest GLEES of Attwood, Calcott, the Earl of Mornington, Spofforth, Stevens, Webbe, &c. Each Glee and Madrigal is printed separately, at prices varying from 4 to 12 cents each.

Novello's Part-Song Book.

In One Volume, handsomely bound in cloth, with illuminated lettering.

This work consists of new GLEES and Part-Songs, by the best modern composers—among others, Bishop, Benedict, Macfarren, Kimbault, Wesley, &c.—with reprints of some of the best Madrigals by ancient composers, and Part-Songs by eminent German composers, set to English poetry. Each Glee and Part-Song printed separately, at from 4 cents to 18 cents each. Vocal parts to the whole work, 25 cents each part; Vocal parts to separate GLEES, &c., 8 cents per set.

Orpheus:

A Collection of GLEES and Vocal Quartettes, by the most admired German Composers, with English Poetry.

This collection is principally for male voices. Twenty-nine books, each containing about six GLEES, in separate Vocal parts, with separate Piano-forte accompaniment, have been published, and the issue is continued—the new books being received by J. A. Novello immediately on their publication in London.—Price 88 cents each book.

The Musical Times, AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR, PUBLISHED (IN LONDON) ON THE FIRST OF EVERY MONTH.

Containing ANTHEMS, CHORALS, and HYMNS, or GLEES, MADRIGALS, and ELIGES, for One, Two, Three, Four, or more Voices. Price 8 cents each.

A Monthly Journal, containing original articles by EDWARD HOSKINS, Author of the "Life of Mozart," &c.; Short notices of Singing-Classes, Concerts, &c.; Advertisements of new and important Musical Works; and, in addition, three or four pages of Music. The alternate numbers contain Music with secular or sacred words. Price 8 cents each, or post-free, 4 cents. Nos. 1 to 48, (Vols. I. and II.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 49 to 98, (Vols. III. and IV.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 97 to 144, (Vols. V. and VI.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75. Either Vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, may be had separately, in paper covers, 75 cents each. Annual subscription to the Musical Times, 50 cents, post-paid.

J. A. NOVELLO,

No. 389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

THE GOLDEN WREATH.

A Choice Collection of Favorite Melodies, designed for the use of Schools, Seminaries, Select Classes, &c. Also, a Complete Course of Elementary Instruction, upon the Pestalozzian System, with numerous Exercises for Practice. By L. O. EMMERSON. 24 pages. 16mo. Bound in boards, leather back. Price, 25 cts.

This is a new book, and judging from present appearance, will be the most popular work of its class published. There is an exceeding aptness about the instructions, and an attractiveness in the melodies that will at once commend it to all for whom it is designed.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 18 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESSEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $80 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

Apr 29

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

ED. B. ROBINSON,
PIANO-FORTE TUNER.

Orders received at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington Street.

NEWS'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER,

Will be happy to give instruction in Piano-forte and Organ playing, and the Theory of Music. Address:—No. 8 Hayward Place. May 26. if

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE,
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

Mlle GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE
—GIVE—
INSTRUCTION on the PIANO-FORTE,
And may be addressed at her residence, 55 Hancock St.

CARL HAUSE
OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
205 Washington Street, Boston.

MR. AUGUST FRIES,
Teacher of Music, will be ready to receive pupils after October 15th, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington street, or at his residence, 15 Dix Place.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S
Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.
Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line 10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line 5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion $12.00
Do do each subsequent $6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

Digitized by Google

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 216.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 24, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 8.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
"GEORGE P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row, "
"A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I. "
"C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
"SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
"GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
"G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
"JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
"MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
"W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
"W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
"HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by
JOHN S. DWIGHT, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court
of the District of Massachusetts.]

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Translated from the French of Madame Dubeant, for the Journal of Music.

CHAPTER IX.

"L'UOM DI SASSO."

I was altogether too dissatisfied with the result of my undertaking to feel disposed to renew my inquiries upon the mysterious castle. I concealed my curiosity, as if I was ashamed of it, for my success had not justified it; but still it existed just as strongly as ever at the bottom of my heart, and I laid new plans for the ensuing night. Meanwhile, I determined to go and reconnoitre the castle, that I might carefully arrange some means of penetrating the place by night, if possible. "Bah!" said I to myself, "where there's a will there's a way."

I was just going out, when a little peasant, who had been hanging about the door, looked at me with that mixture of boldness and shyness so characteristic of country children. Then, as I observed his countenance, cunning and shy at the same time, he came up to me, and giving me a letter, said:

"See if that is for you."

I read my name and surname very legibly written upon the envelope in an elegant hand writing. Hardly had I nodded assent, when the boy ran away, without waiting for questions or reward. I turned to the signature, which explained nothing, but which did not deceive me. Stella and Beatrice! "What beautiful names!" cried I, rushing to my chamber, considerably excited, I must confess.

"Chance, aided by curiosity," said this graceful and perfumed note, "has revealed to two very shrewd little girls the name of the stranger who picked up the knot of cherry ribbons. Footsteps in the snow, explaining the warning of the fine dog Hecate, proved to the young ladies that the stranger was even more curious than polite or prudent, and that he does not fear to cross the ice to peer into the secrets of others. Your fate is cast! Since you desire to be initiated into our mysteries, you shall be, O presumptuous youth! May you never repent it, and show yourself worthy of our confidence. Be silent as the grave! the slightest indiscretion on your part will render your admittance impossible. Come at eight o'clock this evening (solo e inosservato) to the side of the ditch; there you will find Stella and Beatrice."

The whole note was written in Italian, and expressed in that pure Tuscan which I had heard them speak. I hurried the dinner that I might go out at six o'clock, pretending that I was going to see the moon rise over the hills. I took a walk beyond the castle, and at eight precisely I was at the rendezvous. I did not wait five minutes before my two charming châtelines appeared, well cloaked and hooded. I was rather disturbed, after I had ascended the steps, to see a third, whom I had not expected. She wore a mask of black velvet, and her cloak was made like a domino.

"Do not be frightened," said little Beatrice, taking me unceremoniously by the arm; "there are three of us. This one is our oldest sister. Do not speak to her, for she is deaf. Besides, you must follow us without saying a single word and without asking a question. You must submit implicitly to all we exact, even should we take a fancy to cut off your moustache, your hair, or even a piece of your ear. You will see strange things, and you must do all we command you, without venturing the slightest objection, without hesitating, without laughing, after you have once crossed the threshold of the sanctuary. An untimely laugh is disagreeable to our chef, and I won't dare to say what would become of you if you should not behave with the greatest dignity."

"Does the gentleman give us here his word of honor as a true man," said Stella, the second of the sisters, in her turn, "to obey all our commands? If not, he shall not proceed one step farther in our dominions, and my oldest sister here, who is deaf as the law of destiny, will chain him to the foot of this tree, where he will be a laughing stock to all passers-by. To do this, she only needs a sign from us, so speak quickly, sir."

"I swear upon my honor and by the devil, if you choose, to be yours, body and soul, until to-morrow morning."

"All right!" said they.

And both taking my arms, they drew me into an obscure labyrinth of green trees. The black domino preceded us without turning round. A branch caught back the hem of her cloak, and I saw a very slender leg, which looked decidedly suspicious, for it was covered with a black stocking, and a knot of ribbons falling on one side, without the slightest trace of the existence of a petticoat. This oldest sister, deaf and dumb, seemed like a young man, who did not wish to betray himself by his voice, and came to watch my manner with his sisters, that he might bring me back to good behavior if there were any need of it.

Just then I could not resist the promptings of my self-love to reveal my discovery, and I was immediately punished.

"Why have you mistrusted me?" said I to my young friends. "Your brother's presence is not necessary to secure the most submissive and respectful behavior on my part."

"And why do you break your oath?" answered Stella, severely. "Come here; it is too late to go back, and we must employ harsher means to force you to silence."

She stopped me; the black domino turned round, deaf as she was, and produced a bandage which the three bound about my eyes with the precaution and dexterity of girls well skilled in all the tricks of blind man's buff.

"We will spare you the gag," said Beatrice, "but at the first word you speak, you will not escape it so easily, as we shall soon go where there are stronger hands. Until then, give us your hands; you will not be so mean as to draw them away, and oblige us to fasten them behind you."

I really did not find their manner of binding my hands disagreeable after all, for they were tightly clasped in those of two lovely girls; neither did the ceremony of the bandage disturb me, for I felt two other hands placed upon my forehead and among the locks of my hair; they were those of the elder sister, and as they were gloveless to perform such high offices, their soft pressure left me no longer in doubt respecting the sex of the dumb personage.

I should say in my own praise, that I had not once felt the slightest uneasiness respecting the result of my adventure. However inexplicable everything was as yet, I had not the provincialism to dread any mystery in bad taste; I was armed with no poignard, and the threat of my lovely sybils did not inspire me with fear, either for my ears or even my moustache. I saw clearly that I had intelligent people to deal with, and the remembrance of their faces and the sound of their voices neither betrayed boldness nor wickedness. They must have been authorized by their father, who probably knew me by reputation, to receive me thus romantically; and even if it was not so, there always is a certain indefinable atmosphere of candor about a pure woman, which never deceives the senses of an experienced man.

I soon felt, from the warmth of the temperature and the sound of my footsteps, that I was within the castle. I mounted several steps, then I was shut in a room, and Beatrice called to me from outside:

"Get ready—take off your bandage—buckle on the armor—put on the masque—forget nothing. Some one will come for you in a few minutes."

I found myself alone in a room, furnished only with a large mirror, two lamps and a sofa, upon which I saw a strange suit of armor—a helmet, cuirass, a shirt of mail, armlets and greaves, all compact and white as stone. But when I touched them, I found that they were made of pasteboard, but so well modelled and painted in relief, to imitate carved ornaments, that at the distance of a few steps the illusion was complete. The mail was made of "toile d'encollage," and its stiff folds imitated sculpture in the best possible manner.

The style of this warlike accoutrement was a mixture of the antique and rococo, as is seen in the statues of the last centuries. I hastened to don this strange costume, even to the mask, which represented the stern and sad face of an old captain, and whose white eyes, lined with gauze inside, had something terrific about them. In looking at myself in the glass, through the gauze, which did not permit to see clearly, I thought I had changed into stone, and drew back involuntarily.

The door opened; Stella examined me in silence, and, placing her finger on her lips:

"Done to a charm!" said she, speaking low. "L'uom di sasso is frightful! But don't forget the white gloves. Oh, these are too clean; soil them a little against the wall to give them tone and shadow. Everything must deceive, even when seen near by. Well, come now; my brothers look for you, but my father suspects nothing. Now behave like a sensible statue. Don't seem to see or understand anything."

She then led me down a concealed staircase, contrived in the thickness of an immense wall; then she opened a door and led me to a seat, where she left me, whispering:

"Arrange yourself well. Be an artist in your attitude!"

She disappeared; all was still, and it was a few seconds before the gauze of my mask allowed me to distinguish the faintly lighted objects around me.

Judge of my surprise! I was seated upon a tomb! I saw that I was to represent a monument in the corner of a moon-lit cemetery. Real yews were planted about me and real ivy twined about my pedestal. In a few minutes more I discovered that I was in a well-warmed room, lighted by a false moon. I saw through the cypress branches, which arched over my head, bits of blue sky, which, however, was only painted canvas, lit by blue lights. But all was so artistically arranged that only an effort of the reason convinced me that it was but an illusion. Was

I upon a stage? There certainly was a large green velvet curtain before me; but around me nothing seemed stage-like. Nothing was arranged to give scenic effect to an audience. There were no side scenes for the actors, but the entrances were made by masses of green branches, their outlines, veiled by blue cloth, lost in the shade. There were no side-lights to be seen; the light came from above, like that of stars, but from where I was rivetted upon my funeral pedestal I could not see its focus. The floor was covered by a green carpet, imitating moss. The tombs about me resembled marble, they were so well painted and arranged. Far back behind me arose a false wall, which looked so like a wall as to deceive me. There were none of those false distances which deceive the audience and against which the actor loses the depths of the horizon. The scene in which I took part was so large as not to shock the appearance of reality. It seemed to me like a room arranged like a little convent yard, or the corner of a garden assigned to illustrious graves. The cypress trees seemed to be really planted in the huge rocks which had been brought to hold them, and upon which the moss was still fresh.

So I was in no theatre, and yet I was taking part in some sort of representation. This is what I imagined: M. de Balma was insane, and his children practised strange fantasies to flatter him. They arranged tableaux suited to the joyous or melancholy moods of his weak brain, for I had heard them laugh and sing the night before, although they talked about arranging the cemetery. I heard whisperings, stealthy footsteps and the rustling of dresses behind the trees which surrounded me; then I heard the sweet voice of Beatrice pronounce these words from behind the curtain:

"It is time!"

Then a choir of beautiful voices arose from all sides, as if spirits had inhabited those cypress boughs which waved above my head and about my feet. I arranged my pose as Commander, for I saw plainly that we had to do with "Don Juan." The chorus was Mozart's and they sang those admirable harmonious chords of the cemetery scene: "Di rider finerai, pria dell'aurora. Ribaldo! audace! lascia ai morti la pace!"

Involuntarily I added my voice to those of the invisible spirits, but I was silenced by the opening of the curtain before me. It did not rise like a stage curtain; it drew back on either side; but it unveiled none the less a pretty little theatre, adorned with two rows of handsome boxes ornamented in the style of Louis XIV. Three pretty chandeliers hung from the dome. There were no footlights, but there was a place for an orchestra. The strangest thing was that there were no spectators, not one soul in all the room, and I played the statue to empty seats.

"If this is all the mystification I am to meet with," thought I, "it is not very malicious. I only want to know how long I am to play the statue to nobody."

I did not wait long. Don Juan and Leporello came out from the trees behind me and began to converse. Their costumes, admirably faithful and in good taste, did not permit me to recognize the actors at once, for Leporello had grown full thirty years younger. His figure was easy, his limbs straight, and he wore a black beard, cut en collier Andaloux; his wrinkles were concealed, but could I hesitate one moment when I heard his voice? It was old Boccaferri, transformed into an elegant and graceful actor.

But this handsome Don Juan, this haughty and poetical youth, who leaned so carelessly upon my pedestal, without deigning to turn towards me his face, shaded by a blonde wig, and a large felt hat, Louis XIII., with a white plume—who was he then? His rich costume seemed taken from some family portrait. It was no fancy dress, made up of rags and tinsel; it was a veritable velvet doublet, short as was worn by the dandies of that period, with the same large breeches, the same stiff lace and soft and rich ribbons. Nothing about it smelt of the shop or the costumer, or that unfaithful arrangement by which the actor compromises with the public in modifying the extravagance and exaggeration of old times. It was the first time I had ever seen a person truly historic in his costume and his manner of wearing it; and for me, a painter, it was a good fortune. The young man was graceful and well made; he strutted like a peacock, and gave me a much better idea of Don Juan than Celio himself could have done, for Celio would have infused into him something too haughty and super-tragic for the character. But suddenly, upon a cowardly remark from Leporello Boccaferri, he raised his head to me, the statue, with an air of nonchalant irony, and I recognized Celio Floriani himself.

Did he know me? At all events, my mask did not let him smile upon the well-known features; and as the piece seemed carried on with wonderful self-possession, I kept my position unmoved. When my first emotions of surprise and joy were over, (for, although I did not see Cecilia, I hoped that she was not far off,) I listened to the play which was going on, that I might not cause it to fail. My rôle was not difficult, since I had only one gesture to make, one word to say, but still even these must be used in their place.

I had judged from the chorus, where, for want of instruments, charming voices had supplied the harmonious combinations of an orchestra, that Mozart's opera was to be performed in some manner; but Celio's and Boccaferri's dialogue made me think that they were playing Moliere's comedy in Italian. I knew it almost by heart in French, and before long I saw that they did not follow the text closely, for Doña Anna, dressed in black, crossed the foot of the cemetery and drew near me, as if to pray at my tomb, when, seeing the two promenaders, she hid herself to listen. This beautiful Doña Anna, dressed like one of Velasquez's portraits, was represented by Stella. She was sad and pale as became her rôle at that time. She learned there that Don Juan had killed her father, for the reprobate almost boasted of it in mocking poor Leporello, who was half dead with fright. Anna stifled a shriek as she fled. Leporello answered by cries of fear, and declared to his master that the souls of the dead were disturbed by his impiety; and as for himself, he should not cross that part of the cemetery, but should go all around it rather than advance one step. Don Juan seized him by his ear, and insisted upon his reading the inscription upon the Commander's monument. The poor valet declared that he could not read, as in the libretto of the Italian opera. The scene was prolonged in a manner rather piquant to study, for it was a mixture of Moliere's comedy and the lyric drama put into common words and action, and the whole was lengthened and carried out by a third version, unknown to me, which seemed improvised. It made the dialogue rather too long and sometimes too familiar for the public, but there it had a surprising reality, so great that the illusion was not lost for a moment, and I felt almost as if I was beholding an episode in the life of Don Juan.

The play of the actors was so natural, and the place so well arranged for the freedom of their motions, that they did not seem to act comedy, but to be persuaded that they were true types of the drama.

This illusion even took possession of me when I heard Leporello deliver his master's invitation to me, and I saw him express unfeigned terror at the inclination of my head. Never did convulsive trembling, contraction of the features, suffocation of the voice or trembling of the limbs more truly mark a man seriously terrified by a supernatural act. Don Juan himself was moved when I answered his insolent appeal by the solemn "Yes." The sound of a gong in the side-scenes and a few lugubrious chords made me tremble myself. Don Juan held his head high and his form erect, his arrogant sword turning back the edge of his cloak; but he trembled a little, his light moustache stood out with secret fear, and he went out, saying:

"I thought myself beyond such hallucinations. Do let us go out!"

He passed before me, eyeing me with audacity, but his eyes were rounded with fear, and his lofty brow was bathed with a cold perspiration. He went off with Leporello, and the curtain was drawn together, while the spirits recommenced the chorus:

"Di rider fineral," &c.

Dona Anna came immediately and took me by the hand, helping me first to undo the mask; then she led me to the curtain and bade me look cautiously into the room. The parterre of the audience room, which was only furnished with a dozen arm-chairs, and a table covered with papers, and a grand piano, became a green room in the entr'acte. I saw old Boccaferri fanning himself with a ladies' fan and breathing quickly, like a man who was really excited. Celio was collecting the papers upon the table; Beatrice, beautiful as an angel and dressed for Zerlina, held by the hand a beardless boy, who personated Masetto. A fifth person was standing back to me, wrapped in a domino, caught up on one side, and displaying a lace ruffle hanging over a black silk stocking. This was the third pretended Mademoiselle de Balma, the deaf one, dressed as Ottavio, who had mystified me in the garden; but was it Cecilia? She seemed taller to me, and that careless mien, that attitude, so like a young man, did not remind me of the Boccaferri, whom I had never seen in the garments of our sex. I was about asking Stella, but she put her finger upon her lips and motioned me to listen.

"Pardieu!" said Boccaferri to Celio, who was complimenting him upon acting so well, "no one could have helped it. I was half dead with fright in good earnest; for I did not see the statue at the rehearsal yesterday, and although I cut out and painted all the pieces of the armor, I had no idea that they could have such effect when they were worn. Salvator's attitude was perfect, and he spoke the yes with so excellent a tone that I did not recognize his voice; and then, in that costume, he seemed like a giant. Where is the child, that I may compliment him?"

Boccaferri turned suddenly and saw the young man of whom he spoke busied in rouging his cheeks for Masetto.

"Well done! What!" cried Boccaferri, "have you had time to change your costume already?"

"How is that, mon vieux," answered the boy; "you think I was the statue? Don't you remember meeting me in the passage, when you almost fell down on your knees in your haste to flee, so great was your fear? and you whispered to me: 'That stone figure really did frighten me.'"

"Did I say that?" said Boccaferri, astounded. "I do not remember it. I saw you without noticing you; I was beside myself. Yes, I really was afraid. I am satisfied; our attempt has succeeded, my children; we are gaining in emotion. I for one have gained it, and when you do, you will become great artists."

"But, dear fool," said Celio, laughing, "if Salvator was not the statue, who was? You do not ask."

"Indeed, who was it? Who the deuce did play the statue?"

And Boccaferri rose, thoroughly frightened, casting his haggard eyes around him.

"The dear good man is very susceptible," said Stella to me; "we must go no farther. Speak your name before showing yourself."

[To be continued.]

Goethe on Dilettantism,

OR PRACTICAL AMATEURSHIP IN THE ARTS.

[From "Essays on Art," by GOETHE, translated by SAMUEL GRAY WARD.]

(Continued from page 58)

PARTICULAR APPLICATION.

DILETTANTISM IN PAINTING.

The Dilettant shuns all that relates to principles, neglects the acquisition of the requisite knowledge, in order to come at once to practice; confounds Art with Material.

Thus, for instance, we never find a Dilettant who draws well, for in that case he would be on the road to art.

Dilettants often turn their attention to Encaustic and Mosaic, because they put the duration of the work in the place of art. Still oftener, they occupy themselves with etching, because the multiplication pleases them.

They are curious in artifice, manner, modes of working, arcana, because in general they cannot raise themselves beyond the idea of mechanical dexterity, and think, if they can only acquire the trick of hand, they will have no further difficulty to surmount.

It is on this account, namely, the want among Dilettants of a true idea of art, that they always prefer the Many and the Indifferent, or the Rare and Costly, to the Choice and Good. We find many Dilettants with great collections. Nay, it may be said that all great collections have their origin in Dilettantism; for it prospers best, particularly when its quest is aided by means, in raking together. Its object is to possess, not to choose with understanding, and be content with the possession of a few good things.

Dilettants have for the most part a patriotic tendency. Thus, a German Dilettant not seldom interests himself for German art exclusively; hence the collections of engravings and paintings of German masters only.

Two bad habits are often met with in Dilettants, and are to be ascribed in like manner to the want of a true notion of art. The first is, they would be of consequence; that is, would have their applause of importance, would stamp the artist. In the second place, the artist, who is the true connoisseur, has an unconditional and entire interest in art, and devotion to it. The Dilettant has never more than a half interest; he regards all as a sport and pastime; has, for the most part, some by-object, some propensity to satisfy, some whim to indulge, and seeks to avoid coming to a reckoning with the world, and the demands of good taste, by the apology, that in the purchase of works of art, he hopes to accomplish some good end,—to aid a promising artist, or help a poor family in distress; such have always been the reasons why Dilettants have bought this or that. Thus, on the one hand, they seek to show their taste, on the other, to free it from suspicion.

Amateurship in Landscape, presupposes a highly cultivated art.

Portrait painting.

Sentimental poetic tendency, also gives rise to Dilettantism, in the arts of design. Shakspeare. Engraved illustrations of poems.

Silhouettes.

Urns.

Works of art as furniture.

All Frenchmen are Dilettants in the arts of design, as an integral part of education.

Amateurs in Miniature.

Lay everything to knack.

Love of allegory and allusion.

DILETTANTISM IN ARCHITECTURE.

Scarcity of good architects, in proportion to the desire there is for fine architecture, drives to Dilettantism; especially when the rich lovers of architecture are scattered at wide intervals.

Travel in Italy and France, and particularly amateurship in gardens, have fostered this Dilettantism.

Dilettants prefer to go back to the origin of Architecture. a) Rough wood, bark, &c. b) Heavy architecture, Doric columns. c) Imitation of Gothic Architecture. d) Architecture of fancy and sentiment. e) Miniature aping of great forms.

On account of its apparent freedom from restrictions, it seems easier than it really is, and thus we are more easily led into it.

IN THE ART OF GARDENING.

French style of gardening, considered on its good side, and especially vis-à-vis the present taste.

English taste has the basis of the useful, which the French must sacrifice.

The apish imitation of the English taste has the appearance of the useful.

Chinese taste.

DILETTANTISM IN LYRICAL POETRY.

The fact, that the German language was in the beginning applied to poetry, not by any one great poetic genius, but through merely middling heads, must inspire Dilettantism with confidence to essay itself in it.

The cultivation of French literature and language has made even Dilettants more artistic.

The French were always more rigorous, tended to severer correctness, and demanded even of Dilettants taste and spirit within, and externally a faultless diction.

In England, Dilettantism held more by Latin and Greek.

Sonnets of the Italians.

Impudence of the later Dilettantism, originated and maintained through reminiscences of a richly cultivated poetic dialect, and the facility of a good mechanical exterior.

Polite literature of universities, induced by a modern method of study.

Lady poems.

Schön-geistererei (Bel esprit).

Musen-almanacks. (Our annuals?)

Journals.

Fashion and extension of translations.

Immediate transition from the classes and the university to authorship.

Epoch of ballads, and songs of the people.

Gessner, poetic prose.

Carlsruhers, &c. revival of fine authors in the past.

Imitation of the bards.
 Bürger's influence on the Lyre.
 Rhymeless verses.
 Klopstockian odes.
 Claudius.
 Wieland's laxity.
 In earlier times,
 Latin verses.
 Pedantism.
 More handicraft.
 Skill, without poetic spirit.

DILETTANTISM IN PRAGMATIC POETRY.

Reasons why the Dilettant hates the powerful, the passionate, the characteristic, and only represents the middling, the moral.

The Dilettant never paints the object, but only the feeling it gives rise to in him.

He avoids the character of the object.

All Dilettantic creations in this style of poetry will have a pathological character, and express only the attractions and repulsions felt by their author.

The Dilettant thinks to reach poetry by means of his wits.

Dramatic botchers go mad when they desire to give effect to their work.

DILETTANTISM IN MUSIC.

In ancient times a greater influence upon passionate life, by means of portable stringed instruments, which gave more room for a simple expression of sentiment.

Medium of gallantry.

In later times piano-forte and violin.

More stress laid upon mechanical dexterity, difficulty, and art; less intimate connexion with life and passion.

Passes into concerts.

More food for vanity.

Song and opera existence.

False hopes of implanting national feeling or æsthetic spirit by means of composed people-songs (Volks-lieder).

Social, table, drinking, and free-mason songs.

IN THE DANCE.

In former times pedantry and indifference. Uniformity.

In later times, formlessness; from which arise wildness, violence, application of strength.

Distinction between representative, naïve, and characteristic Dances.

Representative, make beauty of form, and motion of importance, and possess dignity, (Minuet.)

Naïve, belonging to a livelier state, are more free and agreeable.

Characteristic, approach the boundary of objective art.

Fall easily into stiffness.

Fall easily into extravagance.

Run easily into caricature.

DILETTANTISM IN DRAMATIC ART.

French comedy is, even among amateurs, obligatory, and a social institution.

Italian amateur-comedy, is founded on a puppet, or puppet-like, representation.

Germany, in former times, Jesuit-schools.

In later times; French Amateur-comedies, for aiding the cultivation of the language, in noble houses.

Mixing up of ranks in German Amateur-comedy.

Conditions, under which, in any case, a moderate practice in theatrical matters may be harmless and allowable, or even in some measure advantageous.

Permanence of the same company.

To avoid passionate pieces, and choose such as are reflective and social.

To admit no children, or very young persons.

Greatest possible strictness in outward forms.

(Conclusion next week.)

Marietta Piccolomini.

(Translated for the London Musical World from "L'Illustration Journal Universel.")

Did you ever assist at the triumph of a prima donna, in Italy? If you have such a chance, mind you do not sit in the orchestra stalls, for your fate would inevitably be to be buried, along with the actress, under a mountain of bouquets, crowns of laurel, gold, and occasionally even of iron—the latter aimed by the zealous hand of some implacable rival. Diamonds and other precious stones are mixed up with flowers in this deluge of enthusiasm; and, unless you be a Turcopillist to the extent of craving for a Mahometan paradise in this world, in which the great point consists in calmly reposing on rubies and emeralds, you will have cause to repent your indiscreet curiosity.

The carnival of 1856 had been so obstreperous and frenetic among the Siennese—who had on this occasion received permission to put on their masks, which had been prohibited for more than eight years—that they very naturally felt the necessity of expiating by a few tears all the eccentricities of which they had been guilty. The consequence was, that in the morning all Sienna turned out and rushed to the Duomo, to weep at the sermon of a celebrated Franciscan friar, and from thence went in a body to the theatre to weep over the misfortune of La Traviata, interpreted by the noble lady MARIA PICCOLOMINI. What is the Traviata?—Why, it is the young lady who has missed her way, taken the wrong path—in short the Dame aux Camélias. The Traviata is nothing more than the well known and un-edifying story of a Gascon father who comes up from his village to spoil a tender liaison which has been going on for some three or four months between his son, also of the Gascon school, and a consumptive young lady who keeps the said son, and as usual is repaid by the deepest ingratitude, while the gentleman invokes the testimony of the chorus who sing at him at the tops of their voices—"Di donna ignobile insultator, va! ne desti orror!" I do not undertake to relate the whole story, which I dare say you know as well as I do; but what I must say is that the opera of La Traviata, which had been successively condemned in all the theatres of Italy, has been triumphantly re-instated by Maria (or Marietta—or Mariettina) Piccolomini, who has infused the breath of life into it by her rare dramatic talent. It is of this young genius that I am now about to say a few words.

This grand daughter and niece of a swarm of illustrious men, of the Piccolomini family, whose root, transplanted by Charlemagne from among the Gauls, and replanted in fertile Italy, has given birth two two popes, several cardinals, bishops, marshals, poets, historians, &c.; this young girl, we say, endowed with a large fortune, and allied to the most distinguished families in the kingdom, has, nevertheless, been unable to resist the fascinations of the art which has drawn her towards the stage. She experienced the necessity of giving utterance to and singing what she felt so well; she was instinctively impelled to transfer the emotions which filled her own soul into the souls of a numerous audience. Considerations of position, alliances of all sorts, were constrained to give way; the dramatic instinct was too strong to be resisted, and it compelled all those opposed to it to range themselves on its side. Maria Piccolomini has overcome the repugnance of her family. Surrounded by all that affection and friendship can offer, it is charming to see her, sportive child that she is, playing with her younger brothers and sisters, and remember that the previous evening she had made the public tremble and weep, and, as it were, hang suspended on her life. The mimetic talent of Marietta is extremely natural. No lesson of theatrical tradition has taken away the bloom of her originality, or even interfered with it. While a mere child, only four years old, she used to amuse herself with playing at mock representations. She sang duets with her mother, who was an admirable amateur, and it frequently happened during the fine summer evenings, when little Marietta was singing, thinking that nobody heard her except those in the room, that a sudden explosion from people listening without the chateau followed the performance, and awoke in the mind of the young countess the first dream of her aspiration for public applause. She had much to go through, however, poor child! before arriving at the wished-for goal. Entreaties, earnest and prolonged, having failed with her father, she addressed herself—good Italian as she is—to the adored image of Jesus the Nazarene, in the church of St. John. She implored it and offered it valuable gifts if it would unbend that will which opposed all the yearnings of her heart.

Singular coincidence! Four centuries previously, in 1464, Marietta's ancestor, Pope Pius the Second, bequeathed to the same church the right hand of John the Baptist, brought to Italy from the Morea by Thomas Paleoque, and implored the divine protection to assist him in converting Mahomet II., and, in this crusade against the Turks, offered to Europe the singular spectacle of a pope who made himself a general! . . . The views of young Piccolomini were even more favorably received than those of the Holy Pontiff, since, as everybody knows, the Turk remained Sultan, and the Pope died during the expedition; while the charming virtuosa, fortified by the paternal consent, appeared on the stage of the Pergola in Florence, with the most triumphant success, charmed all those who wished to encourage her in her new career, and afflicted her parents with inconsolable anguish.

And how, indeed, could success have failed her, possessed of talent, youth, a charming person, and a passionate love for the art? She is twenty years of age; and, during the four she has been on the stage, she has already acquired, in the principal towns of Italy, the highest renown. Her form, rather tall, is extremely graceful; her features are regular; her mouth is beautiful, and her eyes full of softness and expression. An admirable actress, never losing sight of her part, because she throws her whole soul and feeling into it, she excels, above all, in pathetic and touching music, and the play of her countenance adds forcibly to the effect of her sympathetic voice. Not content with the brilliant successes she has obtained in the operas of Bellini, Donizetti, and other masters, she was desirous of creating a character, and to restore new life to a work abandoned by all the "prima donnas." She brought back the Traviata of Verdi to the stage, and achieved a success at Turin that will be remembered for many years. Paris, whither she intends going next September, will pronounce its irrevocable verdict upon the opera and upon the artist. We doubt not that the Parisian public, so difficult to please, and so delicate in appreciation, will at once acknowledge and accept the double talent of Mlle. Piccolomini, which consists not only in vocalizing in a remarkable manner, but in histrionic powers, that often reach perfection.

The young cantatrice, not wishing to deprive Sienna, her native place, of the pleasure of hearing her sing, with a disinterestedness above all praise, gave fourteen representations at the theatre, the receipts of which were all distributed among the poor. In addition to the enthusiastic reception she met with every evening, being sometimes called as often as forty times before the curtain, after the last representation, all the youth of the town and country, carrying torches in their hands, attended by bands of music, escorted her in triumph from the theatre to her own house. Here we are presented with a coincidence analogous to that we have specialized above. Contrast the striking phases of her life when the extremes touch! Before the altar of the Virgin—the chef-d'œuvre of Francisco di Giorgio, and the principal ornament of the Place of Sienna—in 1469, passed Pope Pius II. (Piccolomini), on leaving the cathedral, when, after a lenten sermon, he had presented the rose d'or to the municipality. He was reconducted to his palace by an enthusiastic crowd, who kissed the traces of his sandals. The sublime frescoes copied from the cartoons of Raphael by Pinturichio may almost be accounted living witnesses of this scene. Well—To this same place, four hundred years later, we have seen the great-grand-niece of the Pontiff, escorted by a crowd of people assembled from every corner of Italy to hear her sing—who re-conducted her, as her ancestor, Pius II., was re-conducted, to the Palace Piccolomini. The one came from the cathedral, the other from the theatre; traversed the same places, with almost the same ceremonials; the one circinctured with a tiara, the other crowned with golden laurels, and proclaimed the Ristori of song—throwing to the crowd her lace handkerchief, that her fervent admirers might preserve its fragments, even as the indulgences and relics were formerly distributed by the Pontiff. The Pope bequeathed to his native town chefs-d'œuvre of arts, imperishable remembrances of his munificence; the artist succors the afflicted, and bestows on the hospitals large sums of money, the produce of her talent. Thus, in all times, this patrician family has merited from a grateful country the veneration which it still enjoys. Who knows but that Providence, in his unseen ways, may prepare for the young Piccolomini that triumph which was the ambition of her great-grand-uncle?—that the descendant of the Caliph, who, they say, is about to make a tour in France, may be so far impressed by Marietta Piccolomini's representation of Polyucte, as to become a good catholic on the spot? This, indeed, would be a splendid coup-de-theatre!

LE COLONEL F. COLOMBARI.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

THE TWO MINSTREL-HOSTS.

[From the German of AUERSPERG.]

I slept where an elm-grove darkened the ground,
And the dead bards lay in their coffins around.
The birds with their music had lulled me to sleep,
And the branches made hymns in the wind's low sweep.

And now, when all eyes to slumber were gone,
And Love and Sorrow alone watched on,
The lids of the coffins all rattled and shook,
The lids of the coffins all rattled and broke.

Like wave on wave in the sounding main,
Came forth from the coffins a minstrel-train,
To thousands and thousands the shadow-host swell'd,
And each bony figure an instrument held.

Their lips are all dry, and their glance is cold,
And the pallid cheek is sunken and old,
And with hands through which no feeling ran,
To hammer and pound on the strings they began.

And as, in chorus, they hammer and pound,
There falls on my ear no tone or sound;
But owls from their coverts went flying about,
And from chinks in the rocks grinning Cobolds peep'd out.

And the grass all withered in the place,
And the moon, with a cloud, veiled her modest face;
Thus nightly, at midnight, they thrum, and the key
Of the strain is—OBLIVION and VANITY!

Hark! a sound like the angels' trumpet-call,
When the worlds into being were summoned all;
The leaves of the forest all murmur and thrill,
The meadow-grass rustles, and tinkles the rill.

And thousands of coffins clap suddenly to;
Crowd back to their slumbers the thrumming crew;
Then thousands of coffins wide open fly,
And a minstrel-race comes sweeping by!

A seed that shall never extinguished be,
Nursed at the breast of eternity,
With eye of lightning and yet so mild,
And the rosy face of a loving child.

And lo! the majestic minstrel-choir
All strike together the sounding wire,
Like the seraphim's prayer—like an avalanche—rang
Along the broad plain the melodious clang.

The waters stopped flowing to hear them sing,
The roses bloomed as if it were spring,
And round them, in fuller moonlight, wove
The elfin-children their dance in the grove.

The tree shook his head for joy, 'twould seem,
The bird on the bough dreamed a sweeter dream;
Thus nightly, at midnight, they sing, and the key
Of the strain is—IMMORTALITY!

As one song-greeted and crowned with rose,
The sunken sun in his mountain-grave glows;
Once more through the spaces a murmur swept,
And the minstrels again in their coffins slept.

The rattling startled me and I woke,
Already the day in the East had broke,
The stones are all fast, the sepulchre sealed,
And the morning air breaths over the field.

But though the minstrels long since reposed,
And their everlasting mansions closed,
One song of the two bids my heart yet thrill,
I have sung it, and, dying, shall sing it still.

But which of the hosts has inspired my rhyme?
Thou, thou shalt reveal it, all-judging Time!
When the grave-rose blooms, and I am gone,
With one of them still shall my song sound on.

C. T. B.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 24, 1856.

Beethoven's "Egmont" Music.

"FROM MY DIARY."

NEW YORK, MAY 21. Last Saturday evening, for the first time, within the walls of the theatre known as the "Academy" in this city, the occasion EISELDT's concert, much impressed with the beauty and commodiousness of the building, much troubled by the manner of lighting it, but better pleased with its acoustic qualities than in any theatre of its size I have visited. I tried the parquette, the second boxes, and finally the amphitheatre, where I had several hundred seats at my disposal, being the only occupant, and where I listened in delightful silence, far from the talkers below, to the entire second part. Oh, those talkers—those ———! Well, well! Here is the programme:

PART I.

1. Overture to Oberon,.....WEBER
2. "Ah, perfido," sung by Miss BRAINARD.
3. Adagio and Finale from Mendelssohn's delightful Concerto in G minor, the piano-forte played by RICHARD HOFFMANN.
4. "Matilda a me repita," scena and aria by EISELDT, composed for and sung by BADIALI.

PART II.

BEETHOVEN's music to "Egmont," with explanatory poem by DONALD McLEOD, the songs by Miss BRAINARD.

When one considers that our orchestras, except when rehearsing for the few concerts of the winter, which bring them all together, are scattered among a multitude of places of amusement, where the lack of numbers must be made up by the loudness of the few, it becomes a matter of surprise that such perfection can be attained as we really find. Though the fine delicacy and pure liquid flow of the tones from the bowed instruments, which distinguishes a few world-renowned orchestras made up of virtuosos, was wanting, it seemed to me, fresh from the great concerts of Berlin and Leipzig, that the performance of the opening overture was one not to be ashamed of anywhere. It has always been a curious point with me to compare the fairy music of Weber with that of Mendelssohn. Could Weber have known the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture? He might; it was composed before "Oberon." How beautiful are both! but Weber's fairies are far different from Shakespeare's.

One of the most remarkable proofs, to my mind, of the success which would have followed Beethoven's dramatic efforts, had his application to be appointed composer to the Vienna Opera been favorably received, is the Scena and Air: Ah! perfido, sweetly sung by Miss BRAINARD, and nicely accompanied. In form it is thoroughly Italian, after the manner of Salieri, Cimarosa, and others of his day, while at the same time the depth of feeling, both in the delicious melody and the splendid accompaniment, is peculiarly Beethoven's own. I know few if any pieces composed as this was, simply for a concert piece, which comes near it. He has out-Italianed the Italians themselves. At the time it was written, it was performed at Beethoven's own concerts, to the delight of the Vienna public, of all grades and schools. As a general rule, scenes and airs can have their due effect only when heard in their proper connection in the operas to which they belong. A mere concert piece of the kind must therefore have uncommon merit to touch the heart as does Beethoven's Ah! perfido, unconnected as it is with any plot or text beside. I wish to thank Miss Brainard most heartily for singing this beautiful piece in all the simplicity of its notation, and for not once giving way to the temptation of showing off her powers by some misplaced cadenza. Few women singers, nowadays, could resist the temptation to sing the entire air in the "wiggly voice," and still fewer would have passed the pause near the end without inserting two or three chromatic runs, which they had learned under Signor This or Mons. That, and call it a cadenza. As long as Miss Brainard sings so sweetly as on this evening. God speed her!

What a beautiful Adagio is that from the G minor of Mendelssohn! But is not the finale inferior to it? Still this Concerto as a whole is a favorite, and that justly. Mr. HOFFMANN was much applauded.

It was a hard trial for Mr. EISELDT's Scena and Aria, that but one performance separated it from the glorious Ah! perfido. It made no deep impression upon me, though sung magnificently by BADIALI. I have heard no such singing during the last two years.

But to Part II. Fifty-eight years ago Bernadotte, then a young and rising man, was sent to Vienna as minister of the French Republic. Among his familiar acquaintances there was a young musician, then just doubling his fame as the greatest pianist of his day by proving himself also the greatest of the rising composers. Beethoven and Bernadotte became warm personal friends, and the young Frenchman's republicanism found an echo in the breast of the German. How much the latter was imbued with hatred to tyranny, his "Fidelio," his "Heroic Symphony," and above all, his music to "Egmont," show. All these are works of the same epoch, and were composed under similar circumstances. In "Fidelio," tyranny, as exercised upon the individual, calls out all the resources of the great composer; in the Symphony he paints the hero and his mission; in the "Egmont" music, he illustrates a drama, whose subject is the fall of a hero whose blood is the seed of liberty and freedom from the tyrant's yoke.

The entire misapprehension which seems to prevail upon the intentions of the composer in this music, must excuse me for a few words upon this topic. To judge of this music by the standard of popular opera is as absurd as it is unjust to the composer. As long ago as the days of Shakespeare we find that music was a companion to the drama. Think how often we find directions in his plays for strains from his orchestra, such as it was. To this day but few theatres are without more or less musicians to keep the audience in good humor between the acts, and in a few cases music has been composed expressly for particular plays, especially upon the German stage. Any attempt at operatic music, and especially the music of the Italian opera, would be in the highest degree ridiculous. With the exception of a song or two, there is no room for vocal music, and the difficulty of finding actors and actresses capable of great musical execution would render simple strains indispensable, even if in most cases they were not the most appropriate. The composer is confined by the necessities of the case to the overture, entr'actes, marches, and occasionally a passage of melodrama or a short descriptive bit of harmony.

The overture he may make as broad as he pleases, and the most successful ones are such as paint musically an outline of the entire play; the overture, as a mere introduction, like some to Gluck's operas, that to Haydn's "Creation," is not commonly, if ever, found written to the spoken drama. Those to the "Summer Night's Dream," by Mendelssohn, and to Collin's "Coriolan," by Beethoven, are instances probably most familiar to the readers of the Journal of Music. Now it is clear that this kind of music can never have its due effect upon an audience to which the drama for which it is written is not familiar; no poem, no lecture, no story given to the audience in a programme, is sufficient for any auditor, unless that auditor know the composer's mode of musical expression through long study and much hearing, or, as just intimated, is familiar with his subject matter. In Germany, where "Egmont" is as familiar as "Hamlet" or "Richard III." with us, and where each auditor who ever attends such concerts as those at which such music could ever find place, is supposed to know every character and situation from much reading of the play, the poem there recited is sufficient to give the key to the music; just as with us; we could enjoy Mendelssohn's music, so often referred to, explained in the same manner. But how many of our audience, from the simple statement of the reciter, could last Saturday evening form any conception of the real characters and situations which the music introduced or represented? That any enjoyment at all was felt by a majority of the hearers, under the circumstances, is a tribute of no small value to the truth and beauty of the composition.

Let me give the programme as it is printed in the arrangement for four hands, with such notes and comments as occur. The overture is familiar to the frequenters of the symphony concerts everywhere. It is to me not the grandest, not the most exciting of Beethoven's works of the class, but the most beautiful. I felt in its every note the master's admiration and love for the characters of Egmont and Clara, and the throbbings of his great heart at the fate of his hero and the glorious fruits which it produced.

At the close of the overture the curtain rises and the music is silent until the scene in which Clara appears, and, radiant with happiness and pride in her noble lover, sings her soldier song:

No. I.

"The war-drum is rolling, high soundeth the fife;
My lover, all harnessed, commandeth the strife;
He holds the lance proudly, he orders the army.
My heart throbs aloud—how kindles my blood!
Ah, if as a soldier beside him I stood,
From hence would I follow with courage and pride,
Wherever he led me, I'd fight by his side;
The foe-man would shrink as we charged on the van;
O heaven! what pleasure, were I but a man!"

The simplicity and beauty of the original is but slenderly preserved by him who translated this exquisite song of Goethe. Still one may form some idea of the young girl, who, from her low social position, looks upward with love and veneration as to a God. Of all soldier songs that I know, that in the "Daughter of the Regiment" included, there is none the music of which to me is so full of emotion and simple beauty as this. It is the beauty of the German popular song, and must be judged from that standard—a style of music as distinct and national as that of the Scotch. Where I sat, the voice of Miss Brainard came sweetly and clearly to my ears above the accompaniment, and I was fully satisfied with her performance. And how full of martial ardor and excitement is that accompaniment! This is another of the great qualities of Beethoven, that his music is so perfectly appropriate.

No. II. This is the short musical introduction to Act II. It begins with an Andante, in which Beethoven paints the grief of the constant Brackenburgh over his unhappy love for Clara, referring especially to the words: "Could I but forget the time when she loved me, or seemed to love me! And—and now? Let me die! Why do I hesitate?" The Andante is followed by an Allegro con brio, in which is painted the restlessness of the citizens of Brussels under the Spanish yoke, and the constantly increasing excitement among the people.

No. III. is the introduction to the next act, and paints the warnings and presentiments of the Prince of Orange, with the replies of the joyous, careless, Egmont—their farewell, to which these words are the key:

Egmont. What! tears, Orange?

Orange. To weep for one who is lost is manly.

No. IV. is the song in which Clara speaks her longing for the presence of her lover. Clara sings:

"Cheerful and tearful, unwilling or fain,
Longing and mourning in passionate pain;
Joy to feel keenly, or anguish to prove,
Happy alone is the heart that can love."

No. V. Introduction to Act IV., consisting of, echo of the love scene between Egmont and Clara; Clara at Egmont's feet—"So let me die; the world has no joy after this!"—march of the soldiers of Alva into Brussels, and closing with indications of the feelings of the citizens, as expressed in the words of Jetter: "I felt it badly the moment the Duke came into the city. Since that moment it seems to me as if the heaven was covered with a pall, which hangs so low that one must bow himself not to touch it. I snuff the odor of an execution morning; the sun will not appear—the mists stink."

No. VI. Introduction to Act V. Egmont's feelings when Alva orders him to surrender his sword; the warning words of Orange again rise in his memory; Clara's emotions upon learning of her beloved's arrest; her attempt to arouse the citizens to his rescue; and finally, her resignation and determination not to outlive him.

No. VII. Clara's death. "I draw nearer and nearer the blessed fields, and the delights of peace from that world already breathe upon me. I have conquered; call me not back again to strife."

No. VIII. Melodrama. Egmont sleeps and dreams to the sound of what Shakespeare would call "still music." He sees his beloved appear in the form of Liberty, proclaiming victory to the people; her hero falls, but in his blood is the seed of freedom.

No. IX. is a repetition of the close of the overture, the triumph of the people over the power of Spain, and the expulsion of Alva.

Such is the famous music to "Egmont." Whether it was given us better than ever before since the world stood, I do not know—I do not care. It was well done. If critics can find fault, let them. I go to hear Beethoven, and thank Eisfeld from the bottom of my heart that he has given it to us and enabled me to fill my very soul with the emotions depicted by the master of all masters.

As to Mr. Eisfeld's success pecuniarily, I fear there is little favorable to say. A great number of seats were marked taken, which was matter for rejoicing until it came out that they belonged to stockholders of the Academy, who had refused to allow them to be sold!

With half a dozen such "academies," what progress would be made here in music!

Music in Philadelphia.

The "City of Brotherly Love" has exhibited a good deal of musical activity during these last weeks, particularly in the production of new works by resident musicians. The most important of these would seem to be a new Oratorio by one of the longest established and most able of the Philadelphia musicians, Mr. LEOPOLD MEIGNEN. The Evening Bul- letin gives the following account of its first performance:

MR. MEIGNEN'S NEW ORATORIO.—The first performance of the original oratorio of "The Deluge," written by Mr. Leopold Meignen, of this city, took place last evening, before a large audience at the Musical Fund Hall—the vocal forces of the Harmonia Sacred Music Society and an orchestra of thirty-six performers taking part. The words of "The Deluge" are by M. Meignen, and they are singable and sensible, if not poetical and elegant. He has contrived to interweave a good dramatic story into the Scripture account of the flood, and his "Deluge" might almost be acted on the stage as Mehul's "Joseph" often is in Europe. But Mr. Meignen's business is that of music and not poetry, and to the music we must confine ourselves.

The overture is a most effective composition. The first movement, chiefly sustained by the wind instruments, is in a large imposing style. Some very beautiful passages for the clarinet solo are introduced, and were admirably played by Mr. Stoll. Then follows a quieter movement for the whole band, gradually increasing in intensity, with a pretty melodic flow on the surface, while, beneath, the whole resources of the orchestra are called into play to give variety and spirit to what struck us as one of the most effective orchestral compositions that we have heard. This overture is worthy to take its place in the repertoire of overtures so often played at our concerts. It was very well done by the orchestra last evening, and was warmly applauded.

The vocal performance begins with a chorus, sung by Noah's family—an evening prayer—an exquisite bit of composition, equally removed from the psalm-tune style and the hackneyed prayers of the stage. Then follows a long dialogue, recitatives, solos and duets, between Noah, (basso,) and Gabriel, (tenor,) in which the coming flood is revealed and the directions are given for the building of the ark. There were some very happy musical thoughts in this portion. A chorus of revellers is then heard, interrupting for a time the dialogue. This chorus is bright and rollicking, and makes a very excellent termination for the first part.

The second part begins with a scene for a contralto voice, after which occurs one of the gems of the piece—an unaccompanied chorus, "Lord of Heaven," exquisitely written, with some beautiful effects for all the voices, and admirably sung by the members of the Society. A long scene then follows between the soprano and tenor, the barytone coming in toward the close. Then comes another remarkable chorus—that of the workmen finishing the ark—the idea of it not unlike the choruses in Les Diamans de la Couronne and Il Trovatore, but the development of it much finer than either. It, too, was heartily applauded. A soprano solo succeeded, in a grave severe style, with long-sustained phrases, and a lack of obvious melody, but at the same time exhibiting great learning and knowledge of effects, especially in the accompaniments. The remainder of the second part is made up chiefly of recitative, though a quartet toward the close deserves mention as one of the best written passages in the whole work.

The rising of the waters and all the imaginary phenomena of the flood are then illustrated by the orchestra in a descriptive symphony, in which Mr. Meignen again exhibits his perfect mastery over the mysteries of orchestral writing. Voices are heard at intervals, introduced with admirable effect. Part III. opens with a lovely chorus by the occupants of the ark. Then follow several concerted pieces and the soprano voice has afterwards a solo in the bravura style, with chorus, which was so well done as to receive an encore. The subsidence of the waters and the resting of the ark are then described, and after a solo by Gabriel, the oratorio concludes with a fugue, very clear and distinct and very well sung, receiving the plaudits even of the unlearned in the art.

It is difficult to give a judgment on a work of this kind after a single hearing, and we are therefore gratified to hear that the Harmonia Society will repeat it on the 22d inst. But even at one hearing we have ventured to express our delight with all the instrumental chorals writing. If Mr. Meignen were equally happy in his solos, or if he could subdue his learning sufficiently to make for single voices a simple style of melody that would be readily appreciated by all and would not puzzle those whose ear is ever seeking rhythm in music, there would be nothing to complain of. Even of this we are not disposed to complain, with the recollection upon us of the delight afforded by his really noble orchestral and choral writing, which is such as to entitle him to a place among the first writers of the age. The Harmonia Society deserve credit for undertaking an original work of this kind, involving so much labor and risk. Several of their singers, especially the principal lady, (who had a most arduous task to perform,) and the barytone who sang the music of Hiran, were excellent. The orchestra was always correct. A little taming down in some of the accompaniments will be an improvement at the next performance.

Another new candidate for musical fame is a Grand three act Opera, in English, entitled "Anne of Austria," the music by Signor LUIGI LA GRASSA, the libretto by PETER F. STOUT, Esq. In the absence of a suitable English company and other conditions of producing it upon the stage, it was given on the 19th inst. as an operatic concert, at the Musical Fund Hall, the composer himself presiding at the piano, with a large array of solo singers, a chorus composed of members of the Musical Union and the Rossini Association, and "an orchestra," Dr. W. P. CUNNINGTON, conductor. Fitzgerald's City Item was "very much pleased, all things considered," but gives a queer report of the treatment which this "Anne of Austria" had to undergo:

The opera was not fairly presented. There were but seven stringed instruments and one piano—not another instrument of any kind. Rather weak, you will say, reader. The chorus was pretty full, but not good. The first tenor sang out of tune constantly—the second tenor could not be heard, and the first and second basso did not appear to be on good terms; indeed, we have never heard our friend Rohr to greater disadvantage. The hall was filled with musical critics, music teachers, music sellers and their clerks, who walked about, shuffled their feet, and laughed and talked in a most ill-bred manner—making all kind of fun of the singers. And, yet, the opera succeeded—in fact, the success was decided and unequivocal. The music is of a light and pleasing character, and the melodies are not less pleasing from being slightly familiar now and then.

M. Legrassa deserves strong words of encouragement. Young, poor, friendless, he has produced a work of art which would reflect credit upon any of our leading musicians. The work is not perfect, but it is very fine for a first effort.

CONCERTS.

MISS ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS had a good audience at the Music Hall last Saturday afternoon. The programme was popular and light, with the exception of a Piano-forte Sonata, played by Mr. S. H. MAY, set down in the bills as by Mendelssohn, but which proved to be one of the early set by Beethoven, dedicated to Haydn, and was unceremoniously cut up and murdered in the rendering. Miss PHILLIPPS sang a brilliant scene by Verdi (in English) very finely, and was admired as usual in Non più mesta and her smaller pieces. We were struck with the sweet, fresh quality of Mr. C. R. ADAMS's tenor, who sang a Romanza by Mercadante with considerable expression. The orchestra was that of the Germania Serenade Band, led by Mr. SCHULTZE, and played no overture, only some waltzes and an operatic arrangement. We wish Miss Phillipps all success in her Western tour.

We were unable to attend the Farewell Concert of Mr. HARRISON MILLARD on Saturday evening. We learn that Mercantile Hall was perfectly crowded, and that the singing of the young tenor, and of our two native prime donne, Miss HENSLEY and Miss PHILLIPPS, excited the greatest enthusiasm. Mr. Millard sailed in the steamer of Wednesday for Europe, designing to pass the summer in London and Paris. The kind wishes of many friends follow him, and we trust it will not be long before we listen to his voice again.—Miss Hensley also sails for Italy next Saturday.

The third and last of the new series of AFTERNOON CONCERTS took place on Wednesday, and fairly closed the season. The Music Hall was uncommonly full, the programme and the playing of the best. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, though we would rather have heard something which has been less familiar of late, was deeply interesting. It is the first movement whose power and beauty come out more by repetition than either of the others. But how much stronger, greater every way, while so much simpler, seemed Beethoven's glorious overture to "Egmont"! That thrilled and satisfied. How Rossini's overtures have mingled themselves with the musical impressions of the last generations! They have become part of our natural musical sunshine, to be enjoyed as sunshine, in careless, recreative mood. The brilliant La Gazza Ladra made an agreeable conclusion, after the pretty waltzes, and the well-played, though for a hall rather too loud, operatic scena by the Germania Serenade (brass) Band.

Musical Chit-Chat.

One of the choicest programmes to which we have ever had the pleasure of listening was performed a few evenings since in a private musical party at the hospitable house of one of our warmest lovers of classical music. It was a double satisfaction to hear such good things, and to hear them in a company of forty or fifty persons, every one of whom loved music, and was careful not to lose a note. Not a piece upon the programme had been played before, so far as we know, in any concert in this city. It was as follows:

Quatuor, No. 10,Mozart.
Sonata: Piano and Violoncello: Op. 46, Mendelssohn.
Solo: Violin: 8th Concerto,Spohr.
Sonata: Piano and Violin: Andante and Finale,
Op. 30,Beethoven.
Solo: Viola: with Piano accomp't, Op. 12,David.
Quatuor: No. 12, Op. 127,Beethoven.
Duetting: Violin and Viola, Op. 25,Mozart.

The Quatuors by Mozart and Beethoven are each among the most remarkable by their respective authors. The performers were Mr. TREMKLE, piano forte; SCHULTZE, 1st violin; MEISEL, 2d violin; ECKHARDT, viola; and WULF FRIES, violoncello. A better quartet we have never heard in Boston.... We were mistaken in the voice that sang the tenor solo in Dr. TUCKERMAN's "Musical Service" the other evening. It was not Mr. MILLARD, but Mr. FRANK HOWARD, organist and conductor of music at the Stone Chapel. So much the worse for our "guessing," and so much the more credit to Mr. Howard.... Our "Diarist" and for some time Berlin correspondent, "A. W. T.", as to-day's paper elsewhere affords living proof, has returned from Europe, and will be with us after a short stay in New York. He arrived last week in the steamer Hermann. The sets of Beethoven's Sonatas, which we before spoke of his procuring, are on the way by sailing vessel, and will probably be ready for subscribers here soon after the first of June.

The chapter of Mme. GEORGE SAND's story, which we give to-day, will be found particularly interesting to musical readers: Henceforth to the conclusion "The Castle in the Wilderness" will be full of interest and instruction with regard to Art.

Another of those graceful Floral Concerts, so appropriate to the season, in which music, flowers, and happy faces and voices of children blend their fascinations, is to take place in the Music Hall next Thursday evening, under the direction of Mr. C. H. CLARKE. This gentleman's rare faculty of teaching children how to sing in chorus, has been abundantly illustrated in the various exhibitions of the Warren Street Chapel, with which he has been for several years connected. He gives the present entertainment on his own account, with a select choir of 200 children, including his oldest and best pupils. The stage will be again transformed into a grove of evergreen, with natural flowers and other picturesque adornments, and the youthful songs and choruses have been woven into a connected whole, under the title of "Flora's Festival," the music by Mr. W. B. BRADBURY, of New York. It must necessarily prove quite attractive.

Mr. WILLIS, in his Musical World, administers the following just rebuke to a portion of the audience at the Academy on the Freyshütz night.

The German opera always draws a German crowd in the upper regions (particularly) of the Academy edifice. Perfectly orderly and manageable at home, the lower-class Germans, until they have been in this country some time, think it is an element of freedom to be rude, vociferous and unlicensed in their behavior here. Many of them have to be flogged out of this idea by the policeman's "locust," or by other unsoftly persuasive means, before they are brought to their senses and made decent citizens. Some of them have painfully needed such a flogging for the last two German nights at the Academy. They took it upon themselves to hiss a chorus of German girls, such as we suppose could hardly be gotten together for the emergency and who stood faltering, and distrustfully there, doing the best they could; and more than this, the better singers, even Madame de Lagrange herself has been subjected to that sound, which any serpent-sneak can from his corner emit without much betraying himself and yet reaching and wounding a singer. One person alone undertook throughout the opera of Martha the other night, systematically to hiss, when there was any (so-well-deserved) applause of this great singer. Such a boor ought to be made nearer acquainted with the historical mud-puddles of his native village.

JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT has been singing in Edinburgh and Glasgow. Her "Auld Robin Gray" is said to have created an unprecedented excitement. It is said that RUBINSTEIN, the young Russian pianist and composer, has received flattering offers for a concert tour in the United States. The "Mountaineers," a band of singers from Berne, Switzerland, were to sing last evening at the Tabernacle in New York. Their album contains, it is said, a very complimentary autograph of Jenny Lind. They are famous for warbling complicated orchestral pieces with their voices. MAETZKE has found his opera season so successful in New York, that he continues it for two weeks more. It is said he will come to Boston with his whole force about the first of June. BADIALI is of them; therefore we trust we may have "William Tell." Der Freyschütz, too, can hardly be the hacknied thing here which some of the critics have pronounced it in New York. Lucia was given last Monday night, and last evening (for the first time) Verdi's Luiza Miller. On the whole, there has been very little novelty. The dashing VESTALI has been enrapturing the juveniles again in her three favorite rôles of Orsini, Arsace and the gipsy Azucena. She will soon go back to Mexico, the great scene of her triumphs. Mme. LAGRANGE is said will return to Europe this summer. Handel's Oratorio, "Judas Macabæus," was performed last week for the first time in New York, by the Harmonic Society, under the direction of CARL BERGMANN.

Music Abroad.

London.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The second concert of the season had the following programme:

PART I.
Sinfonia in G minor,Mozart.
Duetto: "Fol' dem Freunde," Mme. Viardot and Herr Formes (Faust),Spohr.
Concerto in D minor, Piano-forte, Mme. Clara Schumann,Mendelssohn.
Aria di Bravura, "Mi paventi," Mme. Viardot (Britannico),Graun.
Overture (Jessonda),Spohr.

PART II.

Sinfonia Pastorale,Beethoven.
Aria: "Solche hergelaufne Laffen," Herr Formes (Die Entführung aus dem Serail),Mozart.
Overture (Anacreon),Cherubini.
Conductor—Professor Sterndale Bennett.

According to the News, the orchestral pieces were perfectly well played, and Mr. Bennett's skill and judgment were shown in the just tempo of every movement, and the bringing out of every delicacy of effect and expression. Mme. Schumann is said to have played Mendelssohn's Concerto better than any one since Mendelssohn himself. The same critic speaks of —The bravura air from the Britannico of Graun, the celebrated chapel-master to Frederick the Great a hundred years ago. For the revival of this forgotten morceau we are indebted to Madame Viardot, by whom it was sung. It belongs to the part of Agrippina, the mother of the Emperor Nero, and is an outburst of the hate and fear which she felt towards her atrocious son. It is a grand old song, in a style that is now quaint and antiquated, being full of roulades and div-

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line	10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line	5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion	$12.00
Do do each subsequent	$6 00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.

Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 217.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 31, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 9.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 283 Washington St. "
"GEORGE P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row, "
"A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
"C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
"SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
"GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
"G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
"JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
"MILLER & BRACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
"W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
"W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
"HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by
JOHN S. DWIGHT, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court
of the District of Massachusetts.]

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Translated from the French of Madame Dubouant, for the Journal of Music.

CHAPTER X.

OTTAVIO.

"Master Boccaferri," cried I, gently opening the curtain, "do you recognize the voice of the Commander?"

"Yes, pardieu, I do recognize the voice," answered he, "but I cannot say to whom it belongs. A thousand devils! there is either a ghost or an intruder here; what does this mean, my children?"

"This means, my father," said Ottavio, turning towards me and revealing the pure and noble features of Cecilia, "that we have one more good actor and one more good friend among us."

She came to me with outstretched hand. With one bound I leaped into the place for the orchestra; I seized her hand and covered it with kisses, and then embraced old Boccaferri, who held out his arms to me. It was the first time I had ever dreamed of giving him such a salute, the idea of which would have filled me with disgust two months before. It is true that this was the first time I had seen him sober and not smelling of an old pipe and new wine.

Celio embraced me also with more affection than I had supposed him capable of. The grief of his fiasco had passed off, and with it all bitterness in his language and in his features.

"Friend," said he to me, "I wish to present you to all I love. You see before you Floriani's four children, my sisters, Stella and Beatrice, and my younger brother Salvator, the Benjamin of the family, a good and merry child, who was growing pale in a law office, and who left the sober profession of scribe two days since to come and learn to be an artist in the school of our adopted father, Boccaferri. We are fixed here for the rest of the winter; some carry on their education and others their dramatic studies. We will explain all to you some other time; now we must not be too much taken up with embraces and explanations, or we shall forget the play; we shall cool towards the principal business of our life, that which is first here—the dramatic art."

"Only one word more," said I to him, looking sideways at Cecilia. "Cruel ones! why did you forsake me? If the most improbable and unforeseen accident had not conducted me hither, I might never have seen you again except across the footlights; for you promised to write me, Celio, and you forgot me."

"A falsehood!" cried he, laughing. "A letter from me, enclosing an invitation from our dear host, the marquis, awaits you this very moment in Vienna. Did you not tell me that you were not to cross the Alps until spring? It is for you to explain how you found us here, or rather, how you discovered our retreat, and why it was necessary that these girls should compromise themselves so far as to write you a note at my dictation, to give you courage to come in at the door instead of spying round the windows. If yesterday's adventure had not put me upon your track, if I had not followed the marks of your indiscreet footsteps upon the snow to Volabi's house, where I saw your name upon a trunk in his coach-house, would you have planned some terrible surprise?"

"I? I was the most stupid and innocent of spies. I did not know you were here. My head was turned by your nightly revels, which have excited the whole village, and I came to try if I could find out the manias of Monsieur le Marquis de Balma. But, by the way," cried I, bursting into a loud laugh, and then casting an uneasy and confused glance around me, "in whose house are we now? What are you doing with the old marquis, and how can he sleep in such a hubbub?"

The whole company looked at each other with surprise, and then Beatrice laughed loudly as I had done.

But Boccaferri began to speak, and with great coolness answered:

"The old marquis is really a monomaniac," said he. "He has a great passion for the theatre, and his first care, when he found himself rich and owner of a fine castle, was to call together, through my means, the select troupe which you see before you, and that he may hide them here, he makes them pass for his family. As he sleeps a great deal and is rather deaf, we rehearse without being annoyed by his presence, and at the first opportunity we shall make our débuts before him; but as he is thought to mourn the death of his generous brother, who only made him his heir because he forgot to disinherit him, he commands the greatest secrecy. That is why no one knows how our nights are spent, and they prefer to imagine that we invoke the evil one, rather than that we are practising the greatest and most complete of all the arts. Stay with us, then, Salentini, as long as you please, and if you like it, take part in our theatre. As I make rain and sunshine here, your true name need not be known if you wish to change it. In case of need, you can pass for the sixth child of the marquis. I am his right hand and his factotum, and choose and direct the subjects. You see I have long been intimate with this kind nobleman, which must not surprise you, as he is an old drunkard, and we became intimate friends at restaurants; but we have reformed here, and since we can have as much wine as we please, our society is charming. But come! we are forgetting the play, and we must not tell stories in the entr'acte. Will you continue the statue to the end? It is only a skilful display; to-morrow you can have any rôle you desire in some other play, or else you may take that of Ottavio, and Cecilia shall create the rôle of Elvira, which we have suppressed. You already understand that we have invented a new sort of theatre, and one thoroughly suited to us. We take the first programme we come across, and improvise the dialogue, aided by our remembrance of the text. When a subject pleases us, like this, we study it for several days, changing it ad libitum. If not, we pass on to another, and often we invent the subject ourselves, trusting to the intelligence and fancy of each one to have it pass off well. You see that we only desire one thing—to be originators, and not servile interpreters. We seek inspiration, and by degrees it comes upon us. You will understand the rest, after seeing how we go on. It is already ten o'clock, and we have only played two acts. All'opra! my children! The boys to the decorations, and the girls to the manuscripts, to keep us in the order of the scenes, for order is necessary even in inspiration. Quick, quick! this entr'acte must weary the public."

Boccaferri spoke these last words in such a tone as would have made any one believe that he saw an imaginary public filling this empty and echoing hall. But he was no maniac. He gave himself up to the conscientious study of art, and he taught his pupils well in seeking himself to put in practice those theories which had been the dream of his whole life.

We went about changing the scenes. This was done in the twinkling of an eye, the decorations were so well arranged, so light and easy to move, and the machinery so perfect.

"This is an old theatre, perfect in construction and in size," said Boccaferri to me. "The Balmas have always had a great passion for theatricals, except the last, and he died, sad, tired out, perfectly selfish and good for nothing, for the mere want of having cultivated and understood this divine art. The present marquis is the worthy son of his fathers, and his first care was to bring to light the decorations and costumes which filled this wing of the mansion. It was I who brought back life to all these corpses lying in dust. You know that was my trade yonder. In a week I restored their color and elasticity. My daughter, who is a great artist, mended the garments, and brought back to them the style and extravagances common fifty years ago. The little Floriani, who wish to become artists some day, assist her and profit by her lessons. I and Celio, who is worth ten men for his promptness of execution, the dexterity of his hands, and quickness of intuition, thought we might make a stage which we could enjoy, and which should not deceive us at every turn by showing us those bare and cold side-scenes, which chill your powers and your heart as soon as you enter. In our case we do not disregard the public, who we imagine share our illusion. We always act as if the public were before us; but we only think of it in the entr'acte. During the representation we have agreed to forget it, as it should be in a real theatre. As for our method of decoration, go to the back of the room and see if the illusion and effect are not better than they would be if we had an ignoble rough side turned to us, which the public, seated at the side, never can help seeing a little.

"It is true that, to satisfy ourselves, we use simple means, whose charms would be lost upon a large stage. We plant veritable trees upon our boards, and we put real rocks even in our backdrops. We can do it, because the stage is small, and we ought to do it, since the usual means of perspective are not in our power. There is not space enough here for such to deceive us, and when our illusion goes, talent fails with it. All is bound together. Art is homogeneous; it is a magnificent resumé of the fragments of all our faculties. The theatre is this resumé par excellence, and that is why there is no true theatre, why there are no true actors, or at least so few, and those who are so are not always understood, because they find themselves like fine pearls among false diamonds, whose vulgar brilliancy outshines them.

"There are few true actors, and yet all should be so; what can an actor be without this first essential and vital condition of his art? Talent should only be distinguished from mediocrity by the degree of elevation in the mind. A man of heart and intelligence would necessarily be a great actor, if the rules of art were known and observed, while now it is often the contrary. A beautiful and intelligent woman, generous in her passions, of free and natural grace, would not be in the second rank, as was always my daughter, who was not capable of throwing into the scene the soul and genius which belongs to her in every-day life. Since she never found herself in a sphere sufficiently artistic to impress her, she was always chilled by the stage; and when you see her here, you will not recognize her. It is because nothing shocks or saddens us here. We enlarge by fancy the frame in which we desire to be impressed, and the poetry of the decoration is the gilding of that frame.

"Yes, sir," continued Boccaferri, with animation, all the time arranging a thousand little details without stopping his talk, "the unnaturalness of the mise-en-scène, the characters, the dialogue, and even the costumes, is enough to freeze the inspirations of an artist who understands the truth and cannot condescend to falsehood. There is nothing more silly than to see an actor raving in impossible scenes and declaiming ridiculous words with eloquence. It is because such dramas are written, and played into the bargain, with an absurdity worthy of them, that there are no true actors. I tell you all ought to be. Remember Cecilia. She is too intelligent not to feel the truth, and you have often seen her insufficient, almost always too self-possessed, and concealing her emotion, but you never saw her turn aside or fall into falsehood; and yet she was a tame actress. Even such as she was, she injured nothing, and the piece was none the worse for her. But I say this: if the theatre were truer, all the actors would be also, even the most mediocre and the most timid; if the stage itself were more real, all the intelligent and courageous ones would be great actors; and in those intervals, when they should not be on the stage, when the public rests after the emotions they have produced, the second-rate ones would be at least simple and natural. Instead of the torture suffered in seeing the detestable ones make grimaces, a certain confiding pleasure would be felt in following their acting in the details necessary to the plot. The public would be moulded in this school, and instead of being as to-day, unjust and stupid, would be conscientious, attentive, loving well written works, and a friend of the faithful artist. Until that time comes, don't talk to me of acting, for it is an art almost lost to the world, and all the efforts of a genius are required to bring it back to life.

"Yes, Celio, my son," said he to the young man, who was waiting till he had ceased talking to begin the next act, "your mother, a great artist, understood that. She always listened to me, and did me great justice, saying that she owed a great deal to me. It was because she shared my ideas that she wished to arrange the plays she was to act, be the manager of her own theatre, choose and mould the actors. She felt that a great actress needed good supporters, and that the tirade of a heroine cannot be impassioned when the confidante listens with a stupid stare. Together we made energetic attempts. I was her decorator, her machinist, her tutor, her costumer, and at times her poet. No doubt it was very profitable to art, but not to business. It would have cost an immense fortune to have conquered the obstacles which first rose on all sides; and then the public does not know how to second noble efforts; it prefers to lower itself for a small price rather than to become ennobled at great expense."

"But you, Celio, you, Stella, Beatrice, Salvatore, you are young, you are united, you understand art already, and together you may attempt a revolution. At least, have the desire for it, cherish the hope of it, even if it should only be a dream, if what we are now doing should only prove to be a poetical amusement, something will remain to you, which will make you superior to common actors and the superiorities of puppets. O my children! let me breathe upon you the sacred fire which makes me young again, and which has consumed me in vain until now, for want of the needful nourishment. I shall not regret having failed all my life, in every thing, having struggled with misery until I was driven to escape suicide by drunkenness. No, I shall complain of nothing in my unfortunate past, if the living offspring of Floriani may build their triumphs upon my ruins, if Celio, his brothers and his sisters realize their mother's dream, and if old Boccaferri can thus discharge his debt to the memory of that angel!"

"You are perfectly right, my friend," said Celio, "it was my mother's dream to see us all great artists; but for that, said she, Art itself must be renewed. Now, thanks to you, we understand her meaning; we understand too why she retired at thirty years, in all the brilliancy of her strength and genius, why she was so soon weary of the theatre, and proof against all illusions. I do not know that we can improve mankind in this particular; but we will make the attempt, and whatever may happen, we shall always bless your teachings, and shall owe all our joy to you; for they will indeed be great, and if the delicate tastes which you are giving us will expose us often to suffer from the contact of inferiority, when we come to the sublime, we shall feel it more sensibly than the vulgar."

We passed on to the third act, which was almost entirely taken from the Italian libretto. It was a fête champêtre, given by Don Juan to his vassals and his neighbors in the gardens of the castle. I admired the skill with which Boccaferri disguised the lack of supernumeraries. A crowd seemed to move and act behind the scenes, but they never appeared, and for the best of reasons. At times one of the actors not on the stage would skilfully imitate the murmuring of voices and the sound of distant footsteps. A dancing tune from the opera was played lightly upon some invisible instrument, suggesting a dance in the distance. These details were improvised with great art, each one taking part in the action with zeal and wonderful delicacy to aid those behind the scenes, and all without disturbing or drawing away their attention from their parts. The ingenious arrangements of dark and narrow side passages, only lighted from the stage, and growing dark as they deepened, allowed all to notice and sieze what was going on without disturbing the naturalness of the play, or being seen by the actors. Every one had something to do, and no one could forget the subject for one moment, which made them return to the stage as excited as they went off. I found I could make myself useful, without appearing in this act. The arrangement was above all a delicate thing to observe; and if I had not seen it practised by these intelligent beings, who unawares communicated to me their delicacy of perception, I could never have believed it possible to trust to the chances of improvisation, without failing in the proportion of the scenes, the order of the entrances and exits, and the remembrance of the accustomed details. It seemed that this difficulty appeared at first insurmountable to the Floriani; but Boccaferri and his daughter persisted, and their theories upon the nature of artistic inspiration, and upon the way to possess it, enlightened this mysterious work, light dawned upon their first chaos, order and logic claimed their rights in all the healthy labor of art, and the fearful obstacle was overcome with wonderful rapidity. They had even gone so far as not to hint to each other, by winking or whispering as at first. Each one had his rule written in enduring characters upon his mind; the brilliant à propos of the dialogue, the ardor of passion, the wit of the impromptu, the fantastic wandering had all the charm of liberty, and yet the action did not go astray, and if it seemed to be forgotten for a moment, to be brought back and strengthened by some chance incident, the resemblance of this mode of dramatic action with real life, (ce grand décousu, recousu sans cesse à propos.) was only the more striking and more fascinating.

In the first part of this act I admired two new actors, Beatrice (Zerlina) and Salvator (Masetto.) These two lovely children had the inestimable fortune to be just as young and fresh as their parts; and their usual manners of brotherly familiarity gave to their dispute a charming character of chastity and childish obstinacy, which in no way injured the scene; and yet this was not the intention of the Italian libretto, much less Moliere's; but what did it matter? The thing seemed better to me thus instinctively rendered. Young Salvator (the Benjamin, as he was called,) acted like an angel. He was comic, without striving to be so. He spoke the Milanese dialect, whose little graces and naive metaphors he knew so well, as he had so lately been cradled among them; he had a true feeling of the dangers which surrounded Zerlina in allowing herself to be wooed by a libertine; he reproached her coquetry with the freedom of a brother, which only made the frankness of the peasant more lifelike. He knew how to make those little malicious speeches which provoke young girls when spoken before strangers, and Beatrice was really provoked, and so she acted wonderfully without dreaming of it.

But another more learned and more experienced couple succeeded this pretty one—Anna and Ottavio. Stella was a heroine, full of nobleness, sadness and reverie. I saw that she had well read and understood Hoffmann's "Don Juan," and that she completed the character of the libretto in just intimating a delicate shade of involuntary fascination towards the irresistible enemy of her race and happiness. This point was exquisitely touched, and this victim of a secret fatality was far more virtuous and interesting thus than as merely the proud and strong daughter of the Commander, mourning and avenging her father without weakness and without pity.

But what shall I say of Ottavio? I could not conceive what could be made of this character, in taking away from him the music he sings; for Mozart alone made anything out of him. So Cecilia had everything to create, and she did it with a masterly hand; she expressed all the tenderness, the devotion, the indignation and the perseverance which Mozart alone could indicate. She translated the composer's ideas in language as elevated as his music; she gave to the young lover poetry, grace, pride, and above all, love.

"Yes, that is love," said Celio to me suddenly, in the side-scenes, whispering in my ear, as if he had answered my thought. "Listen and look at Cecilia, my friend, and strive to forget the promise I made you never to love her. I cannot answer to you for anything concerning this, for I did not know her two months ago; I had never heard her express love, and I did not know she could feel it. Now I know her, as I see her away from the public, which paralyzed her. She is transformed in my eyes, and I am transformed in my own. I believe I am as capable of loving as she. It remains to be known if we shall be to each other the object of that ardor which grows within us, without any end at present beyond the revelation of art; but trust to thy friend no longer, Adorno, and work on your own account, without help from me."

While thus speaking, Celio held my hand and pressed it convulsively. I felt, from the trembling of his whole person, that either he or I was lost.

"What is all this?" asked Boccaferri, passing near us. "Distraction? a dialogue in the side-scenes? Do you then wish to chase away the god which inspires us. Come, Don Juan, recollect yourself, forget Celio Floriani, and come, let us torment Masetto!"

[To be continued.]

Goethe on Dilettantism,

OR PRACTICAL AMATEURSHIP IN THE ARTS.

[From "Essays on Art," by GOETHE, translated by SAMUEL GRAY WARD.]

(Concluded from last week.)

ADVANTAGES OF DILETTANTISM, IN GENERAL.

It prevents an entire want of cultivation.

Dilettantism is a necessary consequence of a general extension of art, and may even be a cause of it.

It can, under certain circumstances, excite and develop a true artistic talent.

Elevates handicraft to a certain resemblance to art.

Has a civilizing tendency.

Substitutes a certain idea of art in the place of ignorance, and extends it to where the artist would not be able to reach.

Gives occupation to productive power, and cultivates something serious in man.

Appearances are changed into ideas.

Teaches to analyze impressions.

Aids the appropriation and reproduction of forms.

ADVANTAGES OF DILETTANTISM, IN DETAIL.

IN THE ARTS OF DESIGN.

Learning to see.

Knowledge of the principles by which we see. Changing the subject of a picture, i. e., the visible filling up, so far as it is unimportant.

Knowledge of forms, i. e., the filling up, so far as it is unimportant.

Learning to analyze. All commence with a simple impression, without analysis. The next step is to analyze, and the third is the return from the analysis to the feeling of the whole, which is the Æsthetic.

The Dilettant enjoys this advantage in common with the Artist, in contrast to the merely passive observer.

IN ARCHITECTURE.

Awakens the free productive force.

Is the speediest and most immediate transition from material to form, thus expressing the highest need in man.

It awakes and develops the feeling for the lofty, to which it for the most part inclines, rather than to the beautiful.

It introduces order and proportion, and teaches to strive after an appearance of beauty, and a certain freedom even in the needful and necessary.

The general advantage of Dilettantism, its civilizing tendency, and its substituting, and extending a certain artistic sense in the place of ignorance, where the artist cannot reach, applies particularly to architecture.

IN THE ART OF GARDENING.

Ideal in the Real.

Striving after form, in formless masses.

Choice.

Beautiful grouping.

Making a picture out of a reality; in short the first step into art.

A well cared for and beautiful neighborhood, has always a beneficial effect on society.

IN LYRICAL POETRY.

Cultivation of language in general.

More manifold interest "in humanioribus," in contrast to the crudeness of the ignorant, or the pedantic narrowness of the mere man of business, or pedant.

Cultivation of the feelings and of the verbal expression of the same.

The cultivated man ought to be able to express his feelings with poetic beauty.

Ideal view of objects of common life.

Cultivation of the imagination, especially as an integral part of the culture of the intellect.

Awaking and direction of the productive imagination to the highest functions of the mind in the sciences and practical life.

Cultivation of the sense of the rhythmical.

There being no objective laws, either for the internal or external construction of a poem, the amateur ought to hold fast to acknowledged models, so much the more strongly than the master does, and rather imitate the good that exists, than strive after originality; and in the external and metrical parts, follow strictly the well-known general rules.

And as the Dilettant can only form himself after models, he ought, in order to avoid one-sidedness, to acquire the most universal knowledge of all models, and survey the field of poetic literature yet more perfectly, than is required of the artist himself.

IN MUSIC.

More profound education of the sense.

Recognition of mathematical precision in the organ, and its application to the aims of sentiment and beauty.

Favors a social connexion and entertainment, without any fixed interest.

Helps to an ideal existence, even when music only calls to the dance.

IN THE DANCE.

Flexibility, and possibility of beautiful motions.

Feeling and practice of rhythm, in all motions.

Æsthetic significance of movements.

Cultivation of the physical powers, preparation of the body for all possible physical accomplishments.

Musical tuning of the body.

Proportion in movement, between too much and not enough.

Possibility of a graceful carriage.

Possibility of sympathetic action in an exalted state.

IN THE DRAMATIC ART.

Opportunity of farther cultivation in declamation.

Attention to one's own representations.

Participates in the advantages predicated of Dancing.

Exercise of the memory.

Sensible attention and accuracy.

DISADVANTAGES OF DILETTANTISM, IN GENERAL.

The Dilettant jumps over the steps, stops at certain steps which he regards as the end, and from which he thinks himself justified in judging of the whole; prevents also his perfectibility.

He subjects himself to the necessity of working by false rules, because he cannot work even as a Dilettant without some rules, and he does not understand the true objective rules.

He departs more and more from the truth of objects, and loses himself in subjective errors.

Dilettantism takes its element from art and spoils art's public, by depriving it of its earnestness and strictness.

All tendency to predilection destroys art, and dilettantism, brings in indulgence and favor. At the expense of the true artists, it brings into notice those that stand nearest to Dilettantism.

In Dilettantism the loss is always greater than the gain.

From handicraft the way is open to rise to art, but not from botch-work.

Dilettantism favors the indifferent, partial, and characterless.

Injury Dilettants do to art, by bringing artists down to their level.

Can bear no good artist near them.

In all cases, where the art itself has no proper regulative power, as in Poetry, the Art of Gardening, the Drama, the injury Dilettantism does is greater, and its pretensions more arrogant. The worst case is that of the Drama.

DISADVANTAGES OF DILETTANTISM, IN DETAIL.

IN ARCHITECTURE.

On account of the great difficulty of giving character to architecture, of imparting variety and beauty, the Dilettant, unable to attain to these, must, according to the tendency of his time, run either into the meagre and overloaded, or the heavy and unmeaning. But an architectural work, being dependent on beauty for its existence, if it have not this, is wholly null.

On account of its ideal nature, it is more easy than in any other art to run into the Fantastic, which does more injury here than anywhere else.

Since it is only the few, who are able to raise themselves to a free culture, according to the laws of pure beauty, the architectural Dilettant easily falls into sentimental and allegorical architecture, seeking in this way to superinduce the character, which he does not know how to find in beauty.

Architectural Dilettantism, without being able to accomplish the object of beauty, fails usually in the physical aim of building, utility and convenience.

The publicity and permanence of architectural works, renders the injurious effect of Dilettantism, in this department, more universal and enduring; and perpetuates false taste, for the reason that in the arts generally, the conspicuous and widely-known serves again for models.

The earnest aim of beautiful architectural works gives them a harmony with the most important and exalted moments of man, and botch-work, in this case, does him an injury in the very point where he might be most capable of perfectibility.

IN THE ART OF GARDENING.

The real treated as a work of fancy.

Garden-dilettantism runs into a sort of endlessness; 1. because it is not fixed and limited in the idea; 2. because the material is always undergoing accidental changes, and so always counteracts the idea.

Garden-dilettantism often puts the nobler arts to an unworthy use, and makes their earnest aim subservient to the end of amusement.

Favors a sentimental and fantastic nullity.

Lessens the exalted in nature, and while it imitates, removes it.

Perpetuates the reigning error of the time, viz. the wish to be free from condition and restraint in the æsthetic, and to let the fancy have free scope, while there is not, as in the other arts, any means to correct, and keep it within the bounds of propriety.

Mixing up of nature and art.

Producing an effect with mere outside appearance.

The erections it gives rise to are light, slender, wood and board constructions, and destroy the idea of solid architecture. They destroy the feeling for it. The thatched roof, the wooden screens all give an inclination for card-house architecture.

IN LYRICAL POETRY.

Belles-lettres, shallowness, and emptiness, withdrawal from solid studies; or superficial treatment.

A greater danger exists in this, than in the other arts, of mistaking a merely Dilettant dexterity for a true genius for art, and in this case, the subject is worse off than in any other Dilettantism, because its existence becomes an entire nullity; for the poet is nothing at all except through earnestness and conformity to art.

Dilettantism in general, but especially in poetry, weakens the feeling and perception for the good that lies beyond it, and whilst it is indulgent to a restless desire to produce, which leads it to nothing perfect, robs itself of all the culture it might derive through the perception of foreign excellencies.

Poetical Dilettantism may be of two sorts. Either it neglects the (indispensable) mechanical, and thinks enough done if it shows mind and feeling; or, it seeks poetry only in the mechanical, acquiring a technical dexterity therein, but without spirit or significance. Both are injurious, but the former rather injures the art, and the latter the subject.

All Dilettants are Plagiarists. They enervate and pull to pieces all that is original in manner or matter, and at the same time, imitate, copy, and piece out their own emptiness with it. Thus the language gets filled with phrases and formulas stolen from all sides, and which have no longer any meaning, and you may read whole books through, written in a fine style, and containing nothing. In a word, all that is really beautiful and good in true poetry, is profaned, rendered common, and degraded.

IN PRAGMATICAL POETRY.

All the disadvantages of Dilettantism in Lyrical poetry, apply here in a far higher degree. Not the art alone, but the subject also, suffers more.

Mixing up of different kinds.

IN MUSIC.

When the culture of the musical-dilettant is autodidactic, and composition as well as practice not acquired under the strict supervision of a master, there results a painful, uncertain, unsatisfactory effort; because the musical-dilettant, unlike those in the other arts, can produce no effects without a knowledge of artistic rules.

Dilettantism in music, more than any other dilettantism, makes its possessor less sympathizing and less capable of receiving enjoyment from the works of others, and also narrows down the subject, which it seizes in its one-sided and characteristic form.

IN THE DANCE.

Want of unity in the limbs, and affectation.

Stiffness and pedantry.

Caricature.

Vanity.

False training of the body.

Want of character, and emptiness.

Loose and negligent style.

Mannered style, through the exaggeration of beautiful movements.

Either stiff and painful, or rude and disproportioned.

(Both extremes prevented by the pleasing and significant.)

Inclines society to a sensual vagueness.

Unmeaning and one-sided direction given to bodily appearance.

Dancing should therefore have its Masters of the Art, because Dilettantism either leads to uncertainty and timidity, hindering freedom and limiting the powers, or else runs into vanity and thence to emptiness.

IN THE DRAMA.

Caricature of one's own faulty individuality.

Incapacitates the mind for all occupation, through the illusion of a fantastic mode of viewing objects.

Expense of interest and passion, without fruit.

Eternal circle of monotonous, ever repeated, ineffectual activity.

(There is nothing so attractive to Dilettants as comedy-rehearsals. Professed actors hate them.)

Partial forbearance towards theatrical Dilettants; feeding them with applause.

Eternal inclination towards a passionate condition and behavior, without balance.

Feeding all hateful passions with the worst results for civil and household existence.

Blunting the feeling for poetry.

Use of exalted language for commonplace sentiments.

A rag-fair of thoughts, commonplaces, and descriptions in the memory.

Pervading affectation and manner, reaching also into life.

Most injurious indulgence towards the indifferent and faulty, in a public and quite personal case.

The general tolerance for the home-made, becomes in this case more eminent.

Most pernicious use of amateur comedies for the education of children, where it all turns to nonsense. In the same manner, the most dangerous of all amusements for universities, &c.

Destruction of the ideality of art, because the Dilettant, not being able to raise himself through the appropriation of artistic ideas and traditions, must do all through a pathological reality.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

THE SOURCE OF SONG.

[From the German of AUGUST SPANG.]

How came it, while the arrow, stinging,
Burned in my heart, love's bliss I sang?
How was it, only joy came springing
Where sorrow nursed a deadly pang?

Lo! on the silver waters riding,
The proud swan sails in snowy white;
Long has he now been, tuneless, gliding
On his calm way, in mute delight.

By moonlight pale, in morning's flushing,
He glided downward—and was dumb;
With many a rose the banks were blushing,
He still sailed onward—and was dumb.

Now, when, in death, his heart-strings quiver,
Pierced by the shaft—what he so long,
In all his bliss, had uttered never,
In woe he sings: his earliest song!

C. T. B.

Death of Adolph Adam.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Tribune, in his letter of May 8, describes the funeral honors paid to one of the most popular composers of the present French operatic school.

I presently reached the Rue Lafitte. When I reached the upper end of the street, I found it and all the space in front of the church Notre Dame de Lorette occupied by a crowd more compact than the one I had just left on the sidewalk of the Boulevards. There might have been a thousand or fifteen hundred persons standing there, very quiet and serious. The office of preserving order was a sinecure for the policemen present, for there were sergens de ville here also. The church, as I learned, was already filled to its utmost capacity—with mourners, as I saw by the funeral hangings that shrouded its elegant portico. An honest blouse, who came up at the same time as myself, respectfully asked who was the deceased to whom such honors were shown. An impeding old woman, who stood in front of us on the curbstone, and had heard the question and my reply of ignorance, courteously turned to tell us that it was "the great composer, Adolph Adam" the author of the Postilion of Lonjumeau, of Si j'étais Roi, and numberless other pieces, operas and ballets.

On Friday evening last he was in apparently perfect health, and in his usual cheerful spirits. He was at the grand opera with his friends that night, and afterward accompanied some of them to the Theatre Lyrique, where one of his operas, Si j'étais Roi, a favorite with the public, was in rehearsal, for a new series of representations. On reaching home he wrote a letter and some notes of music, which he left on his piano. Not having appeared at his usual hour next morning, his wife went to his room at 8 o'clock to call him. She received no answer, approached his bed, and found a cold corpse. He died of a disease of the heart. As physicians say, the extinction of vitality must have been instantaneous—without warning, without pain—such a death as the illustrious composer had desired—without precedent decay, in the midst of his strength and honors. He had expressed a dread of outliving the productive power of his faculties, and the attendant public applause.

When the solemn services of the church were ended, a procession, composed of artists in all kinds, amateurs, men of letters, and a very numerous body of friends—numbering in all, as it is loosely rated, some three thousand persons—followed his remains to their resting-place.

Three thousand men of all professions, leaving their business on a Monday, spending three or four hours in the heat of the day to do honor to an artist! It was a fine effect to the money-making throng on the Boulevard des Italiens—and, I ventured to observe to myself, a more characteristically national demonstration. One man—a large manufacturer of pianos, a friend of Adam, gave a holiday to all the workmen of his establishment, paying them their wages, with the request that they would attend his funeral. The Théâtre Lyrique, where one of his operas, as I said above, was to be performed, was closed that night. The Bouffes Parisiens, another operatic theatre where some of his compositions had been performed, was also closed. At the Grand Opera, the performances for the night had been commanded some days in advance by the Emperor, as a treat for his guest, the King of Würtemberg, and went on as usual, but the proceeds, also by the Emperor's command, have been handed over to the widow of the deceased. So well does Louis Napoleon understand his French. That the Opera Comique was not closed on the same occasion, has been the theme of much indignant comment here.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

HAPPY LOVE.

[From the German of WOLFGANG MÜLLER.]

O musical Spring-time, thou age of delight!
And though thou art over, our joy takes not flight:
The love we felt yesterday, warms us to-day,
And will warm us to-morrow, and bless us for aye!

We youngsters once gathered the birches so gay,
And marched to the village, our hats full of May;
The maidens came out from each cottage to see,
And, Heart's-love! you stole such sweet glances at me!

The festival over, you gave me, O bliss!
Your hand for a pressure, your lips for a kiss!
Mine wast thou, O jewel! eternally mine!
And I was, O jewel! eternally thine.

Not in vain stood the rose, now, in blushes arrayed;
I brought thee the nosegay, enrapturing maid;
We shared, at the harvest, in dance and in song,
We shared in the vintage, when that came along.

But now the cold winter all nature has sealed,
No longer we revel o'er mountain and field;
We sit by the fireside, one heart's bliss we share,
In the heart it is summer, when true love blooms there!

O musical Spring-time, thou age of delight!
And when thou returnest, our hands we unite:
The love we felt yesterday, warms us to-day,
And will warm us to-morrow, and bless us for aye!

C. T. B.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The New Piano-Forte.

NEW YORK, May 17, 1856.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of May 10th you copy an article from the New York Evening Mirror, upon my new piano. In the course of your remarks upon the article, I find the following passage: "The principle involved is certainly a good one. Whether the practical difficulties of reconciling so much lightness and vibratory freedom with the strength required by the enormous strain of all the wires of a piano have been really and fairly overcome, is what time alone can show."

I shall feel greatly obliged if you will permit me to answer the doubt expressed in the paragraph quoted. Any departure from old established principles is naturally received with cautious wariness. This caution is the true conservatism, and should always be exercised in matters where principles are involved until the proposed innovations are clearly demonstrated to be improvements. I claim to have reconciled the difficulties of combining the utmost lightness of case and bottom with a strength sufficient to sustain double the strain ordinarily found in a large scale piano, and to have dispensed with all the heavy blocking, which is at once the strength and the useless incumbrance of the ordinary pianos, giving in place of this an immense addition of vibratory surface and inner scope for sound, and an iron frame composed of upper and lower oblong squares, with strengthening transverse bars and ascending arms, which are firmly bolted to the upper frame, after passing through the wrest plank or pin block, (the only block of wood inside the thin case,) which they sustain secure and immovable. This perfect iron frame, with its wrest plank within itself, bears all the strain and tension of the strings, asks no assistance from the wood-work frame, and is, in short, competent and self-sustaining. If the principle is recognized as correct, my aim is attained, for in the piano-forte now on exhibition at my room, the principle is fully carried out; the increase in the purity and the power of tone is fully realized, and it has remained up to its original pitch (high Philharmonic pitch) during three months of the most severe and constant tests, being played upon every day from morning until night.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
S. B. DRIGGS.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 31, 1856.

Robert Franz.

SKETCH OF HIS LIFE, BY LISZT.

A few months since (see Vol. viii. p. 185) we translated for our readers a portion (all that we had at that time received) of Liszt's very interesting and appreciative article upon the genius and productions of the most remarkable song composer, at the same time that he is one of the truest musicians, who now live in Germany. We are now in possession of the second and concluding part. It is chiefly biographical, and being about a man of whom so little has been known here personally—nothing in fact except those exquisite vibrations of his soul in song—it will doubtless interest our readers even more than the subtle metaphysical analysis of those vibrations, which we have before presented. In the absence therefore of other practicable or pressing editorial topics this week, we feel that we cannot do better than to continue the translation as far as our space permits.

"FRANZ was born on the 28th of June, 1815, at Halle, on the Saal. The state of things in the paternal house afforded him but little poetic stimulus; on the contrary, all that did not belong to the practical utilities of life in the sense of the last century, was regarded as unprofitable and injurious. His youth passed uneventfully, and he was indebted only to mere chance opportunities for the awakening of his musical capacities. Being already fourteen years of age, he was obliged, and that without any support upon the part of his relations, to acquire the elements of music, as well as he could, in his own way, and upon his own responsibility. Later, when his inclination to music became more and more decided, it was no longer possible indeed to withhold from him a teacher; but naturally, as a consequence of the views then prevailing, the cheapest musical pedagogue was engaged for the first beginning, and, as might have been foreseen, the gifted pupil soon outstripped the teacher.

"A change had soon to be made in instruction and in method. And this necessity repeated itself so often, that in the space of four years the young Franz had studied with all the music teachers in Halle, and learned all he could from each of them, without being able to call his own any great capital of knowledge and ability. How indeed could he derive any solid profit, any lasting guidance, from this continued intercourse with various yet equivalent mediocrities? This his sound youthful insight saw so truly, that he considered himself, in spite of his numerous lessons, as left entirely to himself; in his first attempts he followed only the humor of his own suggestions, and so, out of the disadvantages of his position, he derived the incalculable advantage of accustoming himself to let the individual impulse alone decide in the choice of his matter and the form of his thought, instead of accommodating his mind, like so many talents, to mere imitation, and then resembling a manumitted slave, who needs years of apprenticeship to learn, not only how to enjoy, but how to actually possess and use the freedom that has been given him. How many all their lives remain such freedmen, and never attain to the natural noble movement of the freeborn and educated! His firm, clear understanding guarded Franz from arrogance and error, in this independence left him by the incapacity of his teachers. He indulged in neither complaint nor ridicule about so manifest a want of outward aid. Indeed, he found himself in this freedom, as in his natural element, and used it discreetly to give self-possession to his powers, accustoming himself to fix his eyes upon a goal, and slowly, steadily, consistently to seize the means for reaching it.

"Such a state of things in the earliest years of his artistic strivings, more than all later influences perhaps, determined the autodidactic character of his talent. The chosen ones of the Muse, the predestined artists know, like the bees, how to suck sweet aromatic nourishment out of the flower cups which contain deadly poison for others. But dry study did not satisfy him; the rigid thought answered but imperfectly to his yearning, as a dumb beauty would have left his heart unfilled. Written music was to him but a body without soul; he need hearing, that he might see his ideal realized. However much the so-called earnest musicians may affect to despise virtuosity, yet it is none the less true that every really called musician cherishes the want of this same virtuosity; feels the impulse in himself to hear, to bathe, as it were, in waves of tones, to cradle himself upon their illimitable element, to sail through their pure ether, to let their fragrant breath smooth his unfolded wings, to envelop himself in the cloud shapes of their fairy land, to listen to their tragical or touching dialogues, to transport himself into their world of expressive atoms, glowing and sparkling like the magic formulas of a celestial speech. Franz wanted to hear music made, and to make music himself; he gave himself passionately up to organ playing, and on Sundays ran from one church to another, to relieve the respective organists on single choral verses.

"In those days he was attending the Halle Orphan House Gymnasium, and his studies there formed his principal occupation, the so-called serious side of his life, upon which his parents laid the greatest stress, while they always considered his attachment to music as only a harmless monomania, from which they would gladly have seen him delivered, since such idiosyncracies always hinder a young man from the attainment of that well-varnished, well-mannered, comfortable Philisterei, that coveted goal of all good fathers of a family, in whose train they can with tolerable certainty anticipate a fixed position, a respectable marriage, a decent exterior, a decent living, and finally a decent burial for their son and heir. The professors of the gymnasium treated the Art-dallings of their pupil with still greater severity than he had experienced under the paternal roof; his secret musical amateurship became the butt of many witticisms and there were plenty who would call him "Fool." The Cantor of the institution had appointed an hour for music lessons for the more gifted pupils; Franz felt himself drawn toward him; he was so cramped and narrowed by the boggy water of mental inactivity, that whoever let him pass without snubbing his artistic passion became welcome to him; in a short time his musical protector invited him to be his accompanist. The compositions of Handel, Haydn, Mozart kindled a new flame in him, and cast the first gleams into the dim confusion of his ideas, which no one helped him to clear up, and in which he had in vain sought light himself. This is one of those favors which fate vouchsafes to those under its protection, renewing for them in the most urgent moment, through men or events, the drying marrow of their faculties.

"Trembling with enthusiasm, possessed by the sounds which had entranced him, Franz now ventured, without having mastered even the rudiments of harmony, counterpoint, or any sort of thorough theoretic knowledge, nay, without even a clear recognition of their necessity, upon his first attempts at composition. Now, as before, he remained left to himself, and, without explanation or advice from others, worked along at random. The impulse to produce so far predominated in him that at this time the order of importance in his different labors was reversed. Until now, in spite of his more and more overweening bias toward music, in spite of the tendency of his mind to bury itself in musical problems, and devote to them in truant secrecy his leisure hours, and even a portion of the time allotted to more serious studies, still these latter had appeared to him the central purpose of his being; he loved his parents too well to allow an opinion directly opposed to their own to take root in him, and not to accept patiently the conviction which had been instilled into him from childhood, that it was his duty to acquit himself obediently of his Gymnasium studies. But now the spirit of resistance began to get possession of him; he felt, with all his tractableness, that these studies could not be useful to his genuine development, and he lost more and more the power of giving himself up to them with interest and success. Soon there ensued hard conflicts in his soul between his natural modesty and yieldingness, between his habitual obedience to his parents and the thought that he was squandering his time, was losing his best years at the Gymnasium. For this evil he knew no better remedy than to abandon the course thus far pursued, and under the eyes of a master of music, begin a new period of study, in which his choice naturally fell upon a composer, who at that time enjoyed a great celebrity, and who lived not far from Halle: FREDERIC SCHNEIDER. What artist, who has become so in spite of the narrow views of a tender and prejudiced family, cannot at a glance behold all the phases of the conflict which Franz had to fight through, before his wish was gratified without an open rupture with his friends? He finally left the Gymnasium, in which he had already worked his way forward into the higher classes, and betook himself to Dessau, with the purpose here by persevering study to regulate, clear up and bring into order his indefinite and fragmentary musical ideas; although even now neither he nor especially his family dreamed of the possibility that he could choose music for his calling, for the great end of his life. In such an idea they thought there was nothing to be feared, for they did not once suppose it practicable. He was not very clear in his own mind as to how far his resolution would carry him. His first thought was, to quit the hated school, to give himself up to music undisturbed; in this perhaps a tendency to opposition, which had germinated in him, was not without effect.

"In Dessau we find repeated, although with a change of form, nearly the same phenomena which characterized his earlier relations to Art. The rules and theories, which were taught him and unfolded to him, still repelled him; he did not thrive with them, and he began, after the regular lessons, other labors, which, like his first artistic efforts, had a resemblance to the spider in the weaving of its web, in that he drew the material out of himself. It were superfluous to say that Schneider found but little pleasure in this singular method, and found fault with the dangerous example of such independent strivings. It was not long ere Franz came into the position of a persona ingrata. For compensation he won other sympathies.

"If there are masters, whom unfettered, youthful partisans rejoice to follow with almost blind devotion, and, inflamed with a noble courage, seal their doctrines with their own names, with their heart's blood, marching with reckless enthusiasm beneath their banner, such masters stand upon the most dangerous outposts of Art, and fight with a courage which is called desperation by their adversaries, but which in successful cases justifies the saying of Virgil: Audentes fortuna juvat. About such masters, who rather found schools than keep up schools, there is always an overflow of the fresh pulses of young life; the surrounding air, laden with electricity, favors the outblossoming of all faculties and starts blossoms of spiritual delight, which awaken and strengthen a consciousness of his own worth in every participant, and therefore remains so dear and not to be forgotten. For Schneider such a feeling would have been rather strange and distant. He did not feel the need of living in an atmosphere in which the mind follows independently its own direction, and thus his school lacked one of the most indispensable requisites of Art. In a heavy, stagnant, close mental atmosphere, free development is impossible to the pupil. Then there form themselves, under the very eye of the master, but without his knowledge, groups of dissenters, who bind themselves together without any clear idea of the revolutionary character of their strivings, without more than a mere suspicion that out of their union will arise convictions and tendencies, essentially diverging from those of the master. So it was with the pupils under Schneider. It could not fail to happen that Franz finally attached himself to such a group, and he himself confesses, that the atmosphere he breathed among those young people (making a great deal of music behind the back of their teacher, who would have been more annoyed by the kind of their music, than by the secrecy of its production) was the only favoring element to his true progress. His studies in harmony and counterpoint were for him only a heaping together of materials, which he was one day to use in the production of quite different pictures than those set him for a pattern. During his two years' residence in Dessau, (1835-7,) he composed really a great deal, and in his attempts of that period it is interesting to trace the painful squirming of a young imagination under the school fetters and the necessity to shake them off."

The remainder next week.

Adolph Charles Adam.

In the news by the last steamer, we read the sudden death of this distinguished French composer. A very light composer, to be sure, if we compare him with the great names;—a writer of French operas of a sparkling, pretty, popular kind, who stood next in rank, perhaps, among the French composers of the day, to AUBER, although far below him in inventive fancy. An extract from the correspondence of the Tribune, which we copy in another column, shows the esteem in which the Parisians held him. We glean from Fétis a few items of his life and works.

He was born at Paris in 1803, and entered the Conservatoire in 1817. After studying harmony and counterpoint with Reicha, he profited by the advice and the example of Boieldieu, the author of La Dame Blanche, who doubtless had much influence on the formation of his style. His first attempts at composition were fantasias and variations for the piano, of which he wrote a great abundance, as well as airs and concerted pieces for vaudevilles and operettes in the smaller theatres. His first opera, Pierre et Catharine, (what recent opera writer has not taken Peter the Great for a subject?) was produced at the Opera Comique in 1829, and well received. Daniowka, produced at the same theatre in 1830, showed still more power; and from this time his operas succeeded each other with great rapidity. Most of them were ephemeral, for he wrote with altogether too much facility to create what should last. But in 1833 appeared his Proscrit, a work, says Fétis, of more force, dramatic feeling, and novelty of ideas than any of his earlier efforts. In 1832 he was in London, where he wrote the music for a grand ballet at the Covent Garden Theatre. Of his more recent productions for the Opera Comique, we may mention among the most popular, "Richard Cœur de Lion," "The Postillion of Lonjumeau," and "The Brewer of Preston," the two last of which have frequently been sung in English in this country. He has also composed sacred music, a "Mass of St. Cecilia," &c. He composed the Cantata for the Opera Comique in honor of the inauguration of Louis Napoleon. His character seems well described in the following paragraphs from the London Musical World:

M. Adolphe Adam was above all, and before all, a Frenchman; or rather he belonged to that small minority of Frenchmen which wiles away existence agreeably at Paris. He was educated and brought up as a Frenchman; he thought as a Frenchman. He labored for fame and money (or rather for money and fame) as a Frenchman; he worked assiduously, and obtained both. Moreover, inasmuch as the laborer is worthy of his hire, M. Adam merited both. His peculiar talent was essentially marketable; and his extreme facility and readiness for any kind of task enabled him continually to frequent the market with his wares. M. Adam was especially serviceable to theatres. If an opera, or a ballet, was required within a given period, however short, M. Adam could always be depended on. A thorough man of business, he was never once known to be behind hand. Had he been a trifle more conscientious as an artist, he would have been less highly as a manufacturer. What the alternative might have been it is easy to guess—less money, perhaps, and more reputation; less travel, and better health; a slower rise, and possibly a longer life.

M. Adam literally hacked himself to death—not through the imperious mandate of genius, which forbids its possessor an instant's repose, while it consumes him in its fire—but from a very opposite motive, upon which it would be indecorous to dwell just now. Mozart, and Raffaele, and Mendelssohn were killed by too much labor. So was the author of Le Châlet.

The avocations of M. Adam were many and painful. He could not accomplish all he had to do, and accomplish it well. He composed operas and ballets, without number; he wrote feuilletons in the papers; he provided even the Church with music, such as it was; he was a professor in the Conservatoire, a member of the Institute, and at one time manager of a theatre. At the period when he directed the Théâtre Lyrique, where he sacrificed a large portion of his hard-earned savings, M. Adam's existence must have been one incessant turmoil. He had to conduct a theatre, and (still more difficult) to manage singers; he had to compose operas himself and to pass judgment (as an impresario) on the operas of others, which for a musician by profession was an invidious task; he had to calculate accounts, to balance profit with loss—and, in the midst of all, to give lessons in the Conservatoire, and to write criticisms upon the musical performances in Paris, including those at his own theatre. How he could find time for so many things is a puzzle. He did find it, nevertheless; and, what is more, time to enjoy the society of his friends and acquaintances, of which commodities few could boast a larger and more varied assortment.

We believe ourselves not far wide of the mark in stating that M. Adam was as amiable as he was clever; and that no one who knew him well could fail to entertain a strong regard for him. In spite of the petty jealousies and miserable intrigues that disgrace artistic (and especially musical) life in Paris, an ill word for Adolphe Adam was seldom if ever uttered. He was liked by acquaintances, and loved by friends. It is not a little to say in his favor that no man who has survived him will more deeply feel his loss than Rossini. To the affection (it was nothing less) which Rossini entertained for Adam we can testify. We have seen proofs of it. What that consummate master and admirable genius never, on any occasion, condescended to do for himself, he absolutely volunteered on behalf of his friend, now departed. Not long ago we heard Rossini address these words, at parting, to the musical critic of a German newspaper:—"Adieu, mon cher ami—merci pour votre opinion de moi—mais, je vous en prie, soyez bon pour Adam; il le mérite; il a vraiment du talent." This, from Rossini, was worth a dozen feuilletons.

Poor Adam, towards whom we have to accuse ourselves of more than one unkindness (he was too kind to every one), is now gone to his last home! Let us endeavor only to remember those qualities which made him so generally beloved. They were, indeed, many and excellent. Few visitors to Paris, who move habitually in musical circles, will fail to miss him from the various places of public entertainment, on their next resort to the capital of all the pleasures. No face was more familiar than Adam's, and few were more genial and pleasant. He was for ever eager and "affaire" up to the eyes in business, but with a smile of good humor and words of welcome, in the midst of his multitudinous occupations, for all who approached him—words that would issue from a mouth of which the most uncompromising exuberance of beard failed to conceal the benevolent expression.

Let us hope, with regard to Adolphe Adam's music, that some, at least, of his numberless contributions to the theatre may outlive him. We are mistaken if more than one gentle spirit will not plead for Giselle, more than one merry soul for the Postillon, and more than one lover of simple and unaffected melody for the Châlet.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MAY 28th. In music there has not been much of interest here during the last week. At the Academy, under the direction of MARETZKE, Mme. DE LAGRANGE has been drawing good houses, but the only time I have heard her was on Saturday in Flotow's Martha. This had, to me at least, the charm of novelty, it being the first time that I had heard a German opera in German, and I was not a little surprised to find how smoothly and melodiously it sounded. Whether the singers sang a dialect less sibilant and guttural than that which we hear in conversation, or not, I cannot say, but it seemed to flow almost as soft from the lips of Mad. LAGRANGE and Mme. D'ORMY as the choicest Italian, and I could not tell for some time what tongue it was. As to the prima donna, of course there is nothing new to be said. She never disappoints or falls short of her mark in any respect. Has an apology ever been made for her in this country? I think not. The music of the opera is exceedingly pretty; much of it very light and bordering sometimes on dance music, smacking often even of a polka. In the heat of yesterday, however, it harmonized well with the cool elegance of the Academy of Music, and seemed exactly fitted for relaxation after the consuming heat of the day.

Of the house, which I saw for the first time, I must say, that for sound, it is incomparably better than our Boston Theatre, as well as in its general effect on the eye, save that the stage is perhaps too far removed from the auditorium instead of being carried forward into it, as in our theatre; and much as I like the comfortable red of our Boston walls, the brilliant gayety of the Academy is very effective and pleasing. The lobbies, staircases, seats, and all the details of our theatre, are much superior in comfort and in elegance. Madame de Lagrange was but indifferently supported and the audience was exceedingly small.

I am glad to hear that BERGMANN intends to organize a German troupe for the next season, that shall be thoroughly competent to producing the higher class of German operas (such as the Zauberflöte) in the same manner that we have heard the great Italian operas. With a conductor like Bergmann, there can be no doubt as to the success of such an undertaking. In Boston it would certainly succeed.

One or two concerts have been given here, in which the principal singers of the opera troupe have taken part, but none of any especial interest. The FINE Opera Troupe are also concertizing here, with what success I do not know. At St. Stephen's Church I heard on Sunday a sacred concert of Italian Church Music, (embracing selections from I Lombardi), in which BRIGNOLI and AMODIO took part, and never have I heard their voices to greater advantage. They volunteered their services for this occasion, the object of which was to raise money for a fine organ. The Rev. Dr. CUMMINGS, the pastor of the church, and his sister, a fine soprano, also, in the absence of performers who were expected, took parts in the programme with great success.

PAUL DE LA ROCHE's picture of Maria Antoinette, exhibited at Goupil's, attracts much attention here, and is in many respects a remarkable picture. She is represented as in the act of leaving the hall of the National Assembly, stepping out from the darkness into the full light of day, which is all concentrated upon her face, and makes it almost the only figure of the picture. A sadder, more beautiful, and more noble, queenly face can hardly be imagined; and the figure, without an ornament, in the plainest black dress, is every inch a queen. She could not have been more majestic in all the splendor of Versailles. The subordinate figures are interesting and expressive, but after all, the face of the queen leaves the image that is stamped upon your memory. It is about to be engraved, and I hope we shall see it in Boston. w.

Music Abroad.

London.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—(From The Times, May 14.)—The third concert, on Monday night, began with one of Haydn's finest symphonies,—No. 10 of the set of twelve composed for Salomon. It was admirably executed, under the direction of Professor Sterndale Bennett, and listened to with evident interest. Just now, when theory after theory, one more fantastic than another, simply helps to establish two facts,—viz., that it is easier to systematize than to compose, and that the present is rather an age of speculation and criticism than of production, no more wholesome lesson can be derived than is suggested by such unaffectedly good music as Haydn wrote, when striving to realize his own standard of excellence. We are by no means anxious for the preservation of all the countless works of this old master; but nothing that Haydn gave to the world con amore deserves to be forgotten. This symphony in E flat is curious to contemplate for more reasons than one. In the first place, it shows the influence exercised upon Haydn by one who was born after him and died before him. In the next, it proves that in this particular instance Beethoven owed as much to Haydn as Haydn to Mozart. No one can hear the minuet in Haydn's symphony without thinking of Beethoven's No. 4; no one can hear the finale without thinking of Beethoven's No. 1. While Haydn's obligations to the later works of Mozart, however, are universally acknowledged, the obligations of other composers to Haydn are too often overlooked.

The other symphony—the C minor of Beethoven—was played with remarkable spirit; but there was scarcely a piano from beginning to end.

In the C minor symphony and in the overture to Der Freischütz (which terminated the concert) many improvements were observed, for which Professor Bennett is to be thanked. A number of forced and exaggerated "points" were corrected, and the expression intended by the composers adhered to with a punctilio that merited and obtained the acknowledgment of connoisseurs.

The other overture was one by Mr. Cipriani Potter, entitled Antony and Cleopatra (written nearly 20 years since)—a work of extreme cleverness, although perhaps not exactly conceived in the spirit of Shakespeare's play. This was well played and much applauded. The "Dramatic Concerto" of Spohr—one of that master's most splendid compositions for the violin with orchestral accompaniments—was performed with wonderful mechanical dexterity by Mr. H. C. Cooper, who, as one of our ablest native professors, was received with enthusiasm and warmly encouraged throughout his performance. The vocal music was excellent. Madame Jenny Ney sang Beethoven's splendid scena, "Ah, perfido," with great dramatic feeling; and Herr Reichardt highly distinguished himself in the second air of Danilowitz, which Meyerbeer added to the Etoile du Nord when it was first produced at Dresden. An instrumental novelty of merit and originality was introduced—in the form of a concertante on Hungarian airs for two flutes and violin (accompanied by the orchestra)—with which the audience were much pleased. The composition (by Herr Doppler) is characteristic and piquant. The execution—by the brothers Doppler (flutes) and Herr Huber (violin)—was perfect. The combination of instruments is sufficiently strange; but such faultless playing left nothing to desire, and the audience were charmed alike with the music and the performance.

BENNETT'S SOIRÉES.—The second of these delightful entertainments came off on Tuesday evening before a very brilliant audience in the Hanover-square Rooms. The following was the programme:

PART I.
Chamber Trio, Op. 26, piano-forte, violin and violoncello W. S. Bennett.
Sonata, piano-forte, in C minor, Op. 35 Dussek.
Aria: "O salutaris hostia" Cherubini.
Andante e Variazioni, Op. 35, in B flat, two piano-fortes R. Schumann.

PART II.
Sonata in B flat, Op. 45, piano-forte and violoncello Mendelssohn.
Song: "Sing, maiden, sing," Op. 35, W. S. Bennett.
Selections from Piano-forte Pieces, à quatre mains, Op. 85 R. Schumann.

The chamber trio (why "chamber trio"? in A. of Mr. Sterndale Bennett, one of his most melodious and ingenious works, has been often described and often praised. The piano-forte part was of course admirably executed by the composer, who, on the present occasion, was ably assisted by Herren Leopold and Moritz Gans on the violin and violoncello. These gentlemen are from Berlin, and it was their first appearance in England.

Mr. Bennett was in fine play all the evening, and every connoisseur must thank him for introducing (for the first time at his concerts) that seldom-heard sonata of Dussek (one of the three dedicated to Clementi). Though not equal in merit to "Les Adieux à Clementi" (a sonata in E flat, op. 44—best known in this country—as "The Farewell"), the one in C minor is highly characteristic of its author; and even its buffo finale, in the major key—which, in less ingenious hands, might border on vulgarity (owing to its theme)—must always please when given in Mr. Bennett's vigorous and unaffected style. The B flat "sonata-duo" of Mendelssohn was another masterly performance on the part of Mr. Bennett, who worked manfully to keep his partner—M. Moritz Ganz, the violoncellist (a good, but not over-spirited player)—up to the mark.

The duets with Madame Clara Schumann were trebly interesting. It was interesting to hear two such pianists together as herself and Mr. Bennett; it was interesting to hear the rarely performed pianoforte music of Robert Schumann; and it was interesting to observe the exquisite solicitude with which the unfortunate composer's gifted and amiable wife dwelt upon every phrase of his melody, every modulation, every turn of harmony. No playing could be more spirituel and poetical. The variations (for two pianos) are very original; but still more were we pleased with the smaller pieces, of which there were four:—Beim Kränzweiden; Kroatenmarsch; Trauer, and Springbrunnen. Mr. Bennett entered sympathetically into the feeling of Madame Schumann (who was warmly received); and a great treat was the result.—Musical World.

MUSICAL UNION.—The return of Herr Ernst is always looked forward to with pleasure by connoisseurs of quartet-playing; and no wonder, since among the violinists of the present day he stands unrivalled as a master of expression. In Haydn and Mozart—in Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Spohr—he is equally at home; and it is as great a treat to hear him play one of the early works of the first-named composers as any of the most imaginative and elaborate productions of the last. Nothing could be more exquisite than his reading yesterday of the slow movement in Mozart's first quartet—from the six dedicated to Haydn. It was throughout genial, unaffected, and faultless. No stronger contrast to such music could be found than in the variations and scherzo of Mendelssohn (Op. 81), from the posthumous works, where the unbridled fancy of the modern school is united to a contrapuntal ingenuity equal to Mozart's. Herr Ernst entered thoroughly into the spirit of Mendelssohn; and we have never heard these interesting fragments executed with greater spirit and finesse—with more playfulness and at the same time more fire.

Madame Clara Schumann was the pianist. Her grand morceau was the second trio of Mendelssohn (in C minor), which she played very finely, with Herr Ernst as violin and Signor Piatti as violoncello. We have seldom listened to a more satisfactory performance. This, however, from three such artists was not at all surprising. Madame Schumann selected, as her solo piece, the Thirty-two variations of Beethoven on a theme in C minor, to which Mendelssohn used to be so partial. Like Mendelssohn, Madame Schumann played them without book. It is hoped that when this lady next appears at the Musical Union she will be invited to perform in one of the chamber compositions of Robert Schumann (her husband). No one understands them so well, or executes them so entirely con amore.

The other performers in the morceaux d'ensemble were Messrs. Cooper (second violin) and Hill (viola). It was Signor Piatti's first appearance this season, as well as Herr Ernst's; and the director may be congratulated on the reacquisition of this greatest of violoncellists, after a long absence in the provinces with Madame Jenny Goldschmidt Lind. The rooms were crowded to suffocation.

Advertisements.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S COLLECTIONS OF GLEES, MADRIGALS, PART-SONGS, &c.

Novello's Glee-Hive.

A Collection of Popular GLEES and MADRIGALS, in Vocal Score, with ad. lib. Accompaniment for Piano-forte. Complete in 8 vols. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt lettering. Price $2 each volume.

These volumes contain eighty-three of the best Glee and Madrigals by standard ancient and modern English composers. Among them will be found some of the finest Glee of Attwood, Calcott, the Earl of Mornington, Spofford, Stevens, Webb, &c. Each Glee and Madrigal is printed separately, at prices varying from 4 to 12 cents each.

Novello's Part-Song Book.

In One Volume, handsomely bound in cloth, with illuminated lettering.

This work consists of new Glee and Part-Songs, by the best modern composers—among others, Bishop, Benedict, Macfarren, Rimbaud, Wesley, &c.—with reprints of some of the best Madrigals by ancient composers, and Part-Songs by eminent German composers, set to English poetry. Each Glee and Part-Song printed separately, at from 4 cents to 18 cents each. Vocal parts to the whole work, 25 cents each part; Vocal parts to separate Glee, &c., 8 cents per set.

Orpheus:

A Collection of Glee and Vocal Quartettes, by the most admired German Composers, with English Poetry.

This collection is principally for male voices. Twenty nine books, each containing about six Glee, in separate Vocal parts, with separate Piano-forte accompaniment, have been published, and the issue is continued—the new books being received by J. A. Novello immediately on their publication in London.—Price 88 cents each book.

The Musical Times, AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR,

PUBLISHED (IN LONDON) ON THE FIRST OF EVERY MONTH.

Containing ANTHEMS, CHORALS, and HYMNS, or GLEES, MADRIGALS, and ELEGIES, for One, Two, Three, Four, or more Voices. Price 3 cents each.

A Monthly Journal, containing original articles by EDWARD HOLMES, Author of the "Life of Mozart," &c.; Short notices of Singing-Classes, Concerts, &c.; Advertisements of new and important Musical Works; and, in addition, three or four pages of Music. The alternate numbers contain Music with secular or sacred words. Price 3 cents each, or post-free, 4 cents. Nos. 1 to 48, (Vols. I. and II.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 49 to 96, (Vols. III. and IV.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 97 to 144, (Vols. V. and VI.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75. Either Vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, may be had separately, in paper covers, 75 cents each. Annual subscription to the Musical Times, 50 cents, post-paid.

J. A. NOVELLO,

No. 389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

THE GOLDEN WREATH.

A Choice Collection of Favorite Melodies, designed for the use of Schools, Seminaries, Select Classes, &c. Also, a Complete Course of Elementary Instruction, upon the Pestalozzian System, with numerous Exercises for Practice. By L. O. EMMERSON. 24 pages. 16mo. Bound in boards, leather back. Price, 25 cts.

This is a new book, and judging from present appearance, will be the most popular work of its class published. There is an exceeding aptness about the instructions, and an attractiveness in the melodies that will at once commend it to all for whom it is designed.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

ED. B. ROBINSON,
PIANO-FORTE TUNER.
Orders received at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington Street.

NEWS' PATENT AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street, BOSTON, MASS.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER,
Will be happy to give instruction in Piano-forte and Organ playing, and the Theory of Music. Address:—No. 8 Hayward Place. May 26. tf

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE
—GIVES—
INSTRUCTION on the PIANO-FORTE,
And may be addressed at her residence, 55 Hancock St.

CARL HAUSE
OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

G. ANDRÉ & CO'S
Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature,
Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.
Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 SCHOOL ST. BOSTON.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line 10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line 5 cts.
For one column, (125 lines) first insertion $12.00
Do do each subsequent $6.00
Special notices (loaded), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 218.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 7, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 10.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2,50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I. "
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O. "

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by
JOHN S. DWIGHT, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court
of the District of Massachusetts.]

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Translated from the French of Madame Dubeant, for the Journal of Music.

CHAPTER XI.

THE SUPPER.

When this act was over we all returned to the hall, which was arranged as I said, for repose or study, as they chose; all pressed around Boccaferri, to hear his opinion and profit by his observations. I saw then how he brought out his pupils; for his conversation was a real lecture, and the only serious and deep one which I had ever heard upon the subject.

During the representation, he took great care not to interrupt the actors, nor even show his delight or disapproval, whatever they did; he was afraid of disturbing them and drawing them away from their aim. In the entr'acte he became the judge and called himself the enlightened public, and awarded his criticisms and his praises.

"All honor to Cecilia!" began he. "In this act she was above us all; she carried her sword and spoke love like a Romeo; she made me love that youth, whose rôle is so delicate. Did you notice one mark of genius, my children? Listen then. Celio! Adorno! Salvator! this is for the men; the little girls will not understand it. In the libretto, which you all know by heart, there is one word which I could never hear without laughing. It is when Doña Anna relates to her lover that she had barely escaped being a victim to the boldness of Don Juan, as this rascal had imitated the gait and manners of Ottavio on the night of the Commander's murder, that he might surprise her tenderness. She tells him that she fled from his arms and succeeded in repelling him. Then Don Ottavio, who has piteously listened to this story, sings simply: Respiro! The word is very musically written for the dialogue, as Mozart knew how to write the simplest word; but the word is too commonplace. Rubini, like an intelligent maestro, sings it as it should be sung, without marked expression, and so saves it from ridicule; but almost all other Ottavios I have heard have never failed to breathe the word with expanded chest, raising their eyes to heaven, as if to say to the public: 'Faith, how well I got through it!'

"But Cecilia listened to Anna's recital with chaste sadness and calm indignation, which the most impudent pit could not have laughed at. I saw my young Ottavio grow pale, for the face of an actor, when really moved, does grow pale beneath the paint, without being obliged to turn round adroitly and pass a handkerchief over the cheeks—bad trick, the vulgar resource of vulgar art; and, then, when his fears were quieted, instead of saying: I breathe! he cried out from the bottom of his heart: 'Oh, whether lost or saved, thou wouldst have been mine forever!'

"Yes, yes!" cried Stella, who did not pretend to play the ignorant little girl, and strove above all to be an artist; "I was so touched by those words that I felt remorse at having been moved for one moment in the arms of that base man. I loved Ottavio, and you will see in the fourth act how much strength and pride those generous words gave back to me."

"Brava, bravissima!" said Boccaferri, "that is really understanding; an entr'acte should never be lost upon a true artist. While he rests his muscles and his voice, his intelligence ought still to labor, when he recalls his recent emotions and prepares himself for fresh struggles against the dangers and evils of his destiny. I shall never grow weary of telling you that the theatre should be a type of real life; even as in real life a man retires into solitude or unbosoms himself to a friend, that he may understand the events which gather around him, and be enabled through good resolutions or good counsel to see through circumstances and govern them, just so should the actor think upon the action of the drama and the character he represents. Every day and between each scene he should strive to find all the different developements of which his rôle admits. Here, as we are not confined to the text, the spirit of improvisation opens to us an infinite field of delicious creation. But even when in public we are slaves to the text, a gesture, a movement of your features alone, can serve to express your idea. It will be more difficult, my children, because it must be right at first, and a great thought must be compressed in a slight effect; but this will be more delicate to seek, and consequently more glorious to find; this will be the last word of science, the precious stone par excellence, which we seek here in a mine abounding with varied materials, from which we draw with full hands, like happy and greedy children as we are, waiting until we are skilled and experienced enough to choose only the finest diamond of the rock.

"You, Celio," continued Boccaferri, to whom all listened as to an oracle, and whom even the proud Celio would not contradict, "you were too gay and not sufficiently hypocritical. You forget that the naïve and credulous Zerlina was woman enough to demand more flattery and resist so much boldness. You did not forget that Beatrice was your sister, and you treated her too much like a little child whom you were accustomed to caress without displeasing or troubling her. Be more faithless, more wicked, more hard-hearted, and do not forget that in the next act you are to play the Tartuffe. By the way, we wanted a father, and here is one; Monsieur Salentini has fallen from the skies, and he must improvise the scene with the father. It is from Moliere, and is fine indeed. Quick, my children! a Spanish grandee's costume for Monsieur Salentini. The coat Louis XIII., bordering a little upon Henri IV., old style; wide ruffles, violet breeches, a long doublet, and very few ribbons or none at all. Run, Stella, forget nothing; you know I never accept the young girl's excuse: 'But I did not think of it.' Do you both read over Moliere's scene to me," said he, addressing himself to Celio and me. "Monsieur Salentini, you only need seize the spirit and become imbued with it. Do not adhere to the words. On the contrary, forget them entirely; the least phrase learned by heart is fatal to improvisation. But good heavens! I forgot that you did not come here to learn comedy. So you will do it as a favor, and you will do it well, for you have talent in another phase of art, and the feeling of the true and beautiful serves to comprehend all the phases of art. For Art is one, is it not?"

"I will do my best not to disconcert the others," answered I, "and I assure you all this amuses, interests and impassions me immensely."

"Thanks, artist!" cried Boccaferri, giving me his hand. "Oh, to be an artist is all that is worth living for!"

"We must see to the decoration," said he to his daughter. "I only need you to help me arrange the interior of Don Juan's palace. See that the armor for the statue be ready for Monsieur Salentini to put on quickly during the scene with Monsieur Dimanche; and you, Masetto, go and black yourself for that ancient character. Celio, if you are so unlucky as to talk in the side scenes during this act, I shall play as badly as in the last scene. You made me angry; I was weak and cowardly no longer; and if I play badly, so will you. It is a great mistake to believe that an actor is so much the more brilliant when his comrade is tame; the theory of individuality, which reigns more on the stage than anywhere else, and practices those ignoble professional jealousies to souffler la claque at a comrade, is more pernicious to talent upon the stage than in all the other varied scenes of life. The stage is the place, above all others, where all must harmonize. The cold actor chills his neighbor, and the contagion is communicated to the others with fatal promptness. On earth people strive to persuade themselves that evil only makes good shine brighter. It is a mistake; the good would become perfect, the beautiful would become sublime, emotion would become passion, if instead of being alone, the fine actor should be seconded and warmed by his surroundings. Upon this subject I have still another word to say, the last before beginning to work again! When we began we played too lengthily; now that we know the form and are not carried away by the plot, we fall into the opposite, we play too fast. This happens because every one, sure of his own part, cuts short his comrade's words to speak his own. Keep yourselves free from a jealous personality, eager to exhibit itself; keep from it as from a pestilence! You will gain knowledge in listening to others. Let him ramble a little in his answers if he pleases; you will have good reason to be impatient when he impedes the action which impasses you. In real life, a friend bores us by his distractions, a valet vexes us with his chatter, a woman drives us to desperation by her obstinacy and her evasions. Well, all this aids instead of injures the scene we have improvised. It is reality, and art has only to give the finishing touch. Besides which, you interrupt each other, you run the risk of losing a good idea, which might have helped you to a better; you drive away a thought which might have inspired you with a thousand. So you harm yourself. Remember this principle: That each one may be good and true, all should be so, and the success which one takes away from another's rôle injures his own. Beyond these walls this would seem a frightful paradox; but you will perceive the justice of it, because you are endeavoring to form a true school. Besides, if only from kindness and mutual affection, you must be brothers in Art, as you are in blood. Inspiration can only be the result of moral health; it only dwells in generous hearts, and a bad companion is a bad actor, whatever they may say."

The play went on finely until the last scene, in which I again appeared as the statue, to vanish through a trap door with Don Juan. But when we were under the stage, Celio, whose hand I still held in my marble one, said to me, disengaging it, and passing suddenly from the fantastic to the real:

"Pardieu! may the devil take you! You made me fail in the grand climax of the drama; I was colder than the statue, and I should have been terrified and terrifying. Boccaferri will never understand why I played as badly to-night as at the Imperial Theatre of Vienna. But I will tell you. You look at Cecilia too much, and it pains me. A jealous Don Juan would be an impossibility, because that would argue love, and that does not agree with the rôle I play to-night and have played in real life until to-night."

"What are you coming to, Celio?" answered I. "Is this a quarrel, a challenge, a declaration of war? Speak! I appeal to that virtue which made me your friend, almost without knowing you; I appeal to your frankness."

"No," said he, "nothing of that. If I listened to my impulses, I should wring your neck in this cellar. But I feel that it would be ridiculous and odious in me to hate you, and I sincerely and loyally wish to receive you as a rival and friend at the same time. I brought you here of my own accord and without consulting any one. I confess that I thought you on the best terms with the Duchess de N——, for I was at Turin three days since with Cecilia. No one in this village nor in Turin knew of our journey. But in the twenty-four hours that we were near you, without being able to shake your hand, we learned a great deal. I thought you had fallen once more into the nets of Circe; I pitied you sincerely, and as we passed your lodging, to leave the city at five o'clock in the morning, Cecilia sang to you a few lines of Mozart as an eternal farewell. Unfortunately she chose an air and words which rather resembled an appeal than a renunciation, and that made me angry. Then I reassured myself in seeing her as calm as if your faithlessness was one of the most indifferent things to her; and as I love you from the bottom of my soul, I was sad when I thought of the woman who had taken Cecilia's place in your fickle heart. Now say, whom do you love and whither are you going? Are you running after the duchess, in passing through the village of the Wilderness? Is she hidden in some neighboring castle? How could chance have led you to this valley, which is on no road? If you are not hastening to a rendezvous with this woman, it is very plain to me that you are here for the other, and have succeeded in discovering her retreat and her new position, well concealed as they were. Now it is your turn to be sincere, Monsieur Salentini. Whom do you love, and whom do you not? and towards whom do you pretend to play the part of Ottavio or Don Giovanni?"

I answered by briefly telling the whole truth; I did not conceal that the Vedrai carino, sung by Cecilia under my window, had saved me from the duchess' power, and added in conclusion:

"I confess that I was near forgetting Cecilia, and had suffered so much in the struggle, that I believed that I thought of her no more. I so little expected to see you to-day, and the fantastic existence into which I am so suddenly thrown is so new to me, that I can say nothing to you except that to see you grown naïve and loving, her expansive and brilliant, her father sober and clear in his intelligence, your mysterious chateau, your charming sisters, those unknown figures which seem like some sweet dream to me, this life of a gentleman artist which you have created in a nest of vultures and ghosts, while the wind whistles and the snow falls out doors, all this bewilders me. Just now I was rapt and happy; it did not seem like earth; now you bring me back to reality, and you wish me to recollect myself, and I cannot. Give me until to-morrow morning to answer you. Since we do not wish to deceive each other, I do not know why we should not be friends until to-morrow morning."

"You are right," answered Celio; "and if we are not friends for life, I should regret it bitterly. We will talk to-morrow at daylight. Night here is made for excitement. But listen to a last word of real life which I must not postpone. Do you say that my charming sisters seem like a dream to you? Beware that dream! There is one of my sisters whom you must never love."

"Is she married?"

"No; something more serious than that. Answer me one question, which will admit of no evasions. Do you know the name of your father? I can well ask you that, I who only knew the name of mine so lately."

"Yes, I know it," answered I.

"And you are free to say it?"

"Yes; it is only my mother's name which I am obliged to conceal."

"It is the contrary with me; and your father's name was——"

"Tealdo Soavi. He was a singer at the theatre in Naples, and died young."

"So I had been told. I wished to be sure of it. My friend, look upon little Beatrice with a brother's eyes, for she is your sister. Ask me no questions about it. She is the only one in the family that has this mysterious connexion with you, and she must not know it. Our mother is sacred to us, and all her actions holy. We are her children, we bear her glorious name; that satisfies our pride; but much as it pains me, it was my duty to tell you this, that there may be no misunderstanding here. Sometimes the purest feeling might be unchaste, and should not be nourished in ignorance. This pure child is inclined to coquetry; perhaps she may some day grow passionate from reaction. Be severe, be disobliging with her if need be, so that you will not be obliged to reveal what you are to her. You see, Adorno, I had a right to be interested in you, and to watch over you a little at the same time; for this direct connexion between my sister and you establishes an indirect one between us. I should be miserable in hating you."

"Well, well!" cried Beatrice, opening the trap-door, "are you really dead down there? Why don't you come up? They are waiting supper for you."

The beautiful head of the child thrilled my heart with deep emotions. I understood why I loved her at first sight; and when I asked myself whom she resembled, I thought it must be myself; she too remarked it very innocently one day.

So I was one of the family too, and that put me at my ease. Whatever they may say, there is nothing so poetic and touching as these discoveries of mysterious parentage; they have almost the charm of love.

We passed into the dining room as the castle clock struck twelve. It was the rule to sup in costume. It was warm enough in the rooms not to endanger my health by wearing my paste-board armor, and it made great fun to see l'uom di sasso sitting down to eat cibo mortale between Don Juan and Leporello; still it had a certain shade of the fantastic, even when I made of my mask a covering to a pheasant pie.

They ate quickly and joyfully; then, when Boccaferri began to talk, Cecilia and Celio wanted the children to be sent bed, but Beatrice and Benjamin strenuously resisted this movement. They opened their eyes widely, to prove that they were not sleepy, and pretended to be as able to sit up as the grown up people.

"Don't contradict them," said Cecilia to Celio. "In a quarter of an hour they will sue for mercy."

And indeed, when Boccaferri, whom I was delighted to see pouring water into his wine, began to discuss the piece we had played, Beatrice's beautiful blonde head leaned upon Stella's shoulder, while at the other end of the table Benjamin began to look at his plate with unmistakable steadfastness. Celio, who was strong as an athlete, took his sister in his arms and carried her off like a little child; Stella shook her young brother, that she might lead him away. I took a light to direct their steps in the long galleries of the castle, and when Stella took my candle to go and light Salvator's, Celio whispered to me, showing Beatrice, whom he had placed upon her bed:

"She sleeps like a dormouse. Kiss your little sister in the dark, for perhaps you may never kiss her again."

I pressed an almost paternal kiss upon Beatrice's pure brow, and she answered, without recognizing me:

"Good night, Celio!" Then added she, with her eyes shut and with a roguish smile: "You must tell Monsieur Salentini not to make any noise at supper for fear of waking the Marquis de Balma!"

Stella returned with the light; we gave her sister up to her to be undressed, and we went back to supper. Stella soon came back, bringing with her Zerlina's delicious Andalusian costume, to be hidden and locked in the costume room.

"The mystery we have succeeded in drawing around us," said Cecilia to me, "gives a new attraction to our studies and nightly feasts. I hope that you will not betray us, and that you will let the villagers still believe that we keep Witches' Sabbath every night."

I told her what I heard from my hostess and the story of the little slipper.

"Yes, that was all true," said she; "it was Beatrice's fault, for she never will go to bed until she falls asleep. That night she was so tired that she went to bed with one slipper on, like a veritable little witch. We did not find it out till the next day."

"Come, my children, lose no time in useless words," said Boccaferri. "What shall we play to-morrow?"

"I ask for Don Juan once more, to reinstate myself," said Celio, "for I was pre-occupied to-night, and my progress was backward."

"True!" answered Boccaferri. "Then 'Don Juan' to-morrow for the third time! I begin to fear, Celio, that you are not wicked enough for that rôle as you have conceived it. I advise you, then, if you look at it differently, (and the inmost feeling of an intelligent actor is the best criticism of the rôle he attempts,) to give it other shades. Moliere's hero is a marquis, Mozart's a demon, and Hoffmann's a fallen angel. Why not take it in the last signification? Observe that this is not a mere reverie of the German poet; it is suggested by Moliere, who conceived this marquis in proportions as grand as the Misanthrope and Tartuffe. I do not like to think of Don Juan only as the dissoluto castigato

he is announced to be, out of respect to good manners, on the placards of La Fenice. Make of him a corrupted hero, a great heart quenched by vice, a dying flame, which tries in vain at times to cast a last radiance. Do not trouble yourself, my son; we are here to interpret rather than to translate.

"Don Juan' is a masterpiece," added Boccaferri, lighting a good Havana cigar, (his old black pipe had disappeared,) "but it is a masterpiece in several versions. Mozart alone made a complete and faultless one; but if we only examine it as a literary work, we shall see that Moliere has not given to his drama the emotion or passion of the libretto of the opera. On the other hand, the libretto is written in the style of a libretto, and that is saying all, while Moliere's style is admirable. Again, in the opera the characters are not fully developed, and the French drama excels in that. But Moliere's work will always lack the scene of Doña Anna and the Commander's murder, that terrible episode with which the opera opens so violently and boldly; the ball, where Zerlina is torn from the seducer's arms, is also very dramatic; so Moliere's drama lacks something. Both plays must be thoroughly blended; but for that something must be taken away from and added to Moliere. Who dares to do it, and who can? We alone are foolish and bold enough to attempt it. Our excuse is, that we desire action at any price, and to discover here, in private, the important points of the opera which you will some day sing in public; and then, instead of twelve actors, we have only six! So we are in need of miracles."

"Let us try something new to-morrow. Let Monsieur Salentini play Ottavio, and my daughter shall take the part of that sad Elvira, always furious and always mystified, which we have merged into the single rôle of Anna. We must see what Cecilia can make of her jealousy. Courage, my daughter! The more difficult and unpleasant it may be, so much the more glorious."

"And then, since we are changing parts," said Celio, "I ask to be Ottavio. I feel in a tender mood, and the spirit of Don Juan is fast leaving me."

"But who will be Don Juan?" said Boccaferri.

"You, my father," answered Cecilia. "You know how to make yourself young, and you are the master of us all; your attempt will profit Celio."

"What a bad idea! Where can I find grace and beauty? Look at Celio; he can play his part badly; that manner, that form, that blonde moustache, which so becomes his black eyes, those large eyes, slightly encircled, but still so young, all these aid the illusion; while with me, an old man, all will be cold and undone."

"Not so," said Celio. "Don Juan might very likely have been forty-five years old, and you did not look older than that as Leporello. I believe I behaved too young for such a scamp and such a notorious rōu. Try it, we beseech you."

"As you please, children; and you, Cecilia, will you be Elvira?"

"I will be anything you wish, if the play only goes on. But Monsieur Salentini?"

"Still a statue, at your service."

"That is but one part," said Boccaferri; "we must necessarily combine short rôles. You may try Masetto, and the Benjamin, who is decidedly comical, may attempt Leporello. Why not? We can make him look old, and the conquest of great difficulties is so much gained."

"Then it is settled that I am to return here to-morrow night?" asked I, looking around the table."

"Yes, indeed, if no one expects you elsewhere," said Cecilia, giving me her hand, with a calm benignity which could in no wise flatter me.

"You are to come to-morrow and take up your abode in the Castle of the Wilderness," said Boccaferri. "I insist upon it. You are a useful actor and very gifted by nature. I shall keep you and not let you go; and then, you see, we can busy ourselves with painting. Scene-painting is the great school of relief, of depth and light, which historical and landscape painters disdain, because they do not understand it and also because they do not see it well employed. I have my ideas upon the subject, and you will see that you lose no time in listening to old Boccaferri; and then our groups and costumes may inspire you with subjects; there is everything here which is requisite for painting, and studios at your service."

"Let me think of it to-night," answered I, looking at Celio, "and I will answer you to-morrow morning."

"Then I shall expect you at breakfast to-morrow morning, or else I shall keep you on the spot."

"No," said I, "I am staying with an honest man, who will not go to bed till I come in. He will imagine I have fallen down some precipice, or that I have been devoured by the devils of the castle."

This settled, we parted. Celio helped me to dress myself, and wished to go back half way with me; but he hardly spoke, and when he left me he pressed my hand sadly. I saw him return over the snow, with his buff leather boots, his velvet cloak, his rapier at his side, and his large plume waving in the wind. Nothing could have been more singular than the sight of this personage of a by-gone age crossing the fields at midnight, and to think the theatrical hero was plunged into the reveries and emotions of real life.

[To be continued.]

The Original Score of Mozart's Requiem.

BY E. F. EDLEN VON MOSEL,

Custos of the Imperial Library at Vienna.

(Translated for the London Musical World.)

The original score of Mozart's Requiem, the same which was, after his death, delivered to the person who commissioned him to write it, and who remained for so long a time unknown, is now amongst the musical collection of the Imperial Library at Vienna.

Count Moritz von Dietrichstein, Imperial Privy Councillor and Prefect of the Court Library, a distinguished patron of musical art and a true admirer of the great composer, discovered this remarkable manuscript, and obtained it for the institution of which he has the charge, to add to the valuable possessions of which, and to increase its celebrity, are his constant endeavor.

The first glance at this score convinced every one that had seen Mozart's handwriting, that, from the first leaf to the last, it was entirely written by him; from which it follows, that he completed the work before his death; and everything that has been circulated upon the subject, either by report, in writing or in print, is erroneous. Besides the testimony of the handwriting, several other circumstances justified this belief. It is well known how long and how ardently Mozart was employed upon this Requiem, and that portion which has hitherto been recognized as his work seemed neither to correspond to such length of time, or to such ardor, even if we balance against his remarkable facility in composition the failing state of his health during the last months of his life, which certainly must have rendered the creation of this work an effort.

Let us recall the "Genuine Anecdotes of the Life of Gottlieb Wolfgang Mozart," published by Councillor F. Rochlitz in the first year of the Leipziger Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung.—There it is stated (col. 150): "He began the work immediately (upon receiving the commission). With every bar his interest in the subject seemed to increase; he wrote day and night. His body could not endure the exertion—he fainted several times while at work." And further we read (cols. 177 and 178): "He was extremely ailing when he started for Prague. The multiplicity of his occupations had, however, once more excited the powers of his spirit." * * * "but through this very exertion still more enfeebled, he returned to Vienna more ailing than before, and, disgusted with all this tumult, splendor, and extravagance, he returned with avidity to the interrupted labor of his Requiem." * * * "The work," said he to the person from whom he received the commission, "has increased in interest to me as I have proceeded with it; I am developing it much more extensively than I at first intended."

Mozart's widow, now the widow of Baron von Nissen, wrote to the Abbé Stadler (according to his published statement), that her husband had never, before receiving this commission, begun the composition of any Requiem, and often said to her "that he undertook this work with the utmost pleasure, since it was the class of music he loved best, and that he would conceive and execute it with such zeal, that his foes and his friends would equally study it after his death."

Concerning the unceasing industry with which Mozart prosecuted the composition of this work, there are still many other proofs, besides those above quoted.

To adduce but one, the authority of which must be respected throughout the whole civilized world, I may mention that my honored friend, the Imperial Councillor, and Professor Freyherr Joseph von Jaquin, in whose family Mozart was very intimate, visited him at this period on behalf of a lady, who, though already a great proficient on the pianoforte, wished still further to perfect her talent, and therefore desired to take lessons of him, preliminary to which he was requested to hear her play. Freyherr von Jaquin found him at his writing desk, busily working at the Requiem. He introduced his request. "With pleasure," answered Mozart; "I will do everything that you wish, only leave me at leisure for the present. I have here a work that is very pressing, and in which I am deeply interested. Until it is completed, I really cannot give a thought to anything else."

"Since he, nevertheless, whilst still writing the Requiem (on the 15th November, 1791, according to the date in his own handwriting), composed the beautiful cantata, Laut verkünde unsre Freude, we may naturally suppose that he must have been sufficiently near the conclusion of that greater work, to be certain of completing it.

Knowing all this, it has always been difficult to believe that he had only produced those portions of the Requiem that the Abbé Stadler ascribes to him in his account.

That he not only composed more of the Requiem than is there represented, but that he positively completed it, is corroborated by a great many credible testimonies.

In the anecdotes contributed by Herr Councillor Rochlitz (referred to above) he concludes by saying: "During this labor he frequently was overcome by total prostration and fainting. Before the close of the fourth week (after the enquiry of the person from whom he received the commission) the work was finished, and with it his life."

Councillor Rochlitz calls these Anecdotes "genuine." He would not have called them so if he had not derived them from the best sources. Moreover, he is really not the man to speak of a thing as "finished" which is unfinished; we are therefore justified in supposing that he learnt, through a private channel, that Mozart had literally finished the work, that is to say, he had perfectly completed it.

In G. N. von Nissen's Biography of Mozart we read (page 564), "On the day of his death he had the score of the Requiem brought to his bed. 'Did I not say that I was writing the Requiem for myself?' he said, and read it through once more with moistened eyes." He had the score brought to his bed: here there is no allusion to sketches. He read through the whole; should one not from this conclude that it was a whole? And finally, who could infer from the words: "That I was writing the Requiem for myself," that he believed an unfinished work, in which three pieces, besides the conclusion, were wanting, would be performed at his funeral?

With so many grounds for the opinion that the work was completed by him, the impression which the handwriting of the score now under consideration produced must have been so much the more convincing. At the same time it was not admitted as genuine without the utmost precaution, it having been felt that the extraordinary circumstances of this case demanded extraordinary discrimination. Manuscripts, the existence of which has either been entirely unknown, or which have been supposed lost for ever, have often been, and still are from time to time discovered; in this case, however, the majority, trusting to the testimony of Süßmayer, of Stadler, and even of the widow of the great composer, were convinced of the non-existence of this manuscript, in its completed state. It was, therefore, quite permissible not to trust to one's own eyes unconditionally, and it became a duty to employ the closest examination, the severest test, before recognizing this complete manuscript as written by the master's hand.

(Conclusion next week.)

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

TELL'S DEATH,

FROM THE GERMAN OF UHLAND.

When once the avalanche thunders,
The Alp is green again:
The herds go up the mountain.
The snow runs down the plain.
To you, ye Alpine children,
The ice, the Spring sets free,
Each year renews in emblem
The fight of Liberty.

See where the thundering Schächen
Down through the gorges leaps,
And rock and fir fall crashing
Where'er his torrent sweeps.
The bridge is crushed and buried
That hung above the spray;
A boy just crossing over,
Is with it washed away.

It chanced, that very moment,
An old man neared the verge,
To save the boy, he, fearless
Leaps down into the surge;
Grasps him with eagle-swiftness,
And bears him safe to shore;
The child escapes—his saviour
Hath sunk to rise no more.

And when the flood ejected
His body, robbed of life,
There stood around him, sobbing
And sorrowing, man and wife.
As if old Rothstock, crashing,
From its foundations fell,
Burst from one mouth the grief-cry:
" 'Tis Tell is dead! 'tis Tell! "

Were I an Alpine herdsman
On the eternal snow,
Were I a daring boatman
On Uri's lake below,

And had I, in my sorrow,
Come near where Tell lay dead,
My arm his head enfolding,
My wail I thus had said:

"There liest thou, pale and lifeless,
Who wast the life of all;
Thy hoary locks still fondly
Around thy pale face fall.
Here stands, whom thou hast rescued,
A child, like milk and blood;
The land thou hast unfettered,
Lo! Alpine glories flood!

"The love that to the rescue
Of this young struggler flew,
Had been in thee the courage
That erst the tyrant slew.
Unsleeping and unshrinking,
To help was aye thy way;
So was it in thy brown locks,
So was it in thy gray.

"Hadst thou been still a young man,
When thou the boy didst save,
And hadst thou then been rescued
From this thy watery grave,
Thence had we well concluded
Fame should one day be thine;
Yet after great achievements,
The hero's homeliest shine.

"Thine ear has rung with voices
That praised thee loud and high,
Yet could it stoop to listen
To misery's feeblest cry.
He is the freeman's hero,
Who, though with victory crowned,
Yet, burns for deeds of goodness
No trump of Fame shall sound.

"Unscathed, we saw thee coming Back from the work of wrath;
Thy fortune first forsook thee
In pity's humble path.
Heaven asked not, for a people,
Thy life in sacrifice,
But, for this child surrendered,
'Twas held a precious prize.

"Where thy sure shaft, like lightning,
Straight to the Vogt's heart went,
There stands a chapel open,
Vengeance, thy monument!
But here, where thou hast perished
To save a child, alone
For a memorial hast thou
A humble cross of stone.

"Well, far and wide 'tis sounded
How thou thy land hast freed,
The tongues of mighty poets
Shall give to Fame the deed;
But when, at eve, the herdsman
Comes down the Schächen's side,
The rocks, Tell's name resounding,
Shall utter how he died."

C. T. R.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MAY 30.—Last Monday night an event came off which has long been expected here, viz: the exhibition to the public of Messrs. Jardine & Son's large new organ, built for Rev. Dr. Alexander's Church, in the Fifth avenue. The announcement brought crowds of the gaily dressed and fashionable inhabitants of that aristocratic quarter of the city, many being unable to gain admission. The selection of the pieces and the skill of the performers were certainly well worthy of the occasion; indeed the whole affair passed off to the evident satisfaction of the enthusiastic auditory present, and must have been deeply gratifying to the builders of the noble instrument, as well as to the members of the church it adorns so well.

This organ from its sweetness and purity of tone, its admirable evenness of voicing, and the varied and pleasing effects of which it is susceptible, no less than from its great power, filling to its remotest corner the lofty edifice with its grand harmonies, swelling from the softest whisper to a depth and beauty and power of tone, a sea of harmony far beyond the precincts of the house, which cannot confine it, into the open air, surging upward to that heaven to which its tones were directed and in whose service it was reared; this organ stands unrivalled in its excellence, the finest in the city and the trustees of Rev. Dr. Alexander's Church may well congratulate themselves in the possession of this magnificent instrument.

On the evening in question, while listening to the finished and classical style of Mr. Wm. Mason, who is (fortunately for the Messrs. JARDINE) the organist of the church, the brilliant playing of Mr. G. W. MORGAN, and the profound knowledge of the almost inexhaustible resources of the instrument displayed by Mr. EDWARD JARDINE in his performance, the hearer could not but feel the truth that, "Peace hath its victories no less than war," and this was indeed a triumph of science and art. In this organ has been introduced, among other improvements, a stop new to untravelling ears, viz: the "Vox celestis," resembling in its effect a choir of far distant, though rich contralto voices carrying out what its name suggests, the startling yet beautiful idea of a chorus of celestial harmony which has caught up the preceding strain and is bearing to heaven for acceptance at its throne the praises of the faithful upon earth. The attentive audience upon whose ears these beautiful tones fell will not soon forget their effect, and to those who had heard the same beautiful effects produced upon the wonderful organ of the Madeleine in Paris, the occasion was a pleasing souvenir of their enjoyment then. Annexed is a programme of the evening, with a list of the stops contained in this masterpiece of the builders' skill. J. P.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

1. Grand Introduction and Fugue, in D,.....Adolph Hesse.
2. Movement from the Lessons,.....Handel.
3. Pastoral,.....Kullak.
4. Voluntary Extempore, (Mr. Wm. Mason,)......Mason.
5. Organ Fugue, in G Minor,.....J. S. Bach.
6. Allegro from Organ Sonata, in F,.....Mendelssohn.

[Mr. Edward Jardine will perform Hesse's Tema and Variations in A, between the First and Second Parts of the Programme.]

PART II.

1. Fugue and Chorus, (Israel in Egypt,)......Handel.
2. Fantasia Extempore on Popular Melodies,.....Morgan.
3. Overture, (Der Freischütz,)......Weber.
4. Voluntary Extempore, (Mr. Wm. Mason,)......Mason.
5. Marche du Sacre, (Le Prophete,)......Meyerbeer.
6. American and English Anthems Extempore,.....Morgan.

DESCRIPTION OF THE ORGAN.

GREAT ORGAN.
Double Open Diapason.....16	Principal.....4
Grand Open Diapason.....8	Twelfth.....3
Open Diapason.....8	Fifteenth.....2
Stopped Diapason.....8	Sesquialto, 8 ranks.....2
Quint.....6	Mixture, 2 ranks.....1
	Trumpet.....8
CHOIR ORGAN.
Open Diapason.....8	Principal.....4
Dulciana.....8	Twelfth.....3
Clariana.....8	Fifteenth.....2
Stopped Diapason.....8	Cremona.....3
Hohl-flute.....4
SWELL ORGAN.
Bourdon.....16	Fifteenth.....2
Open Diapason.....8	Cornet.....2
Stopped Diapason.....8	Cornopean.....8
Viol di Gamba.....8	Hautbois.....8
Principal.....4	Vox Celestis.....8
PEDAL ORGAN.
Double Open Diapason.....16	Octave.....4
Double Stopped Diapason.....16	Contra Fagotto.....16
Violoncello.....8

ACCESSORY STOPS.—Seven Manual and Pedal Couplers.

Compass of Manual Organs, C to G, 4½ Octaves.

" Pedal Organ, C to F, 2½ "

Total of Stops.....42

A ROYAL SINGER.—A letter from Lisbon states that, at a concert given by M. Carlolds, the Belgian minister in that city, the King of Portugal sang the sono of Mercadante, and an air of Verdi's in the "Vepres," and took a part in a duo from "Linda" with Bartolini, the baritone.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 7, 1856.

MOZART'S "REQUIEM."—The article which we have copied on another page appears to set at rest the long mooted question of the authenticity of this celebrated work. It is well known to many of our readers to have been the general understanding until now, that Mozart died, in 1791, leaving the "Requiem" in a very unfinished state; and that SUSSMAYER, his favorite pupil, then a young man of five and twenty, claimed afterwards to have added all that portion of the work, as we now have it, which follows the second verse of the Lachrymosa, at which point Mozart's strength is supposed to have wholly failed him within a few hours of his death. Süssmayer claimed therefore to be the author of the remainder of the Dies Iræ, (which includes the Lachrymosa,) and of the entire Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei, while he repeated Mozart's fugue from the Kyrie for the concluding Cum sanctis, &c. He had been constantly with Mozart while he was engaged upon this work, had frequently gone over with him the parts already finished, was intimately familiar with his method, style, and his intentions with regard to it, had received certain dying instructions from the master, and had, besides these hints, the help of certain scattered fragments of music paper on which Mozart had jotted down his thoughts.

These statements were never fully contradicted, indeed were commonly received as more or less true; and yet faith in the "Requiem" as the work of Mozart somehow never left the popular mind. In 1825, GOTTFRIED WEBER, in his musical journal, The Cæcilia, revived the controversy, not only defending the claim of Süssmayer, but pronouncing the "Requiem," as a whole, a work unworthy of Mozart, the weakest of his productions, and severely criticizing those parts which were undoubtedly his own, while he had much to say in praise of those alleged to have been added by the pupil!

The motive of this strange attack has been traced to the fact that Weber at that very time was engaged in the composition of a "Requiem" himself, and was publishing articles to show that such works until then had been constructed on false principles, and to point out the true ones. The injustice of his low estimate of Mozart's work was ably shown by that learned musician and friend of Mozart, the Abbé STADLER. "You think," said he, "that the Requiem is the least complete, the most imperfect work of Mozart? Well, I, Maximilian Stadler, maintain that it is the most complete and perfect work of Mozart in the three first parts, that is to say, in four fifths of its whole extent. And here are JOSEPH and MICHAEL HAYDN, WINTER, BEETHOVEN, CHERUBINI, &c., &c., even SALIERI," (Mozart's most bitter rival,) "and a thousand others, who think and speak as I do. Among these names there are perhaps some which sound as well as yours, Herr Gottfried Weber; perhaps the opinion of the two Haydns, of Cherubini, Beethoven and Winter, outweigh the authority of all the musical journals in the world, including the Cæcilia. To recognize as an authentic and at the same time the finest work of Mozart, these great men had not to wait for material proofs. They would have blushed at the thought of requiring a fac-simile in a journal, or of calling in an expert in handwriting, before they could decide whether this was the work of a pupil or the masterpiece of the master of them all. No, they did not draw their convictions from such sources. The proofs for them lay in the whole inner structure, in the invention, in the execution, in the deeply studied development of the thoughts, in a word, in the intrinsic value of the score."

OULIBICHEFF, too, the Russian biographer, from whom we have so often quoted, gives a chapter in his book, summing up the whole controversy in a very able manner, and from internal evidence making it very clear that the whole "Requiem" is virtually, essentially Mozart's, and that Süssmayer could have played little more than the part of copyist in writing out the last parts. He says of Süssmayer, that though he was a composer of numerous works, including several operas, which enjoyed much popularity in their day, yet not one of his labors has survived him. "He was at the most a second-rate composer, and he owes all his present celebrity to Herr Weber. But if Süssmayer, still so young a man, was able to compose three numbers of the Requiem, which, although in some respects inferior to the preceding, do not contrast essentially in thoughts, or style, or coloring, with a score confessedly the highest masterwork of the greatest musical genius of all the centuries, then of necessity must one of two things be admitted: either Süssmayer at that point began to be Mozart and ceased to be Süssmayer, or the spirit of the master descended from heaven upon the scholar, to inspire him with the conclusion of the Requiem; in which case we must suppose that he never made him more than one such visit. If there was a miracle, I give the preference to the latter."

We have no room to give the history of the Requiem. Perhaps some day we may present to our readers M. Oulibicheff's "Substance of the Controversy." Suffice it to say now that there was a great deal of mystery about its origin; that something is said about various copies made just after the composer's death, one of which was put into the hands of the mysterious stranger (now known to be Count Wallsegg) who ordered the work; and something about a later copy made by Süssmayer for the widow Mozart, who was left very poor, and naturally thought that a complete copy of the Requiem would prove a treasure to her. The mystery, if we may trust the account of the Vienna librarian, is now all cleared up by the discovery of a manuscript copy of the whole work, in Mozart's own handwriting. Such proof, backed as it is by a great weight of circumstantial and internal evidence, seems irresistible; and all admirers of Mozart and of the Requiem must feel relief and joy in the discovery.

Robert Franz.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

We conclude the translation of the biographical sketch by Liszt, commenced in last week's paper.

"After his return to his father's house, Franz was in a great dilemma. He had not as yet acquired any of those faculties which make a man pass current in the world. He could not and he would not any longer court a civic position, which would have made him the respectable five-hundredth wheel in the social machine of his country. He was determined, come what would, to remain a musician, since he already looked upon himself as such, and indeed as completely such. Meanwhile his best labors betrayed too much the groping scholar, and reached not that degree of clearness and effectiveness which the public requires. His shy, retiring nature was not fitted to seek satisfaction in the successes of salons and coteries, in affairs of love or business. He suffered without resistance under the calumnies to which such organizations are exposed, which, in their want of brilliant outward qualities, become shy of men, and often feel themselves robbed of their resources in the very moment when there is the most pressing necessity for making them apparent. Like Rousseau and Schiller, his thoughts came just as he left the house; or, as we heard him say himself, he usually thawed out when it was too late.—His state of mind was aggravated by bitter remarks, which his friends and relations did not spare him when it was demonstrable that his musical studies so far had produced only negative results, and that his career might, in the common way of viewing things, be called a failure. This situation became the more painful to him, since in Dessau he was affected by one of the most dangerous evils of every conservatoire: to wit, self-sufficiency. Too often any expressed distrust in his talent, in his future, only increased the inward reserve of his nature. Instead of growing more expansive in his family circle, he returned more and more back into himself, became more and more strengthened in his striving after independence of the opinions of others, more and more determined to rely solely on himself. It was for him a period full of conflict, suffering and doubt, full of toil and renunciation. It might have operated destructively upon him, for how hard it is to hold one's ground against so many opposing influences! But here it was a mother's tender sympathy, the womanly gift of intuition, lending such a sacred charm to the pure instinct of her love, that held him up and saved him—he who only needed some stay in a loving heart to raise the lever of his energy, his outward power.

"About this time he first learned to know and to admire Sebastian Bach and Franz Schubert. While he became penetrated with the genius of these two, he gradually lost that self-sufficiency which he had brought with him from Dessau, and not much time passed before all the Dessau compositions were put aside. A close acquaintance with these masters, a continual reference to what they had done, and a comparison of it with his own sketches, operated depressingly upon his artistic consciousness, and nourished disheartening doubts in his own productive faculty. But he received them all the more deeply into his enthusiastic soul, into his ripening understanding. Singular example of sincere love for Art! By this means he escaped the petrification which might have ensued from an indefinite prolonging of the conflict between unappreciating friends and morbid self-reliance, which so easily degenerates into empty conceit.

"Moreover, he now found in Halle that intellectual movement, that constant coming and going of ideas, that ebb and flow of the most various views, which he had lacked in Dessau. Even if the public musical life there was of slight importance, yet the university offered mighty elements of spiritual nourishment, such as one would have sought in vain at that time in any other part of Germany. One remembers the activity developed in the thinking youth of Halle then, which found its most remarkable expression in a periodical review, whose philosophical opinions made an epoch. Ruge and his followers had called forth a great activity in cultivated circles, which naturally began to pervade every sphere of intellectual life. If Franz did not immediately attach himself to the new ideas just germinating, if he did not disseminate them by speaking and by writing, still he exercised his analytic and sympathetic reflection upon all that there was noble and fruitful in these investigations of philosophic freedom. He quickly perceived that the artist must not limit his survey to the objects which he has to treat; that it must be injurious to him to remain a stranger to the atmosphere of ideas which surround him, and not consider his art as a part of the great whole, in the midst of which we live, identifying himself with the universal interests, newly quickened by the new inquiries.

"The favorable influence which his participation in this intellectual struggle exercised upon him cannot be mistaken, and this moment thus became of such paramount importance for his life-purposes thereafter, as to regulate his whole relation to the world and to Art by a fixed rule. It may also be maintained that Franz became the musician whom we now admire, not through his studies in Dessau, but through the solitary period which he passed in Halle. Not that we would question the necessity and usefulness of the elementary notions acquired in the school of Schneider. They were as indispensable to him as his first gymnasium studies, without which he would not have been capable of following the philosophical debates, of which he was a dumb but eager witness. But Franz himself has told us that, had the stiffness, immovableness, and narrowness of the Dessau principles remained unmodified and unexpanded in him, he would never have been Franz, would never have acquired the courage to assert his individuality, to hold himself not pledged to do as others had done, and let himself be taken in tow by famous authorities. He would have yielded to the cheap counsels which rained from the lips of would-be patrons; for it is not always necessary to lie upon Job's dunghill to be like him surrounded by the empty speeches of friends. He would perhaps have lent an ear to those well-meant but ruinous insinuations, which continually point us to the success of others, urge us upon others' ways, without knowing whether we are able to walk upon them; for if the animal kingdom is divided into different classes, which live in different elements, much more so is it with independent talents; the organization of each one is too peculiarly constituted not to forfeit its own inborn originality and excellencies in the atmosphere of another. Franz became convinced of this truth, while he reflected upon Art in all its broad relations. Then, summoning up again the courage which he had lost through being long buried in Bach and Schubert, shaking off the yoke of old formulas, unlearning the false importance which attaches to certain secrets of the trade, when we take them for the highest initiation, he resolved to seek his way, and before all things to perfect his intellectual self. He saw that the form is a soft wax, in which the business is to impress our relief, and that the more finely the relief is cut, the better will the impress show itself. The form, which he had been told to look upon as the essential thing in Art, now lost forever in his eyes its unalterable character. He recognized all the idolatry of taking the image for the god, the means for the end, and of attaching more consequence to the quality of the wax than to the beauty of the object it should set before us. Thus he found himself in that right frame of mind, at once bold and modest, which hope incites and true self-knowledge keeps in bounds. From the moment when the form appeared to him only as the indispensable medium of the idea, he formulated to himself the impregnable position of the necessity of maintaining a beautiful equilibrium between form and thought, and of only giving expression to such thoughts as are worthy of a fair form.

"Whoever has labored for long years to penetrate the close web of philosophical systems, in order to apply their consequences to the domain of Art, and whoever has succeeded in formulating the ideas thence derived in such high-hearted, comprehensive, fruitful principles, must naturally feel a desire not only to communicate them, but to spread them, and, in the consciousness that they contribute to the ennobling of Art, to win proselytes to his opinions. Franz sought them the more zealously, inasmuch as he had not yet wholly lifted himself out of that despondency into which he had been plunged by the conviction that he was incapable of production and not possessed of the necessary qualities for a composer. But this propagandist spirit drove him out of his retirement, and he saw himself all at once surrounded by a circle of young people, who to a certain artistic culture brought a lively enthusiasm for Art; and he formed the focus of a group which occupied itself especially with music, with its task in social life, its ethical mission and title. They were not content with making music, and decidedly good music; they busied themselves with drawing an æsthetic profit from it. Franz found more and more pleasure in these abstract intellectual exercises, which in the sequel he exerted himself to apply to his own works, in which he attained to a self-criticism, such as is quite too seldom met among our artists, who either satisfy themselves with the expression of their feelings, without having tried them and refined them, or else take delight in rounded forms, forgetting to lend them a significance through feelings.

"For six long years Franz felt no impulse to take pen in hand; he was occupied upon one task which the elders so often erroneously suppose completed at the gymnasium, and which in our time especially every creative artist must fulfil with love and conscientiousness. He strove for the enlargement of his circle of ideas, for the attainment of a higher stand-point, from which the whole relation of Art to the past and present of society may be surveyed; from which one may see how far Art has already fulfilled its mission, and what will be its problem for the future; from which one may learn to seize its starting point and to anticipate its goal. So long as a thinking artist is not clear in his own mind upon all these points, the wish to produce upon his own account must slumber in him. Above all there reigns in him a kind of insatiable curiosity, an incessant thirst, which study does not quench, but only the more violently kindle. The musical culture of our composer had nothing more to suffer during this period, while his mind was more occupied with generalizing thoughts than with special labors. He did not come to a standstill in the admiration of Bach and Schubert, but he followed attentively the unfolding of the school, which was at that time called the Romantic. In Leipzig the practical and literary efforts of Mendelssohn and Schumann formed a circle full of life and motion round themselves, and the influence of their neighborhood extended soon to Halle. Frequent echoes carried there the tone of the capital and were eagerly caught up. Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin, Henselt, and other names at that time perhaps less highly placed, though often mentioned, excited sympathy and respect in Franz. He took up into himself all that he found in them that corresponded to him. To this work of assimilation with the works of his contemporaries, whose spirit answered to his own, and whose form bore the stamp of their time, he was especially indebted for the restoration to himself, for a less inexorable process of comparison, of judgment, as also for the need of burying himself again entirely in his own way of feeling, so as to let it appear freely in a work of Art; for the impulse to express himself, instead of tracing out in others' works what came near to his own moods of mind, as he had done in the last years.

"But was this result due only to the various phases of the intellectual life? Must we not also recognize the influence of personal experiences in these conspicuous moments of his artistic career, by which we measure his direction? Can we realize the whole impression of his works without thinking of the colorings which were cast upon his soul, upon his imagination by the prismatic light of golden hopes, of shining fortune, or the dark clouds of sad disenchantment, bitter gloom? The moment in which Franz felt himself newly urged to composition was not merely of importance in the history of the unfolding of his talent; it coincided with a moment of deep passion, which, seizing upon every fibre of his soul, excited the poetic chords to new vibrations. He loved, with all devotion, such as could only germinate in his pure, noble nature. He dreamed of a happiness; softly its wings touched him, and then it flew away! This catastrophe of his inner fate determined his complete maturity. He broke away from all the inveiglements of uncertain wishes and uncertain hopes; pain steeled and concentrated his mind, and gave him that sacred fervor, that energy which leaves the soul all its freedom, so that it may confirm this freedom with its every power. With these newly awakened powers he felt himself called to take his place among the men of action, and to speak his own language in the name of his own inward inspiration. An impulse, whose authority he could not mistake, drew him to the lyrical, and particularly to the song form; for what he felt and thought most powerfully took this form involuntarily. Far from stopping to make choice of a kind, from weighing its external advantages and disadvantages, he began without once thinking of publicity, and only wrote to make an outlet to his overpowering feelings—per sfogarsi. His close, uncommunicative habit made this mode of expressing himself doubly necessary to him. And now it was found that these long years of voluntary abstinence from all production had not only been no injury to him, but had helped to preserve all the freshness of his verve. His constant musical occupation had not allowed him to forget the secrets of the trade learned at school, while his persistent inward toil had been sufficient to free him from all chains of prejudice.

"This time, too, as in so many other instances, it was the self-love of his friends, more active than his own, that determined him to publish his first works. Schumann, to whom he then stood nearest, led him before the musical world with that friendly recognition which affects us so pleasantly in his writings. Franz perceived that from this moment his relation to Art had entered upon a new stadium. It was no longer exclusively the point with him to satisfy himself in his compositions; his artistic productions must now learn to find limit and proportion in the views and feelings of others. Personal acquaintance with the great men of the day, with Schumann and others, paved the way for him upon the side of self-examination and self-esteem. He entered deeper into reflection on himself and his relation to the public. The result of this reflection was the firm adherence to the path which he had entered, the clear conviction that only in this path could he become of use to Art, and, what is the same thing, to the world. With this resolution was coupled as a natural consequence a second: namely, never to write for the mere sake of writing, and still less from any motive of gain or vanity; but only when the inner voice, the longing after the ideal, the holy stimulus, which urges us to seek in Art the transfiguration of our noblest impulses, compelled him to it and made him sure of the inspiration, without which we can neither feel love for the beautiful nor find its fitting forms. And who will say that he has not been faithful to this noble vow? Who can find among his creations a single one which betrays other motives? So far from violating his vow, he exposed himself much more to another danger—that of a too great intensity of feeling, a too constant self-absorption, a too exclusive meditating upon his own inner consciousness. The alterations which he afterwards made, from sure and well-weighed reasons, in his compositions, are abundant proof that he soon saw and avoided this fault.

"Now that he had fairly begun his career as a composer with merit and with honor, his outward life offered but little variety. He made a happy marriage, and found in the domestic hearth, adorned with gentle virtues, that clear, equal atmosphere which is most favorable to intellectual labors. True, he found no lack of manifold local opposition and antipathy, which only serve to remind one of the proverb: "No one is a prophet in his own country." Every one who knows the narrow circle of ideas in a small city, will readily imagine that few understood the interest and the use which a musician found in occupations which had no connection with his speciality; for even in this year of grace 1855 there still exist good people who believe that artist and mechanic are one and the same thing, and that to become a good painter, sculptor, or musician, one has no need to seek for himself a wider horizon than that of the workshop, like the tailor and the shoemaker. Franz was accounted odd, original; nay, they went so far (and this is a characteristic trait, which we may find in many an artist's life, and may serve as one useless hint the more for pedantic blockheads in the age to come,) as to whisper into one another's ears that such an eccentricity of character could only proceed from a tendency to insanity! Certainly his greatest hindrance was the fact that he resided in the city where he had been born and brought up. The multitude will not forgive genius, that it unfolds itself with the chasteness of the plant, whose blossoming is slowly prepared, which opens its calyx to the lap of night, and then to the clear day, to our astonished eyes, displays the splendor of its full bloom. It vexes them that they have passed by a flower with closed petals, without divining its worth, its beauty, and they deny the same, in order to evade the painful feeling that they did not foresee it.

"Thus years passed on. Franz found abroad the sympathy which he deserved, while his native land disputed note by note his merit. Only very slowly did another view break out a path for itself in the criticism of the men of Halle, so hard was it for them to treat with more respect this single man, so sparing of his words, whom they had been accustomed to regard as one of those fantastical, harmless, useless, visionary characters, upon whom the merchant, the bureaucrat, the industrial, the scholar, the soldier look down with an infinite hauteur, because they cannot comprehend why he is there, and still less why he looks down still more haughtily on them. The efforts of our master to expend his intellectual activity in his own little circle for the good of Art, won for him gradually the respect of his townsmen, as fast as his praises and his growing popularity abroad imposed silence on their prejudices. They even appointed him organist in one of the parochial churches, music director to the Gesangverein, music teacher at the University, and gave him the direction of the society concerts. In time, however, Franz may hardly be contented with the sphere of action offered in his native city. But however much is left for him to desire, he must look with real confidence upon the musical nucleus collected around him, which has learned to distinguish commonplace products, manufactured in the routine of trade, from higher works of Art inspired by true enthusiasm. This circle will expand from year to year, and form for him an intelligent, sympathetic, admiring and devoted public, such as seldom any one can claim with greater right than ROBERT FRANZ."

Musical Chat-Chat.

The past week has given us but little in the way of music—nothing in short but a military band concert (Dodworth's) and some fragments of Italian Opera at the Boston Theatre, by Signorina VESTVALI, with a portion of the troupe of which she is to be manager in Mexico next winter. Those who were present Wednesday night, seem to have been much charmed with Vestvali, as well as MANZINI, the soprano. We may have something to report hereafter of last night's performance. They appear this afternoon for the last time. For the summer months Vestvali, as we understand, has engaged "Laura Keenes's Varieties" in New York.

At the annual meeting of the Handel and Haydn Society last week, the following gentlemen were elected officers for the ensuing year:—President,

C. F. Chickering; Vice President, George Hews; Secretary, L. B. Barnes; Treasurer, Matthew S. Parker; Librarian, O. J. Faxon; Trustees, H. L. Hazleton, J. S. Farlow, J. H. Ward, George W. Hunnewell, Edw. Faxon, D. W. Wiswell, A. O. Bigelow, J. P. Draper.

The first volume of a new "Life of Mozart," by OTTO JAHN, has appeared in Germany. The Mozart letters, preserved at Salzburg and extending from 1777 to 1784, the most important part of the composer's life, have been largely used in this work. There has also appeared in Germany an interesting book entitled "Mozart's visit to Prague." It is stated that Charles Mozart, the son of the composer, now an old man, is living in Milan in poverty. The Athenæum well suggests that a contribution should be organized. If each of all the thousands whose lives have been enriched by Mozart's heavenly harmonies should give the smallest mite, it would make the poor man a millionaire.

The Home Journal quotes some curious Vestralics Says one of her newspaper critics:

Vestrali looked superbly beautiful. With the brow of Minerva, and the form of Juno, she walked the stage like one born to command; with a presence instinct with grace, and a form fulfilling the ideal of grand and beautiful proportion, she compelled admiration and led a thousand new captives to swell her vast train of devoted worshippers. She was received with genuine and loudly demonstrative enthusiasm, which burst forth on every possible occasion during the evening.

But the most curious are the lady's own letters, (in English,) written from Mexico to New York papers. Here is an extract:

Now I have many news for you. You have heard through my letters my immense success in 'Romeo' and all the other operas. Well, my benefit, which has been on the 23 Jan. has been so splendid, as during twenty years has not been one other. I have made in money near four thousand dollars: in presents two thousand dollars—flowers and verses so many that I cannot tell you. Further, I have been asked by many of the first families, with whom I am well acquainted, to stay here in Mexico and to take the management of the Italian opera for the next season, which begins with the 15 Sept. up to March, 1857. I have also been furnished with the necessary money to engage first-rate artists in Europe. I have engaged the theatre, a chorus and orchestra, and will be in March in New-York, and then to Europe.

Advertisements.

Boston Music Hall Association.

THE Stockholders of the BOSTON MUSIC HALL ASSOCIATION are hereby notified that the Annual Meeting of said Corporation will be held at the Music Hall on WEDNESDAY, the 11th day of June, current, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.
F. L. BATCHELDER, CLERK.
Boston, June 8, 1856.

Garcia's Complete School of Singing.

JUST PUBLISHED:—A Complete School of Singing, in which the Art is clearly developed in a series of Instructions and appropriate Examples, to which are added Exercises, written and composed by MANUEL GARCIA.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, 389, Broadway, N.Y.

(Imported from England)

NOVELLO'S COLLECTIONS OF GLEES, MADRIGALS, PART-SONGS, &c.

Novello's Glee-Hive.

A Collection of Popular GLEES and MADRIGALS, in Vocal Score, with ad. lib. Accompaniment for Piano-forte. Complete in 8 vols. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt lettering. Price $2 each volume.

These volumes contain eighty-three of the best Glee and Madrigals by standard ancient and modern English composers. Among them will be found some of the finest Glee of Attwood, Calcott, the Earl of Mornington, Spofforth, Stevens, Webbe, &c. Each Glee and Madrigal is printed separately, at prices varying from 4 to 12 cents each.

Novello's Part-Song Book.

In One Volume, handsomely bound in cloth, with illuminated lettering.

This work consists of new Glee and Part-Songs, by the best modern composers—among others, Bishop, Benedict, Macfarren, Kimbault, Wesley, &c.—with reprints of some of the best Madrigals by ancient composers, and Part-Songs by eminent German composers, set to English poetry. Each Glee and Part-Song printed separately, at from 4 cents to 13 cents each. Vocal parts to the whole work, 25 cents each part; Vocal parts to separate Glee, &c., 8 cents per set.

Orpheus:

A Collection of Glee and Vocal Quartettes, by the most admired German Composers, with English Poetry.

This collection is principally for male voices. Twenty nine books, each containing about six Glee, in separate Vocal parts, with separate Piano-forte accompaniment, have been published, and the issue is continued—the new books being received by J. A. Novello immediately on their publication in London.—Price 88 cents each book.

The Musical Times,

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR,

PUBLISHED (IN LONDON) ON THE FIRST OF EVERY MONTH.

Containing ANTHEMS, CHORALS, and HYMNS, or GLEES, MADRIGALS, and ELKSIES, for One, Two, Three, Four, or more Voices. Price 8 cents each.

A Monthly Journal, containing original articles by EDWARD HOLMES, Author of the "Life of Mozart," &c.; Short notices of Singing-Classes, Concerts, &c.; Advertisements of new and important Musical Works; and, in addition, three or four pages of Music. The alternate numbers contain Music with secular or sacred words. Price 3 cents each, or post-free, 4 cents. Nos. 1 to 48, (Vols I and II.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 49 to 96, (Vols. III. and IV.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 97 to 144, (Vols. V and VI.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75. Either Vols 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, may be had separately, in paper covers, 75 cents each. Annual subscription to the Musical Times, 50 cents, post-paid.

J. A. NOVELLO,

No. 389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

THE GOLDEN WREATH.

A Choice Collection of Favorite Melodies, designed for the use of Schools, Seminaries, Select Classes, &c. Also, a Complete Course of Elementary Instruction, upon the Pestalozzian System, with numerous Exercises for Practice. By L. O. EMERSON. 24 pages. 16mo. Bound in boards, leather back. Price, 25 cts.

This is a new book, and judging from present appearance, will be the most popular work of its class published. There is an exceeding aptness about the instructions, and an attractiveness in the melodies that will at once commend it to all for whom it is designed.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

ED. B. ROBINSON, PIANO-FORTE TUNER.

Orders received at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington Street.

NEWS' PATENT AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE, Manufactory, 379 Washington Street, BOSTON, MASS.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER,

WILL be happy to give instruction in Piano-forte and Organ playing, and the Theory of Music. Address:—No. 8 Hayward Place. May 26. 17

P. F. DODGE,

MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE, TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.

Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE INSTRUCTION on the PIANO-FORTE, And may be addressed at her residence, 55 Hancock St.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 232 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD, TEACHER OF MUSIC, 265 Washington Street, Boston.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S

Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 219.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 14, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 11.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.
OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St.
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row,
A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway,
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by
JOHN S. DWIGHT, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court
of the District of Massachusetts.]

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Translated from the French of Madame Hubert, for the Journal of Music.

CHAPTER XII.

THE HEIRESS.

In fact, I found my friends really frightened at my non-appearance. The kind Volabù had sought me in the surrounding country, and was on the point of going out again. I felt these poor people were already true friends to me. I told them that I had chanced to meet one of the dwellers in the castle, in whom I recognized an old acquaintance. Mother Peirecote, learning that I had passed the evening at the castle, overwhelmed me with questions, and seemed quite disappointed when I told her that I had seen nothing extraordinary there.

The next day, at nine o'clock, I returned to the chateau, telling my host that I might spend a few days there and that he must not be anxious about me. Celio came to meet me.

"Ah! you have slept," said he, looking, as they say, into the whites of my eyes.

"I own it," answered I, "and it is the first time for many a night. I felt wonderfully tranquil, as if I had reached the real object of my life, whether happy or miserable. If I am to be happy here through you all, or to suffer on the part of some of you, I care not. I feel new strength for joy or sorrow."

"So you love her?"

"Yes, Celio! and you?"

"Well, I cannot answer so decidedly. I believe I love her, and yet I am not sure enough of it to confess it to a woman whom I respect above all others, and whom I even fear a little. So I can see myself supplanted in advance, faith so easily triumphs over uncertainty."

"According to her woman's nature," answered I, "it may be the contrary. A sure conquest has less charm for her sex than a conquest to be made. So, shall we be friends?"

"Do you think so?"

"I ask you. But it seems to me that our parts are marked out distinctly enough. If I should find you really infatuated and but little given you in return, I should withdraw. I do not know how to behave like a rascal with any man, much less with one who trusts in my honor; but since you have not reached that point, our chances are equal."

"How do you know that I have no hope?"

"If you were loved by such a woman, Celio, I esteem you enough to believe that you would not endure my presence here; and you know I only need a confidence from you to that effect to go away forever; but as I really believe yours is only a fancy, and that Mademoiselle Boccaferri is too proud to be satisfied with that, I shall stay."

"Stay then, but I warn you that I shall play as closely as you."

"I do not understand that expression. If you love her, you have only to tell her so, like me, and she would choose. If you do not love her, I do not see what game you can play with a woman whom you so respect."

"You are right; I am a fool. I am even half afraid of being stupid. Well, then, let us still be friends. I love you, although I feel a little mortified in finding you my equal in frankness and resolution. I am hardly used to that. In the world in which I have lived until now, almost all men are faithless, insolent or cowardly in affairs of gallantry. Woo Cecilia then; I will see how things come on. We will promise but one thing; that is, to keep each other informed of the results of our attempts, to spare him who fails from being ridiculous. Since we both desire marriage, the purest and most discreet thing in the world, the honor of the lady does not demand that her choice should be kept secret. As for all the small ways used in like cases by the most upright people, misinformation, calumny, rallery, or at least malice towards a rival whom they wish to supplant, I will not speak in our treaty. It would be injuring us both."

I agreed to all that Celio proposed, without looking forward or back, and without even foreseeing that the execution of such a contract might possibly raise terrible difficulties.

"Now," said he, leading me into the vast and superb castle court, "I must begin by conducting you into the presence of our marquis." Then he added, laughing, "for you could not have asked seriously with whom we were all staying?"

"If I did ask a foolish question," answered I, "it was with the best faith in the world. I was too bewildered and delighted to find myself among you, to trouble myself with anything else; and in coming here I was not even disturbed by the idea that I might be indiscreet or unwelcome in the house of a person whom I did not know. From the life you lead here, I did not even expect to see him to-day. By what name and under what pretext are you going to introduce me?"

"Oh, you are very amusing!" answered Celio, making me ascend a spiral staircase, covered with a winding carpet. "This is a mystification which we might persist in, but you are too sincere about it to be imposed upon."

Speaking thus, he opened the folding door of a circular room, which was used as an office by the marquis, and cried aloud:

"Eh! my dear Marquis of Balma, here is Adorno Salentini, who persists that you are a myth, and will only be convinced at the sight of you."

The marquis, coming from behind the screen which surrounded his desk, advanced to greet me with outstretched hands, and I burst out laughing at my simplicity.

"The children thought," said he, "that you were joking; but I saw well that you could not believe that the old unfortunate Boccaferri of Vienna, the facetious Leporello of last night, and the Marquis of Balma were one and the same person. All may be explained in a few words. The follies of youth were mine. Instead of correcting them and thus reforming me, my father banished and disinherited me. My baptismal names were Pierre Anselme Boccaferri. That name of Iron mouth belongs to the younger members of our family, as that of Chrysostomo, or Golden mouth, belongs to the elder ones. I took it for my surname, altering it a little, and lived as you know, erring and unfortunate in all my undertakings. I did not lack courage nor wit to keep out of trouble, but I was a man full of illusions, like any man of imagination. I did not care enough for obstacles. All crumbled down upon me just when, full of genius and pride, I was bringing the keystone to my edifice. Then, overwhelmed with debt, pursued, obliged to flee, I went to hide elsewhere the shame and despair of my failure; but as I am not to be easily discouraged, I sought a false strength in wine, and after I had reached a certain point of intoxication, or drunkenness, if you choose to call it so, and my heart and imagination were warmed, I undertook something new. So I have been very generously called low and brutish in a thousand places, without doubting in the least that from my own taste I should be the soberest man in the world. It needs but three things to so disgrace a man in public opinion: to be poor, to be in trouble, and to meet a creditor as you are coming out of a drinking house.

"I was too proud to ask anything of my brother after his first refusal. I was generous enough to save his blushes by not taking my name again or talking of him and his avarice. I was even rather pleased to forget my patrician birth, that I might make surer the artistic life for which I was born. Two angels aided me unceasingly and consoled me in everything—Celio's mother and my daughter. All honor to their sex! Their hearts are larger than ours!

"When I was at Vienna two months since with Cecilia, I received a letter which made me leave immediately. I had secretly kept up an affectionate friendship with a lawyer of Briançon, who had charge of my brother's affairs. In this letter he told me of my brother's hopeless state. He knew there was no law by which he could disinherit me. He besought me to come to his house, and entertained me until the death of the marquis, which took place two days after, without one single word of affection or remembrance of me. He had but one fixed idea, the fear of death; he did not care then who should succeed him.

"After I came in possession of my title and my estates, thanks to the advice of my worthy friend, the lawyer of Briançon, I kept concealed and let people believe me dead; I discovered my new position to no one, and I remained shut up, as if concealed, in my castle, without revealing the name by which I am known elsewhere. I shall continue to do so until I have paid all the debts contracted in fifty years; so that when they say: 'That old beast of a Boccaferri has become a marquis and worth four millions,' they may also add: 'After all, he was not dishonest, for he has defrauded no one, not even his friends.'

"I own that I had never lost all hope of regaining my liberty and honor in thus acquitting myself. I did not rely upon my brother's inheritance. He hated me so much that I could have sworn that he would have found some way of despoiling me after his death; but, always an artist and a poet, I never ceased flattering myself that my undertakings would be crowned with success at last. So I never made a debt or a bankruptcy without taking account of the sums and the circumstances of the affair. In my later years, as I became more and more wretched, I drank more, and might easily have lost or disarranged these papers, if Cecilia had not collected and kept them with great care.

"So now we are trying to reinstate ourselves. My daughter and I consecrate to this work an hour before breakfast every morning. While our lawyer at Briançon sells some of our estate and prepares for the final settlement, we carry on our correspondence under the name of Boccaferri, and we seek our creditors in every place where we have lived. There are but few who do not answer our calls. Those who favored me, meaning to do it without return, are also repaid in spite of themselves. In a month I believe our difficult labor will be over and our task accomplished, and then shall the truth be known about me. A very considerable fortune will be left to us, which I hope we shall use well. If I followed my impulse, I should give freely, without caring to whom; but I have lived too much with idlers and debauchees, I have had too much to do with impostors of all sorts, not to know that some distinction should be made. I owe my assistance to bad heads, but not to bad hearts.

"Besides, my dear daughter has taken the control of all my fortune, that I may commit no more follies. She too will have her own generous follies, but they will not be senseless or injurious. Here," said he, drawing back two folds of the screen, which hid half the table, "look; behold the woman whose heart and conscience are above all others! Nothing disheartens her; and that artist soul forgets itself in the office of book-keeper, that she may save her father's honor."

We saw Cecilia bending over the desk, writing, arranging, sealing and folding with great rapidity, heedless of what she heard. She was pale with fatigue, for this two-fold life of artist and administrator was wearing out that frail and generous being; but she was calm and noble, like a true lady of the castle, in her green silk dress. I noticed that she had actually cut off all her long black hair. She had gladly made the sacrifice, that she might more easily take the part of a young man, and this hair, curled around her neck and face, made her look like a young artist in the Renaissance school. She had too much sadness in her face to remind one of the cunning page or the lordly child of a noble house. Intelligence and pride sat upon her pure brow, while from her quiet and modest look one might think she had given up all claims to genius, all dreams of glory.

She smiled upon Celio, gave me her hand, and then closed the screen to finish her work.

"Now you have our secret," began the marquis. "I could not confide it to better hands. I did not wait a single day without sharing it with Celio and Floriani's other children. I owed so much to their mother! But with money alone I could never repay her, as she did not aid me with money merely; she helped and sustained me with her friendship, and mine belongs to what remains of her, these beautiful and noble children, who are henceforth mine. Floriani only left a moderate fortune, and divided between four, it would not give great advantages of education to them all. Since Providence has given me the means, they shall have elbow room in life, and I gathered them about me immediately, here to stay until they are able to venture upon the great stage of life as artists; for it is a noble destiny, and whatever sphere they shall each choose, they will all study the synthesis of Art with me.

"Excuse this vanity; it is an innocent one in a man who has succeeded in nothing and who has not entirely failed in his personal attempts. I believe that through my reflection and experience I have at last reached the knowledge of the true and the beautiful. I do not deceive myself; I am only good as an adviser, and yet I am not a professional professor. I am sure that nothing can be made without material, and that teaching is only useful to those richly endowed by nature. I have the happiness of having scholars of natural genius, who could do well without me; but I know that I can shorten their delays, guard them from certain errors, and can soften the trials to which their intelligence must make them liable. Already I guide Stella's soul. I feel the pulse of Salvator and Beatrice more delicately; and as for Celio, let him answer if I have not discovered to him resources in himself of which he was ignorant."

"Yes, it is true," said Celio, "you have taught me to know myself. You have brought back my pride and killed my vanity. It seems to me that you and your daughter are making another man of me. I believed myself envious, harsh, revengeful and pitiless; I was fast becoming wicked, because I aspired to it; but you have cured me of that dangerous folly and made me look into my heart. I should not have done it for morality's sake, but I did it for the sake of Art. I have found out that it is from here (striking his breast) that true talent comes."

I was deeply touched. I listened to Celio with emotion; I looked at the Marquis of Balma with admiration. He was a different man from him I had known; even his features seemed changed. Could it be possible that he was that old drunkard, stumbling over the steps of the theatre, stopping people to bore them with his vague and prolix theories, and scented with an unbearable odor of rum and tobacco? I saw before me a man well cared for, erect, clean, of fine and noble figure, his eye sparkling with genius, his beard well trimmed, and his hands fair and delicate. With his superb linen and his velvet wrapper lined with sable, he looked to me like a prince giving audience to his friends, or better than that, like Voltaire at Ferney; but no, it was still better than Voltaire, for his lips wore a fatherly smile and his heart was full of tenderness and candor. So true is it that a man needs good fortune, that poverty degrades an artist, and a miracle is necessary to keep him from forgetting the knowledge of his own dignity.

"Now, my friends," said the Marquis de Balma to us, "go and see if the other children are ready for breakfast. I have one letter more to finish with Cecilia, and then we will join you. Will you promise me now, Monsieur Salentini, to pass a few days at least with me?"

I accepted joyfully; but no sooner had I left his room than I sadly recollected myself.

"I actually believe I am a fool since my arrival here," said I to Celio, stopping him in a gallery adorned with family portraits. "All the while the marquis was telling his story and explaining his position, I only thought of rejoicing to see that at last his own and his daughter's merit were rewarded by fortune. I did not remember that this change in their life gave me a terrible and irremediable blow."

"How so?" said Celio, astonished.

"Do you ask me?" answered I. "Don't you know that I loved Cecilia Boccaferri, a poor cantatrice, with three or four thousand francs a year? and it was allowable in me, who gained much more, to think of making her my wife; while now, how can I aspire to the hand of Mademoiselle de Balma, a great heiress, without seeming ridiculous and really being despicable?"

"And shall not I be despicable also to aspire to it?" asked Celio, shrugging his shoulders.

"No," answered I, after a moment's reflection. "Although you are no richer than I, I think, your mother did so much for the poor Boccaferri that the rich Balma must always consider himself your debtor; and then your mother's name was glorious; Cecilia has vowed adoration to that great name. So you have a thousand reasons to present yourself without shame or fear. If I could conquer the one, I should only feel the other more; so, my friend, pity me a great deal, console me a little, and do not consider me as your rival any more. I shall stay here one day longer to prove my esteem, my respect, and my devotion; but I shall leave to-morrow, and strive to forget. The feeling of pride within me and the knowledge of my "duty will help to sustain me. Keep the secret of my confidences to you, and never let Mademoiselle de Balma know that I have presumed to aspire to her hand."

[To be continued.]

Memoir of Dr. Crotch.

The author of the "Elements of Musical Composition," was born at Norwich, in 1775. His father, who was a carpenter in that city, having fortunately a taste for, and love of, music, had built himself an organ, and this led to the discovery and development of the extraordinarily precocious genius of his son. When the boy was little more than two years old, his mother, to quiet him, placed him at the organ, where he amused himself by pressing down the keys; and, on the experiment being repeated the following morning, he succeeded in playing, of course from memory, God save the King, which he had heard and noticed the day before. So remarkable an instance of precocity naturally attracted the attention of many lovers of the Art, and, among these, Dr. Burney appears to have closely investigated the case, which he made the subject of a paper published in the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society for the year 1779.

Dr. Burney occasionally tested young Crotch's powers by requiring him to add a bass to a subject played by himself, and has left on record the following specimen of the child's successful efforts of this kind, and his power at that early age of

Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony.

The upper line contains the subject as played by Dr. Burney, and the lower, the bass, which the child, who was then not four years old, of his own accord, added to it.

Daines Barrington, who has also left an interesting paper on the subject, states that he heard the boy, when only three years and a half old, play God save the King, and the Minuet de la Cour, almost throughout with chords. At another interview, he exhibited the utmost readiness in playing the above mentioned minuet in any key which was called for, concluding with the remote one of F sharp major, then seldom or never used. His talent was not confined to music. Dr. Burney states that he appeared possessed of a general intelligence beyond his age, and had discovered a genius and inclination for drawing nearly as strong as for music; and when music subsequently became his profession, the sister art of painting continued through life one of his favorite recreations.

When between eleven and twelve years of age, he acted as deputy-organist for Dr. Randall, at the chapels of King's and Trinity Colleges, and the University Church of Great St. Mary's at Cambridge, where he was then residing. He here composed an Oratorio, called the Captivity of Judah, which many years afterwards was performed at Oxford, but of which only a few movements have ever been published. He then removed to Oxford, and entered on a course of study with the intention of entering the Church.

Circumstances having changed his plans, he resumed the Profession of Music, and took his Bachelor's Degree in 1794, and that of Doctor in 1799. In 1800 he delivered a Course of Lectures in the Music School at Oxford, which were afterwards published by Messrs. Longman and Co., together with three volumes of specimens in illustration of these lectures, now published by Messrs. Cramer and Co. He was afterwards appointed Lecturer on Music at the Royal Institution; and, in 1823, he became Principal of the Royal Academy of Music. His works as composer and arranger are numerous, but his reputation in the former character rests principally upon his oratorio of Palestine. His peaceful, virtuous, and useful life, closed 29th December, 1847.—[From Novello's Edition of Dr. Crotch's "Harmony," etc.]

(From the London Times, May 12.)

Madame Alboni.

Having secured Madame Alboni as his prima donna for the opening of the season, Mr. Lumley most wisely commenced with Rossini's Cenerentola. Even in the days when that great artist almost exclusively adhered to the contralto line of character, in which she has had no rival since Pisaroni—of whom she is the worthiest successor—"Cenerentola" was always one of her favorite parts. No contralto voices could ever be compared to Alboni's in quality and extent of register. The unexceptionable purity of the head-notes, and the exquisite manner in which they blended with the natural tones, so as to make the whole range appear as if it had no break, were the results of persevering application and consummate art. By these means she was enabled to execute the florid mezzo soprano music of which Rossini has produced the most striking examples in his Barbiere and Cenerentola, with as much ease to herself as pleasure to her audience. But, since leading parts of this description are rare (scarcely, indeed, to be met with out of Rossini's operas), and, like all great artists, Alboni was ambitious, she soon got tired of being confined within a limited sphere, and applied herself to study the varied, and more frequently "dramatic," repertoire of the soprano. Seven years had sufficed to put to the best uses the instruction and advice she obtained from Rossini at Bologna (in 1844), and to raise Alboni in her own department to so high a position that further progress in the same direction was impossible. Besides ambition, however, there was doubtless another motive power impelling her to the step she contemplated. It is notorious that a prima donna, in modern times, can only claim the highest rank and emoluments if she has a soprano voice. A contralto may be a prima donna, but not "assoluta;" and who, knowing anything about the musical theatres of Europe, can be unaware that the soprano not only takes precedence of others, but pockets by far the largest salary? Alboni now determined to make a bold experiment. She had awakened the enthusiasm of the Parisians, who, with the instance of Jenny Lind to confute them, persist in believing that no reputation is solid unless Paris has endorsed it. But this was at the Italian Opera, in her own repertoire, and at the Grand Opera, in concerts. Alboni wisely declined to make her first appeal in a new language before so formidable a tribunal. She tried the provinces first—then Belgium, and then Holland. This was in 1849. At Rouen and Bordeaux, at Antwerp, Liège, Ghent, and Brussels, at Amsterdam, and the Hague, she alternately appeared as Leonora in Donizetti's Favorita. Her success was triumphant. The verdict of these lesser Courts was soon ratified by the French metropolis, and in a remarkable manner. Madame Viardot Garcia, who had "created" the part of Fides in the Prophète, was absent from Paris. Ever solicitous about the continuous run of his operas, the anxious Meyerbeer was no indifferent witness to the new successes of Alboni; and in May, 1850, connoisseurs were startled by the announcement that the popular contralto was engaged for 16 representations of the Prophète at the Grand Opera. Perhaps, there was never more general anticipation of a fiasco; but it is equally true that seldom has anticipation been so agreeably deceived. The Fides of Alboni was unanimously praised—not as a copy of her accomplished predecessor, but as a conception of her own. Even now that six years have passed away, Fides remains the character in which the Parisians most admire Alboni. During that interval Alboni has twice visited London—in 1849 and 1851. In both years she made her réentrée with Cenerentola—which, it will be remembered, she had first essayed at the Royal Italian Opera in 1848. Carrying out her new plans, even upon the Italian stage, Alboni added to her own special list of parts the soprano rôles of Ninetta (La Gazza Ladra), Zerlina (Don Giovanni), Norina (Don Pasquale), and Cherubino (Le Nozze di Figaro)—delighting amateurs of Mozart's music by singing the beautiful melodies of Zerlina and the Page without injuring their character by transposition. (She had already played Cherubino at Covent-garden, transposing both the airs.)

The five years elapsed since this great artist last appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre have been chiefly divided among the Italian Opera and Académie Impériale of Paris, the operas of Madrid, Lisbon, and Brussels.* Her fame has augmented, and it is only just to say that she sings still better than before. The full rich quality of her lower tones may possibly have suffered a little from her constant performance in operas composed for soprano; but their purity remains untouched, while the range of characters has been materially extended. Alboni's method is the old and true Italian method, of which no one possesses the secret so thoroughly. She never strains or forces, and therefore can never damage, her voice. She never sings Verdi, and thus has no inducement to rant. She has remembered, in short, the counsels of Rossini; and 13 years of a very arduous professional life have left her with a style and mechanism incomparably correct, a voice as fresh and unimpaired as at the beginning of her career.

To return to the opera of Saturday. No part is better suited than Cenerentola to display the peculiar resources of Alboni. The quaint romance of the first scene—Una volta c'era un re—is as charming for simplicity of expression as for its grateful truth of intonation. She sings this as she sings everything—without pretence or affectation, leaving the melody to make its own impression. The final scene of Act I., where Cenerentola comes on in a veil at the Prince Ramiro's ball, presents a specimen of genuine largo di bravura in the broad and graceful delivery of which Alboni has no competitor. But the greatest exhibitions of vocal skill are of course in the largo, Nacqui all'affanno and the rondo, Non più mesta, upon which the curtain drops. The beau idéal of expressive singing, of brilliant and unerring execution, is exemplified to admiration in these movements. Such stately melody, such flowing, natural, and graceful ornament as are combined in the former died when Rossini abandoned composition; and it is a pleasant thing, in this age of vocal degeneracy, to hear them from the lips of such a singer. As an example of prodigious fluency, the rondo, by Alboni, was never surpassed, most probably never equalled. No instrument could be more perfect; while from no instrument could such sweetness of tone be made to accompany enunciation so rapid. In this rondo Alboni solves the problem which is the despair of most bravura singers; her scales, ascending and descending, are equally true, equally at command. The ancient masters of Italian song were wont to insist that the most important task for a singer was to master the scale, which when done half the battle was gained, but, undone, left everything to be acquired. Alboni has taken them at their word. Hence the facility with which she accomplishes the most extraordinary tours de force, and the seeming unconsciousness, while doing her very best, that she is doing anything difficult, which alone carries with it an indefinable charm.

On Saturday the reception of Madame Alboni was of the most enthusiastic kind. An attempt was made to encore Nacqui all'affanno, and,

* Why omit all mention of one year (1852-3) spent in the United States?—Ed.

though the audience did not gain their end it was not for want of hearty good will. The great vocalist was reserving herself for Non più mesta, and when this brilliant performance was achieved, the general delight was such that its imperiousness was not to be resisted. The curtain rose again, wreaths and bouquets were flung upon the stage, and the dazzling aria was executed once more, the fair vocalist holding in her hand a large laurel crown that had illustrated her wondrous success.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

ART AND LOVE.

FROM THE GERMAN OF STERNAU.

Where Art its little cottage builds,
There Love must also tarry,
And where the sun Art's temple gilds,
There Love his throne must carry.
'Tis Love alone, 'tis Love alone,
That e'er on Art below hath shone,
To give it light from heaven.

They move together, hand in hand,
Two stars of wondrous beauty,
And next his kindred orb to stand
Each feels his loving duty.
Attached in bonds that cannot die,
United to eternity
Are Art and Love forever.

And Art without Love's golden dream
Is like a starless heaven,
A fairy-land, to whose bright realm
No beauteous queen is given.
'Tis Love alone, yes, Love alone,
That e'er on Art below hath shone,
To give it light from heaven.

J. C. D. P.

New York Academy of Music.

The financial state of the New York Academy of Music seems to be far from encouraging. The New Yorker has the following account of an important meeting of the stockholders last week, which shows the true position of affairs:

The meeting was largely attended, and there was evidently a disposition on the part of the most interested parties to face all the difficulties of the concern in the bravest manner. The immediate occasion of the present crisis is a mortgage (the second) on the building for $50,000, the interest of which became due on Saturday. A considerable portion of this $50,000, and also of other sums was advanced by two gentlemen whose patronage of the opera has brought them frequently before the public—and who have in one way or another advanced or lost together nearly $100,000 in the cause. For many reasons—a love of Art amongst others—they are anxious of seeing the Academy of Music on a better footing, and perhaps they are desirous, also, of being paid at least a portion of their disbursed capital. The principal proposition on Saturday was to this effect: that a special loan of $150 on each share be demanded from every stockholder, to be made without security and without regard to repayment. This would realize $30,000, enough for present necessities. If the shareholders consent to this arrangement (which is scarcely probable) all will go smoothly. If not, the Academy of Music will be foreclosed and put up to public auction for the amount of the mortgage. The mortgagees will then have the property almost in their own hands, for it is probable that the original shares can be purchased by them at auction for a trifle less than they originally cost. The shareholders have until the 15th of June to deliberate on what course they will take. So far as the public is concerned, there is nothing to be apprehended from their decision. The Academy will not, under any circumstances, fall into infidel hands, but will faithfully be preserved to Art and the purposes for which it was erected.

Another topic was broached, and discussed with considerable warmth, and as it affects the public mind more nearly than the question of possession, we refer to it. This was, whether the shareholders should be entitled to reserved seats for every performance. According to the charter, they are only entitled to admissions. It was contended (as we have ourselves contended, over and over again) that the reservation of two hundred of the best seats in the house is a gross injustice to the impresario, and sure to draw on him the disfavor of the public. If the shareholders supported the Opera, that is to say, paid for it as a private amusement to which the public was admitted as a rare but inexpensive privilege, it would be a different thing. But they do not. On the contrary, the shareholders expect not only amusement, but profit from their investment in the original stock, and as events show, are very unwilling to contribute in the smallest degree towards the promotion of either. It is nothing but fair, therefore, that they should give up their seats, and fall back on their admission right only. If they need a secured seat, let them pay fifty cents for it, as the stockholders of the Boston Theatre do. The present arrangement is intolerable. The other night, when the house was densely crowded by people who had paid for their admission and had no seats because none were to be sold, nearly all the shareholders' chairs, (the best in the house,) were vacant. A thing of this kind exasperates the public, and makes any management, however good, unpopular. Concerning the future management of the house, one thing is certain—there will be no more amateurism. Mr. Payne is negotiating with the stockholders for the sale of his properties, &c., which he values at $9,000. They cost him $15,000, and originally $25,000. Mr. Payne, it is reasonable to suppose, is going out of the business. Max Maretzek seems at present to be the most likely lessee. He has offered to take the house for three years, at $22,000 per annum, provided the shareholders will give up their demand for reserved seats—not otherwise. He would display much less wisdom than we give him credit for, if he consented to take the lease on any other terms.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

A new opera by M. HALÉVY, called Valentine d'Aubigny, the libretto by MM. MICHEL CARRE and JULES BARBIER, has been produced at the Opera Comique. The Paris correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune gives the following analysis of the plot:

The action takes place early in the XVIII. century, and the curtain rises on an inn at Fontainebleau. A handsome young fellow enters the bar-room; Gilbert de Mauléon comes from the Cevennes, and is on his way to Paris to marry M^{lle} Valentine d'Aubigny, a young orphan to whom he was affianced when he was fifteen, and as he has not seen her for ten years, he could not recognize her. He believes Valentine lives with an old man, who is a sort of protector to her. He meets in the inn a singular fellow, named the Chevalier de Boisrobert, (MOCKER) a half-crazy adventurer, who begins by ridiculing Gilbert's horse, and at last laughs at Gilbert himself, who does not allow this liberty, and in an instant swords are crossed, but as they are about to fight, breakfast is brought in, and Boisrobert proposes that the duel should be postponed until after the coffee. While they are at the table they talk; Boisrobert explains that he has run off from Paris that he may not be obliged to marry Sylvia, a fashionable actress, to whom he has been so imprudent as to give his note of hand promising marriage under a penalty of a thousand louis. He is just then desperately in love with a young girl he met the day before in the inn. Of course this young girl is Valentine d'Aubigny, whom Gilbert is on his way to Paris to find. Her protector is dead, and she is on her way to her family. She (M^{lle} DUPREZ) enters the room; Gilbert does not recognize her; Boisrobert attempts to make love to her, but Gilbert defends her, and for her the duel is about to take place, when the arrival of Sylvia puts an end to it. She summons Boisrobert to marry or to pay; she is anxious he should do one or the other, for she has bet a thousand louis to her comrades that she will be married in a month, and she does not want to lose her money. Boisrobert proposes to her to marry Gilbert, and tells her his story. What, M^{lle} D'Aubigny! she has disappeared, her uncle is dead, and I have purchased her mansion. Admirable! exclaims Boisrobert; take her place and marry Gilbert. He presents Gilbert to her; Gilbert falls at her feet. Boisrobert next counsels Sylvia to take the real Valentine (he does not know who she is) into her service. Valentine soon discovers there is some plot and penetrates its secret. The scene then changes to Paris, and we find Sylvia really in love with Gilbert, and he really in love with—the person who sings for him some familiar Cevennes airs and writes him candid, affectionate letters—Valentine, the true Valentine. Sylvia begins to feel that her love, ardent as it is, is not the love a person like Gilbert requires, and she resolves to discover the deception to him; but before she does so, Gilbert learns the secret from Valentine, and they are married.

This opera is somewhat like L'Eclair, where, though he had no chorus and no "grand combinations," he contrived to sustain the liveliest musical interest for three acts, with no resource except two tenor and two soprano voices. You know that for a long time M. Halévy imitated M. Meyerbeer's manner, and was prone to sacrifice melody and clearness to scientific combinations. His recent efforts indicate a growing admiration of M. Rossini, and this new score exhibits this change of his manner more than any of the others. It is very successful.

At the Grande Opera also Halévy maintains his popularity. His Reine de Chypre and La Juive have drawn of late almost as well as anything else. Nothing new has been brought out at that theatre, but M. BILLETTA's new opera, La Rose de Florence, is in rehearsal. Mme. MARIE CABEL takes her congé at the Opera Comique this month; her place is supplied by Mme. UGALDE, who has just recovered from serious indisposition. VIVIER's concerts appear to have been the musical events of the gay metropolis. The first of them is thus described—doubtless as characteristic a picture as any of musical life in Paris:

It took place in Erard's rooms, before a numerous and fashionable audience, notwithstanding the absence of several aristocratic diplomats, whose early attendance at the bal of the Ottoman Embassy was a necessity. The concert began with an organ solo, executed by M. Lebeau, followed by a charming barcarolle, composed by Vivier and sung by Gueymard. M^{lle} Dussy sang an air from the Pré aux Clercs (violin obligato, M. Le Cieux,) and Vivier then made his appearance and played his Adagio Religioso, as only Vivier can play it. The witty cornist was enthusiastically applauded both on his entrée and after his performance. La Mélancholie, another clever composition by the beneficiaire, was sung by M^{lle} Dussy, and Madame Massart played the overture to Guillaume Tell, arranged for the piano-forte by Liszt. Madame Viardot then sang the finale from the Sonambula in her well known artistic manner, and M^{lle} Dussy and M. Gueymard interpreted the quaint little duet by Vivier, Madeleine et Mathurin, in a satisfactory manner. Madame Viardot sang some Spanish airs, and Madame Massart played two piano-forte solos by Schulhoff and Alkan. The two other pieces played by Vivier were his beautiful elegy, La Plainte, for voice and horn, (the voice part sung by Gueymard,) which was enthusiastically encored, and his marvel of marvels, La Chasse, in which double, triple and quadruple notes, held all the time he is playing bravura passages, quite astonished and delighted the audience, who applauded it unanimously. The great cornist was immensely cheered after this extraordinary performance, and he was obliged to return and repeatedly bow his acknowledgements. Among the audience were M. Rouher, (minister of public works) M^{me} Guizot, Duchâtel, Lamartine, Auber, Berlioz, Halévy, Adam, Chérad, Rey, Théophile Gautier, Guinot, Hippolyte Lucas, Achard, &c. Rossini alone, owing to his illness, was unable to attend.

VIENNA.—One of the most brilliant concerts given for a long time was that of LEOPOLD DE MEYER, which took place, on the 27th ult., in the Rooms of the Musikverein. There was not a single vacant seat. The most successful pieces performed by Herr von Meyer were his Andante Religioso, his Fandango, Ernani Fantasia, and Invitation à la Polka. He was called for several times in the course of the evening.

ITALY.—The following is a list of the new operas produced in Italy during the Lent season of 1856:—Pietro d'Abano, at Venice, at the Teatro Fenice, by Sig. APPOLLONI. Margherita Pusterla, at the San Carlo at Naples, music by Sig. PACINI. L'Assedio di Leida, at the Scala at Milan, music by Sig. PETRELLA. I Fidanzati, at the Carlo Felice at Genoa, music by Sig. PERI. Caterina Segurana, at Nice, music by Sig. RIFETTO. I Romani in Pompejano, at the Teatro Grande at Trieste, music by Sig. ROTA. Manuela, at the Teatro Nuovo at Naples, music by Sig. SARRIA. La Vergine di Kent, at the Teatro Regio at Turin, music by Sig. VILLANIS.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. In the first week of May GRISI made her twenty-third "first appearance for the season," or "rentrée," as the French call it. Pit and galleries of the Lyceum were full. The opera was Norma. The audience was cold throughout Casta Diva, and until the famous denunciation of Pollio: Ah, non tremare, when the fire of the great lyric actress made itself acknowledged, as it did always on this side of the water. Her second act in Norma is still pronounced unrivalled. The part of Pollio was taken by TAMBERLIK, "the first on our stage (says the News) to raise the character from its normal condition of maudlin insipidity." Mlle. MARAI was Adalgisa, and Sig. TAGLIAFICO the high priest.

May 10. The piece was Rossini's Conte Ory, his second best comic opera, which bears the impress of his matured style, having been produced but a year before his William Tell. The Times says:

Madame BOSIO nowhere shines to greater advantage than in Il Conte Ory. The cavatina of the first act, Soffrir penare ognora, which opens with a largo as stately in its lengthened phrases as any in Semiramide, was sung with admirable ease and purity by this accomplished lady. The first movement showed how thoroughly she had studied the Rossinian style of declamation; and the cabaletta, Buon Eremita, charmed even more by its fluent and dazzling execution. Mme. Bosio was supported with the utmost ability by Signor GARDONI (whose impersonation of the Count ranks with his most successful efforts), and, on the other hand, by Mlle. MARAI, one of the prettiest pages imaginable, and the best Isolero we remember, either on the French or Italian stage. With three such competent artists the concerted music, in which Il Conte Ory abounds, could hardly have gone badly; and we may cite the duet between the Count and Isolero (when the dissolute nobleman, disguised as a hermit, detects a competitor in the person of his own retainer), the duet with the Countess (when the Conte Ory, as a female pilgrim, obtains shelter from the storm in the castle of that unprotected female), and the Mozartean trio (where the Count, in the dark, mistakes the page for the lady, and unwittingly bestows caresses on his rival), as performances wholly beyond criticism, the credit of which, moreover, was equally divided. The other characters, too, were very efficiently represented, more particularly Ragonda, the keeper of the castle, by Mme. NANTIER DIDIEE, who was praised in high terms on a former occasion, and was not less deserving of eulogy now. Signor TAGLIAFICO, as the impudent Raimbaldo, displayed his accustomed flow of exuberant spirits, and sang the famous aria descriptive of his adventures in the wine-cellar (a veritable "patter-song in the buffo style," with capital points and humor. Nor must M. ZELGER's amusing impersonation of the Preceptor pass unnoticed. The scene of the pilgrims caused unusual hilarity; and the careful scrutiny of Mme. Didiee, when Ragonda with a lighted candle comes to ascertain the wants of all those false deceivers, was a quiet but irresistible piece of comedy, to which the mock solemnity of the preghiera (an exquisite specimen of vocal harmony), sung by the feigned religieuses, kneeling, brought an additional zest. All the music went well. The zeal of the chief singers was seconded in an extremely satisfactory manner by the chorus and by the orchestra (under the able direction of Mr. COSTA), which has rarely been played with more delicacy and point. The finale to the first act, one of Rossini's happiest and most ingenious compositions, was perfectly executed throughout. The magnificent unaccompanied sextet—"Oh terror! oh smania! oh pena!" (forming part of it), which follows up the discovery of Conte Ory, through the instrumentality of his unconscious Preceptor, was encored unanimously; and never was such a compliment more richly merited. In short the performance was altogether good; and we are much mistaken if the Conte Ory does not become popular with the habitués of the Royal Italian Opera. Such genial, elegant, and beautiful music—united to a libretto which, however fantastic and improbable, is decidedly entertaining—ought to please any audience, and more especially when executed with such unflagging spirit and vivacity. The mise en scène—like everything hitherto presented at the Lyceum—is complete and appropriate.

May 14. MARIO's first appearance, in Lucrezia Borgia. He was indisposed; so was RONCONI, who should have been the Duke, and whose place was supplied by Herr ZELGER. The audience found their compensation in GRISI, who "was grander than ever in Lucrezia, and sang both for herself and for Mario." The Times says: "Grisi can never fail to triumph, since, in her, the desire to please is a chronic affection. No contretemps can abash, no unforeseen calamity quench the fire that burns within her. Such artistic natures are as rare as they are precious." And to this all American opera-goers will say Amen! DIDIEE too is praised as "the best Maffeo Orsini since Alboni." On the 19th Lucrezia was again given, Mario and Ronconi both having recovered. Of course a splendid performance.

May 23. Verdi's Rigoletto. Gilda, Mme. BOSIO; Maddalena, DIDIEE; the Duke of Mantua, MARIO; Rigoletto, RONCONI. The quartet: Bella figlia dell'amore, by those four, is said to have been beyond criticism. Mario's La donna è mobile was encored as usual; and Bosio, the Times says, surpassed all her previous efforts.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. May 10. The attraction of the opening night was Mme. ALBONI in Cenerentola. An account of her triumph will be found in another column. The other triumph of the evening was gained by Sig. CALZOLARI, a tenore d'agilità, distinguished in the latter seasons of Her Majesty's, where he originally came out in 1849 as Elvino in La Sonnambula, when JENNY LIND took "six farewells." The part of Dandini was taken (in the illness of BELLETTI) by our brave old BENEVENTANO. The News praises his good nature in taking up the part at three hours' notice, and adds:

In person—being large and heavy—he was not well fitted for the bustling, impudent valet; but he showed himself well acquainted with the part, acted it with spirit and intelligence, and sang the music admirably, having a fine and powerful baritone voice, and evidently a sound knowledge of his art. His merits were recognized, and he will not have reason to regret his praiseworthy conduct.

Sig. ZUCCONI, who made his debut as Don Magnifico, is pronounced "one of those basses who, without any great volume of voice, rely chiefly on the eccentric humor of their action." Sig. BONETTI, the new conductor, gave good satisfaction, and Mr. LUMLEY, the manager, was called out with warm greetings.

On the 16th Alboni appeared as Rosina in "The Barber of Seville," with BELLETTI as Figaro. Their duet: Dunque io sono, is said to have been a most perfect piece of Rossinian singing. CALZOLARI was Almaviva, and ZUCCONI Doctor Bartolo. On the 20th, ALBONI had another triumph, in her soprano character, in the Sonnambula. CALZOLARI was Elvino: and the burly BENEVENTANO "acted with ease and dignity" as the Count Rodolfo. Mlle. RIZZI, a seconda donna of uncommon merit, was the Lisa.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. At the third concert Beethoven's 7th Symphony was performed, under Dr. WYLD, with more energy and fire than delicacy, according to the Times. There were three overtures: Weber's "Ruler of the Spirits," Mendelssohn's Melusina, and Mozart's Zauberflöte. Mme. CLARA SCHUMANN played a piano-forte Concerto of ROBERT SCHUMANN's in A minor. The Times critic says:

She played the music of her husband as if she had composed it herself. The profound sympathy she must entertain for it is easy to understand; but the difficulties it presents can only have been mastered with prodigious application. Many of the bravura passages are, indeed, utterly extravagant. These, however, appeared quite familiar to the gifted pianist, who came to her task not only with all the sentiment, but with all the manual dexterity required. Madame Schumann was loudly applauded at the conclusion of each movement of the concerto, and recalled to the platform at the end.

Mr. HOWARD GLOVER's "very characteristic and clever Cantata" of Tam O'Shanter, originally written for this society, was repeated with the same success as last year. Mlle. KRALL, a soprano of good voice, and also of intelligence and feeling, sang Und ob die Wolke, from Der Freyschütz, and an air by Gluck.

Miss ARABELLA GODDARD, the pianist, has returned to England after a long and brilliant tour upon the Continent, and gave a concert at Hanover Square Rooms May 16th. She has returned, it is said, one of the very finest pianists in Europe. She played Mozart's Concerto in D minor, Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata (with ERNST), and Mendelssohn's Rondo in E flat.... A brilliant series of afternoon concerts is in progress at the Crystal Palace, which has accommodations for seating four thousand persons comfortably. The programmes are of a miscellaneous and fashionable order, comprising overtures, solos, duets, scenes, &c., from favorite operas, Italian, French and German. Mmes. GRISI, BOSIO, JENNY NEY, DIDIEE, and MM. MARIO, GARDONI, FORMES, and all the principal singers and orchestra (of nearly one hundred) of Mr. GYE's Opera company are the performers. Conductor, M. COSTA.... M. BENEDET's annual concert, with its interminable programme, took place May 21st. Mme. JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT was the great attraction. She sang (with BELLETTI) a duet on Styrian melodies, arranged by Benedict; the scene and aria: Squallida veste, &c., from Il Turco in Italia, and a French duet, by Meyerbeer, with Mme. VIARDOT. Viardot sang the old air, Verdi prati, from Handel's "Alcina." REICHARDT sang a romanza by the Duke of Coburg. Messrs. OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT and BENEDET played a Concerto of Bach for two pianos. There were long extracts from Benedict's Minnesinger; there were overtures, instrumental solos and duets, and what not.... Another "monster concert" was that given by Mr. BODDA at Exeter Hall. The programme consisted of five and thirty pieces of music, and contained the names of thirty-eight artists, including Mme. CLARA NOVELLO, VIARDOT GARCIA, RUDESDORFF, Miss ARABELLA GODDARD, Miss DOLBY, Herr FORMES, &c. But even the English are getting weary of such long programmes, and there are already symptoms of reform in that regard.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 14, 1856.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of the Stockholders took place at the Hall on Wednesday. By the Treasurer's report it appeared that the net earnings for the year past have been $2,049 23, and that the Hall has been kept in good condition and improved. The thanks of the Association were voted to Mr. PERKINS for his munificent gift of the statue of BEETHOVEN. The utmost harmony prevailed in the meeting, as particularly shown in the action on the important project to which we have before alluded, for procuring for the Hall a grand Organ, "equal in calibre, in power and in quality, to the famous specimens which have for so many years elicited the admiration and wonder of travellers on the continent of Europe." By the unanimous vote of those present, representing 734 shares (out of 1,035), it was decided that such an organ should be placed in the hall. Its estimated cost is about $25,000. The stockholders voted an appropriation of $10,000, on condition that another $10,000 should be raised by private subscription. Of this, $6,000 are already subscribed. The remaining $5,000 may be derived from concerts to be given at the opening of the instrument, and afterwards. But the Directors' report, in urging the matter, assures the stockholders that this latter sum is guaranteed—by (as the Transcript states) "the gentleman to whose energy and perseverance the success of the plan thus far is due."

Another portion of the Directors' report relates to a matter about which there has been not a little unpleasant controversy; and sets the question so completely at rest, that we gladly avail ourselves of the liberty of copying the entire passage:

"To an Association of the nature of ours there are other and higher interests than its business prospects merely. Having for its objects the rearing of a temple in which Music might find its full and perfect expression, it is fitting also that it should furnish to Art, in all its highest forms, a permanent abode. It is with feelings of peculiar pleasure and of pride that we allude, in this connection, to the princely act of Mr. Perkins in his presentation of the noble statue of Beethoven; which a short time since was welcomed with musical honors to its appropriate place.

"And since, unfortunately, the question has been publicly mooted, it may not be inappropriate to state here, once for all, that in the intention of Mr. Perkins, as expressed unequivocally to the Board of Directors, this statue is a gift to the Association, to be by them retained and possessed so long as their hall shall retain its original character, with this reservation only—that in case the building should ever be sold or diverted to purposes foreign to the designs of its founders, then is the statue to be removed to some place of security, till such time as another music hall shall be constructed to receive it. Thus it stands, as it is meet it should stand, the guardian in no small measure, of our chartered rights, and the hope of Art in future years.

Of the work itself, we cannot speak in terms of too much praise. Conceived and created by an artist of world-wide fame, successfully cast by a master the most cunning of his handicraft in Germany, passing the ordeal of criticism before kings and a great multitude of dilettanti from his own land, fêted and honored, and publicly crowned in the art-loving city of Munich, it comes to us the recognized embodiment of the breathing soul and spirit of Beethoven. In the expressive language of the inaugural poem :

Art hath bid the evanescent pause and know no more decay ;
Made the mortal shape immortal, that to dust had passed away.

Hail, to-day, this seed of promise, planted by a generous hand ;
Our first statue to an artist—nobly given, nobly planned :
We can only say, Great Master, take the homage of our heart,
Be the High Priest in our temple, dedicate to thee and Art.

A benefaction, it is indeed, on the part of the generous giver, which demands, and should receive our gratitude and our warmest thanks."

The old Board of Directors was unanimously reëlected, consisting of Messrs. J. Baxter Upham, Charles C. Perkins, Robert E. Apthorp, George Derby, H. W. Pickering, Ebenezer Dale, and E. D. Brigham.

A Grand Organ for the Music Hall.

By the report above given of the meeting of the stockholders, it seems now as good as certain that the one thing wanting in our noble Music Hall is to be supplied. We are to have an Organ, on the grandest scale, the best (it is designed) that the Old World can make, one of those wonders of the world, to which men "maken pilgrimages," as to the famous Haarlem and Freyburg organs. This project has been conceived and matured by the same indefatigable friend of music, to whom the Music Hall itself, especially its acoustic plan, is in a great measure due, and whose agreeable "Reminiscences" of travel and descriptions of great organs and organ-builders whom he visited in Europe, have added so much interest to our columns. The appeal for $25,000 for this object had a startling sound at first, and it of course cost no little time and argument to convince our music patrons that the idea was not visionary. But they have been convinced. Over six thousand dollars has been actually subscribed by individuals, mostly in small sums. The stockholders, with a jealous eye to the improvement of their property, and the securing of the Hall to its true end of Art, have accepted the plan, and appropriated $10,000. The rest comes easily. To show what reasons weighed in uniting the votes of the stockholders, we present the following extract from the report of the committee, which has kindly been placed in our hands.

It is the consideration of a plan, having for its object to place in the Boston Music Hall, at no distant day, a Grand Organ, equal in calibre, in power and in quality to the famous specimens which have for so many years excited the admiration and wonder of travellers on the continent of Europe. Just such an instrument the capacity of our hall will allow and requires. Without it, its beautiful architecture will always be incomplete, and its acoustic qualities fail to reach their full perfection.

Of the influence of such an instrument upon the interests of the Association, the value can hardly be estimated. It would place this hall at once, in point of attraction, immeasurably above that of any other institution of the kind in the land, and every year, and at all seasons of the year, we see no reason to doubt, would draw as many pilgrims to its shrine as do the world-renowned organs at Haarlem, and in the Church of St. Nicholas at Freyburg. To the city and to New England it would be an object of just pride, and to the public would prove a source of the purest enjoyment, and an inculcator of a taste for music, in its highest and holiest forms, for many generations to come.

The subject is one which has at times engaged the attention of each succeeding Board of Directors since the founding of the building. The period has now arrived when they would most respectfully but earnestly urge it upon the notice of the stockholders, and bespeak for it the good will and patronage of the Association.

And in the consideration of a matter so important, it seems particularly desirable to set our standard of excellence high—to be satisfied with nothing inferior to the greatest and the best. Since we are providing for a work that shall stand, it is to be hoped, not for decades only, but for centuries of years.

It must be admitted that a structure, such as is here contemplated, cannot be had without the expenditure of a large amount of funds. But for this expenditure we shall look for adequate results ; and in the long run, it is emphatically true in the history of organ building, that the instrument composed of the best materials, and constructed in the most thorough and substantial manner in all its parts, and by consequence of a superior cost, has been found to best subserve the interests of a real economy.

The Committee who have had this matter in charge have been able, by personal observation and investigation among the most celebrated manufactories in Europe, both in England and upon the Continent, to obtain an abundance of facts bearing upon the subject. The total cost, as thus determined, of such a work as they would recommend, will not fall far short of the sum of $25,000. But it is not proposed that the Music Hall Association shall in this case defray the whole expense of the work.

The plan which, after mature deliberation, suggested itself to the minds of the Directors as most feasible and proper, was this : that the Corporation appropriate the sum of ten thousand dollars towards the enterprise, on the condition that an additional ten thousand be raised by private subscription ; the remaining five thousand or such portion of it as may be required, shall be guaranteed without expense to the Association. The hall is then to receive the use and possession of the organ, and derive all the pecuniary benefits therefrom, so long as it shall remain a Music Hall, in return for its permanent care and custody of the instrument.

Acting upon this plan, and as a test of the popularity and probable success of the measure, a subscription, based on the ultimate action of this body, has been going on for some time past, and with the most gratifying results. More than one half the sum proposed to be raised in this manner has already been secured, and all substantial and reliable names. It is a list we are proud to show, as furnishing an additional illustration of the liberality of our citizens in everything which tends to the education and refinement of the community, as well as for objects of pure philanthropy.

This appeal was followed up by cogent arguments from the Hon. George S. Hillard, G. P. Putnam, Esq., and others, so that no doubts remained. To procure such an organ, will be no small work. The subscriptions and appropriation have been made with the understanding that the organ is to come from Germany,—most probably from the famous establishment of the Messrs. WALCKERS, of Ludwigsberg. Their specification and estimate, compared with others from the best German, French and English makers, are thought on the whole to promise best both on the score of quality, economy, and durability. It may take some two or three years to get the whole glorious fabric completed. It is hoped that the contract will be made this summer, after careful consultation with the best German organists.

A few persons have declined subscribing on the ground that such an opportunity should be offered first to our own enterprising and skilful native builders. We may look with just pride on the organs built by our Boston and New York makers. But we are comparatively young in this department ; we are but beginning to be a musical people. Yankee skill and confidence are great ; but how many of our native organ-builders have been abroad to see what has been done there ? Is it not natural to suppose that Germany, the musical land par excellence, the home of great organs and great organists for centuries, the land of Bach and Mendelssohn and Schneider, should possess the art of organ-building in the greatest perfection ? There the organ-builder is an artist as well as a manufacturer. The testimony of travellers and musicians is in favor of the German, French and English organs. The German organs have grown sweet and rich with time. They were made to endure ; their builders built for Art and for long ages. Even on the score of economy, owing to the cheapness of labor and long practice, it is found that the German organ will come several thousand dollars cheaper than one on the same scale made here.

It can do no harm to anybody to have among us a master specimen of European organ-building. If our builders can surpass it, what a monument and triumph it becomes for them ! If it shall have excellencies to which they have vainly aspired, then how incalculable its value as a model and incentive to more earnest well-directed effort on their part. In either case, music among us will be sure to be the gainer. But we can only touch upon the matter now.

Italian Opera.—The Vestvali Troupe.

A better opera than we had any right to expect at this time of the year, is that which Mlle. VESTVALI has organized for a few nights at the Boston Theatre. In the three operatic concerts, by which she felt the pulse of the public last week, her quartet of principals, all new to us except herself, made so good an impression as to warrant the importation of a chorus from New York, and the performance of a few familiar operas, suited to a small company, in full. The concerts were doubly tedious by the length and miscellaneous composition of the programmes. We found half of one of them enough for an evening, and in that time were satisfied of the rare powers of the tenor, Sig. CERESA, and the abundant competency of the soprano, Signora MANZINI. In VESTVALI, it is chiefly the charm of person, the splendid physique, the dashing, manly air in contralto male parts, which ensures applause. As Arsace, as Orsini, and we doubt not as Romeo, she takes the eye and satisfies the many. Her voice, rich and musical in parts, is more equal than it was, and yet far from equal ; and for artistic style in singing, of which she has not much, she makes up by a certain easy, generous abandon.

On Wednesday night we had Ernani entire, and certainly one of the best performances of it that we remember. It was so long since we had heard it, that we listened again with some little freshness of interest in the music. Surely this is more than we shall ever say of Trovatore. The burden of the opera was sustained by the tenor, Sig. CERESA, awkward as he is in manner, acts in earnest. His voice surprised all. It is a rich, sweet, ringing, powerful tenore robusto, of great compass, taking every note with ease and certainty, trained to clear and effective execution of the difficult Verdi passages, and sustaining itself without any sign of weariness to the end of such a trying part. Indeed, in this last particular we do not remember his equal. He expends himself always without stint, and yet has power for every crisis, and plenty of power left at the end. He is the man for Verdi's music ; we doubt if he have the fineness for Mozart or Rossini.

Signora MANZINI has a very pure, well-trained soprano, of not great power, yet adequate to what she attempts. Her execution is clean and finished, and her style good. Without much inspiration, there is an earnest way with her which wins respect and pleases. She commands some very pure, silvery highest notes. Her Elvira showed a fair dramatic talent. GASPARDONI, our old friend, made an excellent Silva, so far as he could disguise himself, which is impossible to those roguish eyes of his. But he is a good singer, and his rich round bass is always true. Signor BARATINI is a baritone of good power in the tenor region, rather spasmodic in his delivery, by turns weak and over-loud, and addicted to a strange way of now and then prolonging a tone beyond all sense or comeliness, as if simply to show how long a note can be held out. He is tall, gaunt and nervous, and evidently has been ill for some time. The orchestra, led by Sig. NUNO, was fair, not so overwhelmingly brassy as sometimes in Verdi's operas. The chorus, not very numerous, was effective on the male side, but rather feeble and forlorn on the female. Most of the ensembles, however, especially the Carlo Magne finale, were made quite effective. The plaudits and recalls were warm and frequent.

New Music.

(Published by Geo. P. Reed & Co.)

1. The Water Lily. Song by ROBERT FRANZ. 25 cts.
2. The Young Pianist's First Waltz. By G. B. WARE.
3. Il Balen del suo sorriso. Aria from Il Trovatore. By VERDI. 9 pp.
4. Che farò senza Euridice. Cavatina from GLUCK'S Orfeo. 25 cts.
5. A te, mio suolo, Ligure. Romanza from MERCADANTE'S Il Bravo. 25 cts.

No. 1 is the first of six songs by ROBERT FRANZ, which Messrs. Reed & Co. propose to issue. We hail it as the first beginning of a most excellent service to Art in our country, that, namely, of putting into the hands of those who have soul and voice to sing them, some of the incomparable songs of a composer to whom we have called considerable attention of late. This one, called in English "The Water Lily," is the sweet, pensive, dreamful Andante to GEIBEL'S charming little poem, Die Lotosblume.—The German and English words are given. It is one of the easiest of the Franz songs to sing and accompany.

No. 2 is simplest of the simple, and pretty enough.

No. 3 is the popular baritone air from the Trovatore, one of the series issued under the auspices of Sig. BENDELARI, with words Italian, and English by C. J. SPRAGUE.

Nos. 4 and 5 are of the ninety and odd pieces included by the publishers under the head, "Songs of Italy." That by Gluck was better known to our fathers and mothers (those of them that were musical,) than it has been in our day. It is one of the immortal melodies, and we hereabouts owe much to Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS for reviving it at her concerts, and proving once more that it goes to the hearts of all. It is here set in C, so that the voice never goes above E.

No. 5 is for soprano, or mezzo soprano, a rather taking sentimental melody.

(From Nathan Richardson.)

1. By the Stream a youth was Sitting. Ballad. Words by SCHILLER; Music by WULF FRIES. 25 cts.
2. Yes, thou art like the flower of May. Song, by FERD. HILLER. 25 cts.
3. Six Album Leaves, for the Piano, by STEPHEN HELLER. 13 pp. 60 cts.

No. 1 is a song of not a little tenderness and delicacy of feeling. The accompaniment shows refinement. The free movement of the bass and middle parts several times betrays the violoncellist's fondness, and is in refreshing contrast with the humdrum common-chord accompaniment of so many songs. The words, Schiller's Jüngling am Bach, are happily Englished by the Rev. JOHN WEISS, to whom the piece is dedicated.

No. 2. Is this the famous Ferdinand Hiller? At all events, a very graceful, pleasing song.

No. 3. These "Album Leaves" are among the easier of Heller's always refined and artistic writings for the piano. We can recommend them without reserve.

We are disappointed in not receiving the remainder of the article on the "Original Manuscript of Mozart's Requiem" in time for this week's paper. We hope to give it next week. We find we were mistaken in supposing it a new discovery. The Leipzig Allgemeine Zeitung, we see, contains a notice of Herr von Mosel's pamphlet as early as the year 1841. Strange that it escaped the notice of Oulibicheff, whose book appeared several years later! It would have saved him the labor of reviewing the controversy, and proving, so ably as he has done, by internal evidence, the absurdity of the claim set up by and for Süssmayer to the authorship of a large part of the Requiem.

Musical Chat-Chat.

Our neighbor of the South Boston Mercury, speaking of operatics, has a good hit on the subject of "Complimentary" tickets. He suggests a correction in the spelling of the term; "for certainly, under the present system of holding back until every decent position on the floor is sold, and then filling up the house by magnanimously distributing the refuse seats, the sense of the word will be improved by spelling it complémentary.".... In our summary of "Music Abroad" it will be seen that our old friend LEOPOLD DE MEYER has been concertizing in Vienna and playing "his" Andante Religioso.—Query: Is it the same one which he palmed off for his own in Boston, but in which the initiated were surprised to recognize a well-known work of Thalberg's? The trick would hardly be a safe one in Vienna.... There is now in this city a German lad of ten years, who, if all we hear of him be true, (and we hear it from the most reliable sources) must be a very prodigy of musical executive talent. He plays many of Bach's fugues, including some of the most difficult, from memory, both on the piano and the organ, reads difficult music at sight, &c., and has no small skill on the violin. Such extraordinary talent cannot be too sacredly cherished and directed in right ways. But of course it is too early to determine whether it is to end in mere machine playing, or whether there is soul and genius underneath and yet to be developed. The boy is named PERREAU, a connexion, as we understand, of the well-known pianist who has long resided here. He has been living for some years, with his father, who is a teacher of music, in Dover, N. H.... The MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY have elected their officers for the ensuing year as follows; President—James D. Kent (re-elected.) Vice President—Wm. B. Merrill. Financial Secretary—N. Broughton, Jr. Recording Secretary—Wm. B. Bonner. Treasurer—John Albree, Jr. Librarian—Wm. F. Smith. Directors—Alden Spense, Samuel J. M. Homer, Jerome W. Tyler, Washington Warren, Carlos Pierce, Wm. S. Baker, James W. Bailey.

We hear pleasant reports in private circles of a Soirée Musicale given last week at her residence by Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE, with her young lady pupils. Upwards of a hundred guests were present, consisting of their relatives and friends. Flowers, music and bright faces made fairer summer than the east wind without. The pieces were of various grades of difficulty, from such masters as Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Weber, Hummel, Dohler, &c., including solos, duets, quartets, &c., played singly, or with several players on a part. Among other things the programme contained the overture to Fidelio as a duet, the overture to "Tell" as quartet, and a Sonata duo by Mozart. All speak highly of the accuracy and style of the performances, especially of the unity and precision where several pianos were played at once. Mlle. de Lamotte is reaping the reward of her indefatigable industry and skill as a teacher.

We have news from ALFRED JAELL. He seems to be moving from one success to another, loaded with gifts and honors. After leaving Berlin, where our correspondent wrote us such pleasant accounts of him in November, he took part in orchestral symphony concerts in Hamburg, Bremen, Brunswick, Hanover, &c., where he played Concertos of Schumann, Beethoven, &c., and a manuscript Concerto by Liszt, extremely difficult of course, which everywhere created much sensation. In January he gave concerts in Amsterdam, the Hague, Utrecht, Rotterdam, Leyden, and other cities of Holland. The King of Holland presented him a costly diamond ring. The King of Hanover presented him two costly diamond rings, (!) one after playing at his court concert, and one for the dedication of one of his compositions (which, by the way, count up to Op. 58!). At Leyden, as he was leaving Holland, the "Studenten-Gesellschaft" escorted him with carriages to the railroad station, and he received the diploma of honorary member from the society called "Sempre Crescendo." At Hanover again he played on the occasion of the Queen's birthday, when he was named Court Pianist to his Majesty, which title and engagement oblige him to go every winter for a certain time to Hanover. After concertizing at Frankfort on the Maine, Hanau and Cologne, he assisted at the Düsseldorf Festival in the second week of May. Jaell writes with enthusiasm of the orchestral and chorus performances at that Festival, under the "perfect" direction of JULIUS RIETZ, especially that of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and Mendelssohn's "Elijah." Our happy young pianist intends to pass the summer at the German watering places and in Switzerland.

Opera is probably more an institution in New Orleans than in any of our Atlantic cities. A population so French naturally takes Paris with it; and a good French company, performing operas, both French and Italian, is always to be found there in the winter season. The Picayune sums up the season as follows:

M. BODOUSQUIE has brought this very successful season to a close, and now resorts to Europe to reconstruct his corps operatique for next year. We are pleased to learn that of those artists who are highly popular favorites here, he has already secured the services of the fascinating Colson, the ruling prima donna of the late season, and JUXCA, the superb basso.

The rage, during the winter, has been for comic opera, rather than, as in several seasons preceding, for grand opera. The reason of this is to be found in the accession to the troupe of the highly accomplished artiste we have already named, Mme. Colson. The operas in which she has appeared have been decidedly the most popular, and to the management, we should judge, the most profitable.

Of grand operas during the season just closed, we have had the "Huguenots," "Robert le Diable," the "Prophet," and the Etoile du Nord, of Meyerbeer, the "Juive" and "Reine de Chypre" of Halévy; the "Jerusalem" of Verdi; the "Norma" of Bellini; the "Martyrs," "Favorite," "Lucrezia," and "Lucia," of Donizetti; and the "Moïse" and "Comte Ory" of Rossini.

Of comic operas, the "Domino Noir," "Fille du regiment," "Si j'étais Roi," Les Amours du Diable, "Ambassadrice," "Les Noces de Jeanette" and "Gille le Ravisseur." Those we have italicized have been the most popular and productive performances of the season, thanks to Colson, who has appeared in them all.

M. Boudonsquie has given us a very good company, taken as a whole, though it is susceptible of improvement in some particulars. Mme. Laget-Planterre, Mme. Colson, Mme. Gambier, Mme. Du-laurens, Mme. Richer, Messrs. Duluc, Crambade, Junca, Delagrave, Laget, Graat, Colson, Dutasta, Debrinay, Chol, Carrier, Mathieu, and others we might name, compose a stronger company than is known in any regular operatic and dramatic theatre out of Paris; and they have given us operas, put superbly on the stage, and accompanied by one of the best orchestras in the world, in a style that would do honor to any theatre on either side of the Atlantic.

Still another new musical paper makes its appearance on our desk this week. It is called "The Flower Queen" and is published monthly in Chicago, Ill. Each number consists of eight pages, of about our own size, closely filled with short editorials, selections, advertisements, &c., all on the subject of music. WILLIAM C. WEBSTER is the editor, and the Messrs. HIGGINS BROTHERS, publishers. Its object, as set forth in the editor's introductory, is "the advancement of the cause of Music, in its widest, broadest, noblest sense, not only in our large and increasing popular city, but throughout our State and the vast West." The vast West surely needs the humanizing influence of music, especially when sham Democracy and Slavery are so active to demoralize and drag us back to barbarism. Therefore success to "The Flower Queen"! Among the topics to which it proposes especially to call attention, the following are named:

The prominent obstacles to the advancement of Sacred Music; the practical benefits of Oratorical Singing to Psalmody; how far do good performances of Sacred Music depend upon the ability to read music at sight; the cultivation of Secular—does it conduce to the advancement of Sacred Music; the best means of sustaining competent teachers in our Churches; the best means of diffusing musical knowledge, popularly considered; the advantages arising from Quartette Choirs; the teaching of Music as a legitimate branch of education; the best methods of teaching Sacred Music; the best methods of piano forte instruction; the holding of Musical Conventions as tending to the promotion of the cause.

JOHN BUNYAN'S FLUTE.—The flute with which Bunyan beguiled the tediousness of his captive hours is now in the possession of Mr. Howels, tailor, Gainsborough. In appearance it does not look unlike the leg of a stool, out of which, it is said, that Bunyan, while in prison, manufactured it. When the turnkey, attracted by the sound of music, entered his cell to ascertain, if possible, the cause of the melody the flute was replaced in the stool, and by this means detection was avoided.

An editor says it has cost him a week's toil "in the pursuit of knowledge under difficulties," to discover that the quotation, "A harp of a thousand strings," is from Dr. Watts, and that that of "Spirits of just men made perfect," is from St. Paul.

In one of his hymns, Dr. Watts has this couplet, alluding to the human organization:

"Strange that a harp of a thousand strings, Should keep in tune so long."

In the Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews, chapter XII, verse 23, occurs the other quotation.

Advertisements.

WANTED.

A SITUATION as Organist, or Organist and Conductor, is desired by a Gentleman, who can give the best of references. Address H. H. B. at this office.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

☞ Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S COLLECTIONS OF GLEES,
MADRIGALS, PART-SONGS, &c.

Novello's Glee-Hive.

A Collection of Popular GLEES and MADRIGALS, in Vocal Score, with ad. lib. Accompaniment for Piano-forte. Complete in 8 vols. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt lettering. Price $2 each volume.

These volumes contain eighty-three of the best Glee and Madrigals by standard ancient and modern English composers. Among them will be found some of the finest Glee of Attwood, Calcott, the Earl of Mornington, Spofforth, Stevens, Webb, &c. Each Glee and Madrigal is printed separately, at prices varying from 4 to 12 cents each.

Novello's Part-Song Book.

In One Volume, handsomely bound in cloth, with illuminated lettering.

This work consists of new Glee and Part-Songs, by the best modern composers—among others, Bishop, Benedict, Macfarren, Rimbaud, Wesley, &c.—with reprints of some of the best Madrigals by ancient composers, and Part-Songs by eminent German composers, set to English poetry. Each Glee and Part-Song printed separately, at from 4 cents to 18 cents each. Vocal parts to the whole work, 25 cents each part; Vocal parts to separate Glee, &c., 8 cents per set.

Orpheus:

A Collection of Glee and Vocal Quartettes, by the most admired German Composers, with English Poetry.

This collection is principally for male voices. Twenty nine books, each containing about six Glee, in separate Vocal parts, with separate Piano-forte accompaniment, have been published, and the issue is continued—the new books being received by J. A. Novello immediately on their publication in London.—Price 88 cents each book.

The Musical Times,
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR,
PUBLISHED (IN LONDON) ON THE FIRST OF EVERY MONTH.

Containing ANTHEMS, CHORALS, and HYMNS, or GLEES, MADRIGALS, and ELEGIES, for One, Two, Three, Four, or more Voices. Price 8 cents each.

A Monthly Journal, containing original articles by EDWARD HOLMES, Author of the "Life of Mozart," &c.; Short notices of Singing-Classes, Concerts, &c.; Advertisements of new and important Musical Works; and, in addition, three or four pages of Music. The alternate numbers contain Music with secular or sacred words. Price 3 cents each, or post-free, 4 cents. Nos. 1 to 48, (Vols. I. and II.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 49 to 96, (Vols. III. and IV.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 97 to 144, (Vols. V. and VI.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75. Either Vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, may be had separately, in paper covers, 75 cents each. Annual subscription to the Musical Times, 50 cents, post-paid.

J. A. NOVELLO,

No. 389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Garcia's Complete School of Singing.

JUST PUBLISHED:—A Complete School of Singing, in which the Art is clearly developed in a series of instructions and appropriate Examples, to which are added Exercises, written and composed by MANUEL GARCIA.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

Apr 29 MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

ED. B. ROBINSON,
PIANO-FORTE TUNER.
Orders received at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington Street.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER,
Will be happy to give instruction in Piano-forte and Organ playing, and the Theory of Music. Address:—No. 8 Hayward Place. May 28. 1f

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
☞ PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE
—GIVES—
INSTRUCTION on the PIANO-FORTE,
And may be addressed at her residence, 55 Hancock St.

CARL HAUSE
OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
365 Washington Street, Boston.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S
Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

☞ A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature,
Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. ☞ Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line 10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line 5 cts.
For one column, (128 lines) first insertion $12.00
Do do each subsequent $6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 220.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 21, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 12.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 232 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 12 Tremont Row, "
" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by
JOHN S. DWIGHT, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court
of the District of Massachusetts.]

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Translated from the French of Madame Dubeaut, for the Journal of Music.

CHAPTER XIII.

STELLA.

Celio was about answering me, when Beatrice came running through the gallery and jumped upon his neck and frolicked around us, asking me very roguishly if I had yet been introduced to Monsieur le Marquis. A few steps farther on we met Stella and Benjamin, who besieged me with the same questions; the breakfast bell rang loudly, and Hecate, who was very excitable, echoed this signal with a shrill bark. The marquis and his daughter came last, serene and kind, like those who have been doing their duty. There I saw how much the girls adored Cecilia, and how much respect she inspired from the whole family. I could not help observing her, and even when I did not look at her nor listen to her, I saw all her movements, heard every word; and yet she did and spoke but little; but she was attentive to all that could please her friends. Any one would have said that she had always been an heiress, she was so easy and tranquil in her opulence; and it was easily seen that she did not care for it on her own account, she was so careful to supply the least want and gratify the slightest wish of others.

At breakfast the drama was not talked about. Not one word was said before the servants, which could make them suspect anything of the kind. No thanks to Beatrice, whose little head was full of it, for she began to talk about the night before and the night to come; but Stella, who sat beside her and governed her like a young mother, checked her words. When breakfast was over, the marquis gave his arm to his daughter, and they left the room.

"Now they are going to busy themselves about something else," said Celio to me. "They devote this part of the day to the wants of the people around us; they listen to the petitions of the poor, the claims of the farmers, and answer all invitations. They see the curé or his assistant; they direct the laborers, and even consult about the sick; in fact, they fulfil their duty as lord and lady with as much regularity and conscience as possible. Stella and Beatrice take charge of the household matters within. As for me, I generally read or study music, and since the arrival of my brother, I give him lessons; but to-day he must go and practice billiards by himself. I want to talk with you."

He led me into the garden, and pressing my hand affectionately, said to me:

"Your sadness grieves me, and I cannot witness it much longer. Listen, my friend: I had an evil thought; when you told me an hour ago that you would renounce Cecilia from delicacy, I was about telling you that such seemed your duty, and was to encourage you to leave. I did not do it; but even if I had, I should have taken it back now. You are too scrupulous, or else you do not thoroughly understand Cecilia and her father. They have never ceased to be artists in becoming noble. The alliance of talent like yours could never seem below their station. It would be impossible for them to suspect you of ambition or avarice, for they know that two months since you were in love with the poor cantatrice, with only three thousand francs a season, and you thought seriously of marrying her, without blushing for the old drunkard."

"Do they know it? Did you tell them, Celio?"

"I told them the very day that you confided it to me, and they were deeply touched by it."

"But they refused because on that same day they received the news of their inheritance?"

"No; even when they had read the news they did not refuse. They said: 'We will see.' Then, although I was moved myself, I had the courage to keep the promise I had almost given you. I began to speak of you again."

"And what did she say?"

"She said: 'I am so grateful for his kind intentions towards me, at a time when I was poor and obscure, that if I was decided to marry at all, I should endeavor to see and know more of him.' And then, as I told you, we went secretly to Turin, a few days since, upon business for her father and to bring back Benjamin. When there, I studied with some anxiety the effect produced upon her by the story of your amours with the duchess. She was sad a moment;—that I know. You see, my friend, I conceal nothing. I offered to go and bring you secretly to our hotel. She saw I was angry, and said no, for she is kind to me as an angel, kind as a mother; but she suffered much, and when, the next night, we passed by your door on foot, on our way to our carriage, as we did not wish it brought round to the hotel, we saw your coachman, and recognized Volabù. We avoided him, as we did not wish to be seen; but Cecilia had a woman's happy thought. She told Salvator (whom the man had never seen) to go to him and ask him if his carriage would go to Milan.

"Indeed," answered he, 'I am going to Milan, but I can take no one.'

"Whom are you going to drive?" said the child. 'Cannot I make some arrangement with your traveller to allow me to accompany him?'

"No; he is a painter, and travels alone."

"What is his name? perhaps I may know him."

"The driver gave your name; that was all we cared to know. We had been told that the duchess had returned to Milan. Cecilia grew pale, pretending that she was cold; then, as I spoke of it in a low voice, she smiled upon me with sovereign sweetness and drew near your window, saying:

"You shall see what a friendly and disinterested farewell I will give him."

"Then she sang that cursed Vedrai carino, which saved you from the clutch of Satan. There is a fate in all this! I believe she loves you, although it is always hard to read a person so thoroughly mistress of herself, and so accustomed to self-denial that one can seldom imagine what she suffers in sacrificing. Just now she knows nothing different about you, and I must confess that I am not courageous enough to tell her that you have renounced the duchess and that you owe your safety to her. I promised not to injure you, but it would be pushing heroism beyond my powers to woo her for you. Still I must tell you the truth, and there you have it all. Stay, then, or speak; wait and hope, or else act and settle the matter. At all events, you have all right to do it, and no one could suspect you of being in love with her millions, since even this morning you could not understand that the Marquis de Balma was father Boccaferri."

"Good and noble Celio!" said I, "how can I thank you? I don't know what to do. I think you love Cecilia as much as I and are more worthy of her. No, I cannot speak to her. I wish her to know and appreciate you in your new character. She must examine us, compare us, and decide. I have thought her in love with some one, and that may be you. Why should we hasten to know our destiny? Perhaps now she may even be undecided herself. Let us wait."

"Yes, it is true," said Celio, "we both run the risk of a refusal if we surprise her; and I am somewhat troubled because I was not in love with her at Vienna, and the idea never entered my head until I witnessed your love. I am a little afraid that she will suspect me of being mercenary, for I am more open than you to such suspicions. Time has not proved me, as it has you. On the other hand, the adoration she has for my mother, and which still rules all her thoughts, is naturally a strong reason for her to sacrifice her love to you, for fear of making me unhappy. Thus is this noble woman made, but I would not profit by such a sacrifice."

"That sacrifice," answered I, "might be quick and easy to-day. If she loves me, she has not loved me long enough to have become entirely selfish. I ask the help and counsel of time for my own interest as for yours."

"Well said," answered Celio; "let us adjourn. But first let us make this resolution: that is, that neither shall confess his love without telling the other beforehand; until then, let us talk no more about it, for it gives me pain."

"And me too. I submit to that agreement; but we shall not forbid each other's attempts to please her."

"No, certainly," said he.

He began to hum the romance from "Don Juan"; then he began to sing, and practised while walking up and down beside me, and stamping impatiently when his voice dissatisfied him.

"I am not Don Juan!" said he, interrupting himself, "and yet it is in my voice and destiny to be it on the stage. Diable! I am not a tenor and cannot play the tender lover. I cannot sing Il mio tesoro intanto with Rubini's cadenza. I must either be a bold scamp or an honest man, who only meets with fiascos. Who cares for power? After all," added he, passing his hand over his forehead, "who knows I am in love? Let us see!"

He sang Quando del vino, and sang it superbly.

"No, no!" cried he, self-satisfied, "I was not made to love. Cecilia is not my mother. Perhaps to-morrow she might love another better than me—you, for instance. Shall I be in love with a woman who does not love me? I should die of rage! I should not be angry with you, Salentini, but her. I would throw her down from her high castle to the pavement, that she might see how little I cared for her person or her fortune!"

I was frightened at the expression of his face, the old Celio I knew in Vienna was coming back and frightened and saddened me. He saw it, smiled and said to me:

"I believe I am getting wicked again. Come, let us join the others and this will pass off. Sometimes my nerves play me ugly tricks. Come, I am cold; let us go in."

He took my arm and ran in.

At two o'clock the whole family assembled in the large parlor. The marquis gave, as usual, orders to the servants not to disturb him until dinner time, except for some important reason, and then they must ring the castle bell to summon him. Then he asked the young ladies if they had taken the air and seen to the house, and Salvator if he had worked; and when each had accounted for the morning, he said:

"That is right; the first condition of liberty, of moral and intellectual health, is order in the details of life; but alas! to be orderly one must be rich. The unhappy never can know what they shall do in an hour's time. Now, children, vive la joie! The day of business and care is over; the evening of pleasure and Art has begun. Follow me."

He took a large key from his pocket and waved it in the air to the great delight of the children. Then we went towards the wing of the castle devoted to the theatre. They opened the ivory door, as the marquis called it, and we entered into the sanctuary of dreams, after having well locked and barred the door. The first thing was to arrange the theatre, restore order and neatness, collect and label the costumes, which had been hastily thrown down upon chairs the night before. The young men swept, dusted, mended the scenery, oiled the bolts, &c. The girls busied themselves about the dresses; all was done with wonderful precision and rapidity. Each one went to work with zeal and gaiety. When all was finished, the marquis called his brood around the great table which stood in the midst of the pit, and there they held council. They took down the manuscripts of "Don Juan" to study; they copied into them the personages of the night before and the scenes they had brought out; they talked over the distribution of the rôles once more. Celio returned to Don Juan; he begged that a few scenes might be sung. Beatrice and Salvator begged leave to improvise a pas de danse during the ball in the third act. All was granted. Permission was given to try anything, on condition that it should be decided beforehand, that it might be entered into the manuscript, so that the order of the performance should not be disturbed.

Then Celio sent Stella after several kinds of wigs with long hair. He wanted to make the character more gloomy, and his physiognomy also. He tried on a black wig.

"You are wrong in making yourself dark, if you wish to be wicked," said Boccaferri to him, (he took his old name behind the ivory door.) "It is a classic custom to make all traitors dark and with a profusion of hair, but it is a vulgar lie. Pale-faced and black-bearded men are almost always feeble. The true tiger is yellow and silky."

"Then let us take the lion's skin," said Celio, taking up the wig he wore the night before, "but I hate these red ribbons. They seem too much like the tyrant of the melodrama. Young ladies, make me up a quantity of flame-colored ones. That was the mark of a roué in Molière's time."

"If that is the case, give us back your cherry bow, your beautiful sword knot!" said Stella.

"What do you want of it?"

"I want to keep it for a pattern," said she, smiling mischievously, "for you made it, and you are the only one in the world who knows how to make bows properly. It takes you a long time, but what perfection! Don't you think so?" added she, addressing herself to me and showing me the same cherry ribbons I had picked up the day before. "How do you like them?"

The tone in which she asked the question, and her manner of waving the ribbons in my face, troubled me a little. It seemed as if she expected to see me seize them, and I had principle enough not to do it. Cecilia looked at me. I saw Stella blush; she dropped the ribbon and stepped upon it, as if carelessly, and pretended to laugh at something else.

Celio was brusque and imperious with his sisters, although he adored them from the bottom of his heart, and he performed a thousand little favors for them. He also had seen this singular little episode.

"Hurry, lazy ones!" cried he to Stella and Beatrice; "go and hunt up thirty yards of flame colored ribbon. I am waiting for them."

And when they had entered the store-room, he picked up the cherry bow and gave it to me privately, whispering:

"Keep it in remembrance of Beatrice; but if either of them try to play the coquette with you, correct them and laugh at them. I ask it as a brother."

The preparations lasted until dinner, which was rather serious. They reassumed their gaiety before the servants, who wore mourning for the old marquis for lack of it in their hearts. Besides, every one was thinking of his part, and M. de Balma said one thing which I have always found true: that ideas grow clearer and more fixed when our appetites are satisfied.

They ate quickly and moderately at the table. They said familiarly that the artist who eats a great deal is à moitié cuit. They sipped the coffee and whiffed cigars while the servants took off the cloth and made their final disappearance from the rooms of the house. Then they went the rounds and barred all the doors. Then the marquis shouted:

"Ladies, to your dressing rooms!"

They were allowed a half hour longer than the men; but Cecilia did not improve it. She staid with us in the parlor, and I observed her whispering in a corner to Celio. It seemed to me, when this conversation was over, that Celio was full of arrogant delight and Cecilia of resigned sadness; but that did not prove anything. His emotions were always exaggerated, and hers were shown so little that the shade was almost unnoticeable.

At eight exactly the play began. I fear I should become tiresome if I followed it in all its details; but I must observe that to my great surprise Cecilia was admirable and exquisitely furious in her jealousy as Elvira. I would never have believed it; such a passion seemed so different from her! I remarked it in the entr'acte.

"It is perhaps exactly on that account," said she to me; "and besides, what do you know of me?"

She said this so proudly that it frightened me. It seemed to be her pride not to be comprehended. Still I persisted in studying her in spite of herself, and that coldly enough too. Boccaferri praised Celio with enthusiasm; he almost wept with joy to see him play so well. It is true he was the coldest, most scornful, most obstinate of men.

"Thanks to you," said he to Cecilia; "you were so angry and so harsh that you made me wicked. I became ice at your reproaches, for I felt pushed to extremes, and was ready to burst forth. Come, ma velle, you ought always to be thus; I should regain the powers which your usual kindness and gentleness take away from me."

"Well," answered she, "I advise you not to play such parts often with me. I should take away your laurels."

He leaned over her, and lowering his voice, said:

"Are you capable of being the female of a tiger?"

"It is very good for the stage," answered she.

And it seemed to me she spoke so that I might hear her answer.

"In real life, Celio, I should despise so mean, so easy, and so silly a use of talent. Why am I so ugly in this rôle? Because nothing is so easy as affectation. So do not be too vain of your success to-day. Strength in excitement is le pont aux ânes, but strength in calmness—ah, you may gain it some day, but not yet. Try to play Ottavio, and we shall see."

"You are a very bitter actress and very jealous of your talent," said Celio, biting his lips so hard that his red moustache, which was fastened on his lip, fell down upon his lace ruffle.

"You are losing your tiger's hair," said Cecilia to him, calmly picking up the moustache; you were right in wanting a new skin!"

"Do you think you can perform that miracle?"

"Yes, if I care to take the trouble; but I make no promises."

I saw they loved each other without being willing to confess it, and I looked at Stella, who was beautiful as an angel, while she gave me a mask for the ball scene. She had the brave and generous expression of one who gives up the idea of pleasing without renouncing her love. A thrill of my heart, so full of gallantry that it would allow no hesitation, prompted me to draw from my bosom the cherry ribbons I had hidden there, and I showed them to her significantly. All her courage left her; she blushed and her eyes filled with tears. I saw that Stella was sensitive, and that I had either given myself up to her forever or else had committed a base deed. From that moment I looked no longer at the past and gave myself up entirely to the happiness, so new to me, of being purely and frankly loved.

I had been playing Ottavio, and had played badly until then. I took my lovely Anna by the arm and led her upon the stage, and then I found heart and feeling enough to tell her my love and express my devotion. At the close of the act I was loaded with praises, and Cecilia said to me, giving her hand:

"As for you, Ottavio, you need no lessons, and you will soon surpass those who teach."

"I do not know how to act," answered I, "and I shall never know. It is because this is not acting here that I have said what I felt."

[Conclusion next week.]

Translations from Schumann.*

ORCHESTRAL CONCERT-OVERTURES.

J. J. H. VERHULST. — W. STERNDALÉ BENNETT. — BERLIOZ.

Chance has placed side by side the three names above, the bearers of which may be regarded as the representatives of the younger artistic generation, at least, of three different nations—the Dutch, English, and French. The last name is well-known, the second is beginning to be appreciated, (1839.) while the first has already lost some of its strangeness by frequent mention, especially in our Leipzig journal. We beg to direct the attention of the reader to them collectively; they are destined, we believe, in time, to play an important part in the musical history of the three countries.

* From Robert Schumann's Gesammelte Schriften über Musik und Musiker. Translated for the London Musical World, by John V. Bridgeman.

The overtures, of which an account is to be here given, I have not, unfortunately, heard executed by an orchestra. But this fact is, perhaps, counterbalanced, and I am enabled to pronounce an opinion on them, by a tolerable familiarity with most of the composers' other works, and, also, with the composers personally, at least with the two first-named. Berlioz promises from year to year to visit Germany, and make us more nearly acquainted with his music; meanwhile, he has sent us a new overture, affording evidence of the strange path he has struck out.

Holland, hitherto celebrated only through its painters, has signalized itself, in recent times, by a lively sense of music also. Great influence has, probably, been exercised in this particular by the Society for the Furtherance of Music, which spreads through the country in a hundred offshoots, and the object of which is the diffusion of native, side by side with German, music. The composer of whom we are speaking is a protégé of this Society, and, if I am not mistaken, gained, in several contests, the prize for composition. He is, for the moment, living among us, and has, also, earned a fair reputation as a conductor, by his direction of the concerts of the Euterpe Society, last winter. It is to the first named Netherlandish Society, also, that we are indebted for the publication of some of his compositions; a church-piece and an overture have already been noticed and prominently treated in this paper, as the productions of a man of decidedly happy talent. A new overture* is now lying before us; it was written for the opening of the well known Dutch tragedy Gysbrecht van Amstel, for which VERHULST composed, also, music to be played between the acts. The overture, which has frequently been heard in Leipzig, gave great satisfaction, and must do so; it is an overture for all: for the public, the musician, and the critic, and is conceived in that tone of generally appreciated culture, which awakens respect in the masses and sympathy in the artist. Some friendly spirit has, hitherto, kept the composer from the rocks which have often lain in the way of other young artists,—from experiments and seductions; he knows his way, and never hazards anything where success is not certain. A knowledge of the measure of his strength, which has already obtained a most satisfactory elevation, and, in addition, liveliness and sprightliness, distinguish this altogether unusual Dutchman as a man, if we would construe him by the aid of his musical efforts. As a musician, more especially, he possesses that instinct of instrumentation which has no longer to choose between two different directions, but at once takes the right one; he delights most in masses, which he well understands how to arrange and set in motion, although he has an observant eye for detail as well; he does not aim at new and unusual effects; with good masters before his eyes, he always strives to produce effects that are more general, everywhere recognized, and always agreeable. The overture in question is, however, already some years old, and cannot be regarded as the last result of his aspirations. Talent of this description does not, it is true, progress rapidly, but its advance is all the more sure; diligence, observation, intercourse with masters, and public encouragement have also urged him on, and thus there is no doubt that the young trunk will, from year to year, bear richer and more abundant fruit; the roots are already striking out towards German soil, and, gradually, the overhanging weight of blossom, also, will turn towards the land which has already afforded nourishment and strength to so many great musicians, and just as, in poetry, there are many foreigners, such as Oehlenschläger, Chamisso, and others, whom we may look upon as our own, so may we greet, likewise, Verhulst as honorary member of the German Brotherhood of Art, the number of whose members may, we trust, always increase.

* "Ouverture en Ut mineur, à grand Orchestre, etc., publiée par la Société des Pays-Bas, pour l'Encouragement de l'Art Musical."

BENNETT, too, belongs to this class, although he at once holds himself, as an Englishman, more aloof, and, in somewhat the same manner that we claim back Händel from England, the English may, at some future period, re-demand Bennett as entirely belonging to themselves—not, however, that we intend that any comparison should be instituted between Händel and Bennett. Bennett's latest overture bears the name of "Die Waldnymph,"* the only non-happy feature, it strikes me, in the whole composition. I know that it is impossible to offend a composer more than by raising objections to the name of his child, since, in his own opinion, he must know better than any one else what he intended, and we might suppose from Bennett's selecting precisely the "Waldnymph," that he wished to give us a companion piece to his former overture, "Die Najaden;" still the title is not at all striking or favorable to the work. It is certainly poetical to indicate a fundamental frame of mind by means of a single existence related to it, just as, from Mendelssohn's "Melusina," the romance, thousands of years old, of life might spring forth from beneath the surface; but this is not applicable in single instances, and I should have preferred the general designation of "Ouverture pastorale," or something similar. But, setting aside these minor considerations, which, however, as I have already said, are injurious to the effect, the overture rises sufficiently, in its wonderfully tender and slim shape, over others of its sisters, and breathes the purest and brightest poetic life. The pianoforte score, as a general rule, only half enables us to form a judgment of any piece; but this, I have heard from competent authorities, is not the case with the present overture. Bennett is more especially a pianist, and, however skilfully and daintily he can treat the various instruments, his favorite one still peeps out from his orchestral compositions, and, finally, something fine is produced in a diminished form, like a beautiful thought out of the mouth of a child.

The overture is charming; in fact, with the exception of Spohr and Mendelssohn, I know no other living composer who as far as delicacy and softness of color are concerned, has the pencil so much under command as Bennett. Even the fact that he has gleaned a great deal from the two artists just named is forgotten in the masterly treatment of the whole, and, it appears to me, he never displayed himself so much as he really is as in this work. Let any one examine it bar by bar; what a delicate, what a strong web from beginning to end! Instead of hand-broad gaps, from the creations of others, jarring upon our ear, how closely and intimately are all the parts connected! But there is one fault which has been found with the overture: its great diffuseness. This applies more or less to all Bennett's compositions; it is his style; he is finished even in the minutest details. He frequently repeats, too, the very same passages; nay, he does so note for note after the conclusion of the middle movement. Let any one, however, attempt to change without injuring the work; the attempt will not prove successful; Bennett is no mere schoolboy to whom hints are of any use; what he has once thought stands fast, and cannot be disturbed.

It is beyond the scope of Bennett's naïvely fervent poetic character, and the direction he has taken in conformity with it, to set in motion grand levers and forces; magnificence and display are foreign to his nature; where his fancy is most fond of tarrying, by the lonely strand, or in the mysterious greenwood, a man does not seize on trumpets and kettle-drums to describe his solitary happiness. Let us, therefore, take Bennett for what he really is, and not for that which he does not at all desire to be, the creator of a new epoch, or an untractable hero, but as a deeply feeling and true poet, who, indifferent to a hat or two more or less, waved in the air, pursues his quiet way, at the end of which, although, perhaps, no triumphal arch awaits him, there is, at least, a wreath of violets offered by some grateful hand—such a wreath as Eusebius would here place upon his head.

* "Overture for grand Orchestra, arranged for four hands, by W. Sterndale Bennett, Op. 20."

Wreaths of another description are sought by BERLIOZ, that raging Bacchanal, the horror of snobs, who think him a shaggy monster with ravenous eyes. But where do we find him to-day? Near the crackling hearth, in the house of a Scotch noble, among huntsmen, dogs, and smiling peasant girls. An overture to—*Waverley is lying before me; an overture to that novel of Sir W. Scott, which in its charming wearisomeness, its romantic freshness, and its general English character is, to my mind, the most pleasing of all the new foreign romances. To this has Berlioz composed music. It will be asked, to what chapter, to what scene, to which verse, and for what purpose? Critics are always so fond of learning what the compositions themselves cannot tell them, and, moreover, very frequently do not understand a tenth part of what they discuss. Good Heavens! when will the time at last come, when we shall no longer be asked what we intended by our divine compositions; search for fifths and leave us at rest. In this case, however, the motto on the title page of the overture affords us some explanation:

"Dreams of love and lady's charms Give place to honor and to arms."

This alone brings us nearer on the track; at this moment I should like nothing better, than for the orchestra to strike up the overture, with the whole mass of readers seated around, to test everything with their own eyes. It would be an easy task for me to describe the overture, either in a poetical manner, by giving the impression of the pictures which it has suggested to me in various ways, or by dissecting the mechanism of the work. Both these methods of interpreting music have something peculiar to themselves; the first, at least, is distinguished for the absence of that dryness into which the second falls, whether it will or not. In a word, Berlioz's music must be heard; even the perusal of the score is not sufficient, whatever trouble a person may give himself to realize it on the piano. Very frequently we find only effects of noise and sound, mere lumps of chords, dashed in anyhow, which convey the composer's meaning, and frequently strange reticences(?), which even a practised ear cannot embody from merely looking at the notes upon the paper. If we probe to the bottom of the separate ideas, they frequently appear, considered by themselves alone, common, nay, even trivial. Taken as a whole, however, the work exercises on me an irresistible charm, in spite of the many things in it which shock, and strike a German ear as unusual. Berlioz appears different in every one of his works, and, in every one, ventures on a new sphere. We do not know whether to call him a genius or a musical adventurer; he is as brilliant as a flash of lightning, but, at the same time, he leaves a stink of brimstone behind him; he presents us with great maxims and truths, and soon afterwards falls into the stammering of a mere schoolboy. To a person who has not got beyond the first elements of musical education and perception (and the majority have not got further), he must appear as nothing more or less than a fool; this must be doubly the case with professional musicians, who spend nine-tenths of their lives in the most ordinary manner,† as he exacts from them things such as no one ever exacted before him. Hence arises the opposition to his compositions; hence do years elapse, before one of them achieves the clearness of a perfect performance. The overture to Waverley will, however, make its way more easily. Waverley and the figure of the hero are well-known, and the motto speaks especially of "Dreams of love, which must give place to honor and to arms." What can be more plain? It is to be hoped that this overture will be printed and performed in Germany. Berlioz's music could only prove injurious to persons of weak talent, who would not be benefited by music of a better kind. Before concluding, I must mention that, strangely enough, the overture bears some distant resemblance to Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille;" nor must I pass over a remark by Berlioz on the title page of the overture, which is marked Op. 1, that he has destroyed his previous work (eight scenes from Faust) printed as Op. 1, and wishes his Waverley overture to be considered as his first. But who will undertake to say that, at some future period, this later Op. 1 will not, also, no longer please its author? Let the reader, therefore, lose no time in becoming acquainted with this composition, which, in spite of all the weaknesses of youth, is, in greatness and peculiarity of conception, the most eminent specimen of instrumental music which the land of the Franks has produced for some time past.

ANECDOTES OF ADOLPH ADAM.—Boieldieu was his master. During the rehearsal of 'La Dame Blanche,' Boieldieu postponed until "tomorrow" writing the overture, and when the last moment came, when it became absolutely necessary to write the overture, he was so fatigued and harassed he could not write a note. It was in the afternoon; he sent for Adam and Theodore Labarre (his favorite pupils) to dine with him; after a good dinner, which was capped with very strong doses of coffee, he sat down to his piano and played them leading pieces of his new work. They were delighted. What say you, boys, if we all sit down and work on that diable d' overture. Come, Labarre, set to work on the commencement of the allegro with one of the Scotch airs you got for me; I'll hash up the andante, and you Adolph-adam," (so he used to call him in one word) give us the cabaletto. They set to work and worked all night. Adam borrowed his thema from the famous trio and crescendo; Labarre used the Scotch airs, and by day-break, thanks to many a dish of coffee, the overture was ready. At rehearsal, the orchestra were startled by the harshest dissonances. . . . Adam, through mistake, had written the score for the horn in a different tone from the desired one. This overture was exceedingly successful, but Boieldieu distrusted a piece of music made by coffee and three persons, and determined to compose another, but the overture proved more and more successful, and he was content to let the public have it their own way. It was not until 1829 that Adam made his debut at the Opera Comique. Adam's master-piece is unquestionably 'Le Chalet.' He was accused for a good many years by the envious of having stolen the best pieces in the Chalet. When Herold (the author of 'Marie,' 'Zampa,' the 'Pré aux Clercs,' &c.) died, the family engaged Adam to take possession of all his MSS. and complete 'Ludovic,' which Herold left unfinished. Adam's enemies said that he found in them all the brilliant themas he used in 'Le Chalet.' Some years ago, he related, incidentally, in a long discussion he had with a musical critic, how he composed 'Le Chalet,' and especially how he was led to re-write the score of the well known song, Le Vin, l'Amour et le Tabac. Few persons ever believed this accusation of plagiarism, and this discussion convinced even them. Perhaps his next best pieces are 'Le Postillon de Loujumeau,' 'Le Toreador,' and 'Giralda.' He is the author of 'Giselle,' the ballet in which Carlotta Grisi made her debut. It was in his works Mme. Cinti Damoreau and Mlle. Taglioni took leave of the stage. The last years of his life were far from being happy. No galley slave labored as he did.—Corr. N. O. Picayune.

TAMBERLIK, THE TENORE.—Signor Tamberlik, we are given to understand, leaves immediately for Rio Janeiro, where he is engaged for fourteen months, at the expiration of which period he is to make the tour of North and South America. The farewell of one who has always done his duty with the utmost efficiency, and whose zeal has always been on a par with his abilities, which have raised him to the highest rank, deserves to be recorded, more especially since it was unprecedented and unaccompanied by fanfaronade or display of any kind.

Signor Tamberlik made his début at the Royal Italian Opera (April 4, 1850) as Masaniello, with success which, doubtful on the first night, was firmly established after two or three representations. He very soon, indeed, acquired that place in public estimation which he ever afterwards maintained without rivalry, as the most admirable tenore robusto since the days of Donzelli, whom, moreover, he was generally allowed, and with justice, to surpass in the purely histrionic department of his art. In the course of six years Signor Tamberlik has rendered eminent services. The extent and variety of his répertoire may be best understood by a reference to the list of characters he has successfully attempted. During the first year of his engagement at the Royal Italian Opera he appeared in no less than eight—viz., Masaniello, Pollio, Aménofio, (Mosè in Egitto), Rodrigo Dhu (La Donna del Lago), Robert (Roberto le Diable), Hydaspes (Anato—a third title for Verdi's Nabucco, which, at Her Majesty's Theatre, had been newly christened Nino), Otello, and Léopold (Halévy's Juive). In 1851, four more were added—Giulio (Der Freyschütz), Florestan (Fidelio), Don Ottavio, and Phaon (Gounod's Sappho); in 1852, another four—Chalais (Maria di Rohan), Poliuto (Donizetti's Martiri), Hugo (Spohr's Faust), and Pietro (Jullien's Pietro il Grande); and in 1853, Arnoldo (Guillaume Tell), Ernani, Benvenuto Cellini (in the opera of Berlioz), and Jean of Leyden (Prophète). Since 1853, Tamberlik, if we are not mistaken, has only added one new part to his catalogue—that of Manrico, in Travatore—making in all twenty-one. The value of a singer capable of impersonating so many characters, and, still better, entirely to the satisfaction of the public, must be self-evident. A more useful artist—not to speak of his rich natural gifts and acquirements—never belonged to an operatic establishment. Nor is this all. Signor Tamberlik, during the term of his connection with the Royal Italian Opera, has seldom, if ever, under any pretext, been absent from his post. He has served the theatre and its patrons with indomitable energy. He has undertaken common parts as readily, and bestowed as much pains upon them as upon those of the highest pretensions. He has more than once supplied the place of Mario himself in operas of vital consequence, such as Don Giovanni and the Prophète, which, but for the timely intervention of Signor Tamberlik, must have been postponed, to the serious detriment of the treasury. Nor has he shrunk, upon any occasion, from assuming the chief responsibility in works the issue of which was doubtful, and from which other singers have retreated in dismay. As examples of this, we need only cite Sappho and Benvenuto Cellini. The Italian, French, and German schools have come home to Signor Tamberlik with equal grace; witness his performances in Otello, Roberto le Diable, and Fidelio, three master-pieces, in which the principal tenor parts have never been sustained with greater power and effect. To analyze his talent, however, or to describe the peculiarities of his voice, would be going over ground already familiar to our readers. We merely wish to pay some slight tribute to a great and conscientious artist, whom it is more than likely we shall not see again for years, if indeed at all, who has stood high in public favor, and may be fairly regarded as an ornament to his profession.—London Times.

Mlle. Piccolomini in "La Traviata."

(From the London Times, May 26.)

On Saturday night one of those important experiments was made that are generally preceded by a vast amount of conjecture and—we may almost say—trepidation among the patrons of lyrical drama. We do not, of course, allude to the production of a new opera by Verdi, since it is one of the virtues of that prolific composer, that he does not much disturb the equanimity of the public, either by raising expectation or by weighing on the memory. We do allude to the debut of Mlle. Piccolomini, the new prima donna, whose performance of the principal character in La Traviata had been declared one of the most perfect ever witnessed. The experiment to be made on Saturday, when the new artist came out in the part with which her fame is most identified, was whether expectations unusually high would be followed by satisfactory results. There was much, too, even in the name "Piccolomini" to excite curiosity, for, even with Juliet's contempt for nomenclature in general, some names are so exceedingly big that one cannot hear them with indifference. Among these, "Piccolomini" is surely to be enumerated. When we add that the young vocalist boasts that the ancient Italian family which comprises among its members the learned Pope Pius II. (better known as Æneas Sylvius), and Ottavio Piccolomini, who was concerned in the death of Wallenstein, owns her not only as a namesake but as a scion, we shall establish the fact that she merited a sympathetic reception at the hands of our aristocratic audience.

* Gr. Overture de Waverley, etc., Op. 1. Partition.

† I have often been obliged to acknowledge that the most circumscribed ideas are found among working musicians; on the other hand, however, it is not easy to find an instance in which they are deficient in certain sterling qualities.

Not to keep our readers in suspense with respect to the all-important event of Saturday, let us, before we descend to the particulars, hasten to communicate that the success of Mlle. Piccolomini has been most triumphant; that she was loudly called at the end of every act (twice after the last), and on each occasion with increased enthusiasm. This duty done, we will now endeavor to describe the field on which the victory was attained, and the means employed by the artist.

The book of La Traviata is founded on La Dame aux Camélias, that celebrated drama which, when produced a few years since at the Théâtre du Vaudeville, at once created a fame for the younger M. Dumas, and incalculably increased the already established reputation of Mme. Doche and M. Fichte. However, as the original piece, notwithstanding the immense noise it made in Paris, has never been transferred to the English stage, or played in London by any French company at the St. James's Theatre, we shall assume that the story is unknown, and describe the progress of the action in La Traviata without further reference to the work of M. Dumas than the remark that, whereas his play is supposed to represent modern French life, the Italian libretto changes the period to the year 1700.

The first act takes place at Paris in the house of Violetta, a reigning belle, more celebrated for beauty than for virtue, who on the rising of the curtain appears in her brilliant saloon, receiving guests of distinction. Alfred Germont, a young gentleman with whom she has become recently acquainted, is evidently regarded by her with more favor than the rest, and he soon makes himself conspicuous by singing a Bacchanalian song for the general amusement. Amid all this joviality Violetta soon gives signs of a pulmonary complaint, which plays a very important part in the catastrophe, and Alfred, who is left alone with her by the retirement of the other guests into an adjoining saloon, expresses his serious uneasiness on her account. The devotion felt by the fond youth and the friendly warnings of the fallen beauty are embodied in a duet, at the end of which the guests, having observed the approach of morning, return to take their leave in a chorus. No sooner have they departed than Violetta, abandoned to her own thoughts, executes a grand scena, in which she expresses her love for Alfred, reflects on her lost condition, and at last, by way of solace, resolves to plunge into the vortex of dissipation.

More than three months elapse before the commencement of the second act, the first scene of which is a villa near Paris, the residence of Alfred and Violetta, who, retired from the noisy world, are living together in a state of idyllic felicity, celebrated by Alfred in a song. Already, however, the storm begins to threaten. A word dropped by Violetta's maid reveals to Alfred the unpleasant fact that the lady is about to sell her horses, carriage, &c., to defray the expenses of housekeeping, and he hastens to Paris to prevent the sacrifice. During his absence Violetta receives a visit from a respectable old gentleman, who explains, without reserve, that he is Alfred's father, and moreover, that he is by no means satisfied with his son's present mode of life. His manner is at first harsh, but the revelation that Violetta is about to sell all her property for the sake of his son softens his resentment, and he passes from a tone of severity to a strain of supplication, intermingled with friendly warning. Alfred's position will, he says, blight the hopes of his family, and Violetta herself, when the charms of youth have faded, will lead a life of misery. Under the influence of the old gentleman's persuasions, Violetta, though nearly maddened at the thought of a separation from Alfred, resolves to sacrifice her own feelings for the sake of his welfare. At the close of the interview, the greater part of which is embodied in a duet, Germont senior retires to the garden, and Violetta sits down to write a billet of evidently mysterious import, for, on the sudden return of Alfred, she conceals it with a confused air. Little, however, does he suspect what has taken place, or who is in the garden, and though Violetta leaves the room abruptly, he still indulges in pleasant dreams for the future. From these he is awakened by the receipt of the letter, which is given to him by the servant, and informs him that his beloved Violetta has abandoned him forever. His despair is of the most frightful kind, and though his father, by an aria replete with paternal affection, endeavors to soothe him, the good old gentleman only seems to add fuel to flame.

We are now taken to a saloon in the house of Flora Bervoix, a lady whose social position is similar to that of Violetta. A brilliant party is given, and some ladies, who make their appearance masked as gypsies, and some gentlemen attired as Spanish bull-fighters, contribute to the merriment of the evening. Among the guests are Alfred, who is occupied in staking his money on a game of cards, and Violetta, who enters on the arm of her present protector, Baron Dauphol. She is embarrassed by the unexpected sight of Alfred, and her embarrassment is increased by the obvious annoyance of the Baron, who insists that during the entire evening she shall not address a word to her former lover. A game, in which stakes are high, and in which Alfred and the Baron are antagonists, does not at all improve the aspect of affairs, and when the whole party retires to the supper room a tempest is evidently in the horizon. In a few moments it bursts forth. Violetta returns to the stage from the supper room, followed by Alfred, whom she exhorts not to fight with the Baron, at the same time professing her love for the latter. The infuriated youth summons the whole company from the banquet, confesses to them how he has accepted the bounty of Violetta, and by way of repayment flings her portrait at her feet, amid the general indignation of all present, including his own father. This situation is the subject of the finale to the second act.

The third act takes place in Violetta's chamber, when the heroine is discovered in a dying condition. A letter from the elder Germont informs her that his son has fought and wounded the Baron, and will speedily return to her, accompanied by his father; but this solace has arrived too late, and an air, in which Violetta supplicates the pardon of Heaven for her past career, and which is contrasted by a Bacchanalian chorus of the people in the streets celebrating the procession of the "bœuf gras" is the expression of her despondency. The entrance of Alfred, with his father's sanction, throws a transient gleam over the unhappiness of Violetta, and in the first movement of a duet that ensues they begin to picture to themselves a blissful future. Already, however, the increased debility of Violetta shows that her stay in this world is not likely to be of long duration, and the final movement of the duet expresses the misery of the loving pair. Death, which gradually steals upon her while she is surrounded by her despairing lover, his father, a faithful servant, and the medical attendant, terminates the tale of sin and repentance.

We have been thus minute with the plot, because the book is of far more consequence than the music, which, except so far as it affords a vehicle for the utterance of the dialogue, is of no value whatever, and, moreover, because it is essentially as a dramatic vocalist that the brilliant success of Mlle. Piccolomini was achieved. Perhaps on some other occasion we may return to the consideration of Signor Verdi's part of the performance, taken apart from the libretto. For the present it will be just sufficient to treat La Traviata as a play set to music. To M. Dumas, who invented the situations, and Mlle. Piccolomini, who delineated the emotions of the principal character, belong the honors of a triumph, with which the composer has as little to do as possible.

The entrance of Mlle. Piccolomini at once made an impression in her favor. Her figure is small, graceful, and "distinguished," her countenance is pleasing and vivacious, and as she tripped upon the stage amid her guests there was a sprightliness in her manner that gained all sympathies, and that found its vocal expression in the second verse of the Bacchanalian song, with which Violetta follows the first verse, sung by Alfred. The pretty recklessness with which this little ebullition of gaiety took place raised a loud burst of applause, and the verse was unanimously encored. The final movement at the end of the scena, in the first act, when Mlle. Piccolomini's pure soprano voice was exerted in the production of the most florid ornamentation, brought down the curtain amid general sounds of approval, but it was not as yet that her great triumph was attained. It was in the second act, when the interview with the elder Germont is over, and Violetta takes leave of Alfred with the concealed intention of never seeing him again, that her histrionic force was first displayed to its full extent. Such a tone of anguish—of abandonment to the sentiment of the moment, was thrown into the single line—that it thrilled through the whole body of the audience. The second great achievement was in the scene at Flora's residence, when she is insulted by Alfred in the presence of the numerous party. Except in the Camille of Mademoiselle Rachel, we scarcely remember to have seen such an instance of the bodily frame breaking up, as it were, through the aggression of mental anguish. Mademoiselle Piccolomini trembled from head to foot under the influence of the insulting language—the hands clutched convulsively and wandered about uncertain—it was evident that the mind was so absorbed in its own suffering as to have lost its control over the limbs. In this situation she did not utter a note, but nevertheless, she monopolized to herself all the attention of the public, who, contemplating that mute figure, forgot the insipid air by which her movements were accompanied.

"Amami, Alfredo, quant'io t'amo! Addio!"—

When the second act was over the position of the artist was firmly established, and it may be observed especially in her favor that her triumph over the whole house was as gradual as it was sure. In the third act the details of death are set forth with a minuteness as far approaching that of Mrs. C. Kean's exquisite representation of Queen Catherine's last moment as is possible within the compass of lyrical drama, where nuances of feeling cannot be so variously indicated as is spoken dialogues. The tottering step with which Mademoiselle Piccolomini endeavored to reach her chair when the malady was at its height was fine to the highest degree. Every spectator followed her movements with a sort of nervousness, and audibly rejoiced when she was fairly seated, so obvious was the danger that she might fall exhausted in the midst of her efforts. The shriek of supplication with which, after the return of Alfred had again made life valuable, she charged her servant to visit the medical man with the words—was wonderful,—it was really the expression of the drowning wretch, who proverbially clutches at a straw, and beautifully led up to the more lyrical agony with which in the duet immediately following she bewails her hapless lot in tones of impassioned grief. The minute details of the final victory of death, with all the gradual sinking and changeful play of the countenance, need not be described. It is sufficient to say that they left the audience in a state of enthusiastic admiration, which took the practical form of two universal calls for the lady sola, after her appearance with the rest of the company.

"Digi che vivere ancor voglio,"

We must repeat the fact that the triumph was completely Mademoiselle Piccolomini's. M. Calzolari, who played Alfredo, sang exceedingly well, but no art could have rendered his songs fascinating; and "Di Provenza," which was sung by M. Beneventano, in the character of Germont, and which, according to tradition, was the great song of the piece, produced scarcely any effect whatever. A great artist played a part suited to her powers—that was the event solemnized with so large a contribution of plaudits and bouquets.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 21, 1856.

Music in the Open Air—Brass Bands and Bands Non-Military.

An annual text comes round. With the summer evenings we, the people, think again of pleasant walks and peaceful crowds and music, by municipal provision, on the Common. Indeed the first concert for the summer had already been announced for the evening of last Wednesday, but was prevented by the rain. With the long summer days and nights, the old humdrum din of brass begins to haunt the prisoner of the hot city, and allow the jaded sense of hearing no repose. We caught the sound of the first brass band upon parade a few days since; and certainly the sound was rich and spirit-lifting for a little while. But soon it grows monotonous and hacknied; soon all the brass bands sound alike; the same essential quality of tone, the same family type through all its seeming variations; the same aggravating increase of force, without increase of meaning; the same perpetual blaze and shout and stunning crash of war and triumph, marking time for martial steps, without ministering to peaceful feelings and to true soul's culture; and when subdued to softer uses, as to the playing of serenades and operatic scenes and melodies for summer evening promenaders, still treating these in the same brassy manner, and therefore tempted to select the brassiest by nature, such as Verdi's music, which has become the staple of nearly all the brass bands here and in the old world. It is well, perhaps, as far as it goes; but can we not have better?

Brass bands have their uses and their excellencies. We have frequently had occasion to remark the beautiful harmony and richness and precision of some one of them. But one grows weary of their incessant loud appeal; one hears so much of it, that the state of mind induced is anything but musical; it becomes a part of the general din and rumble which one hears and heeds not, nerves permitting. Brass bands are splendid in the right time and quantity. But they should be kept to characteristic uses. No doubt they are good for military street parades; they reach the ears of rank and file more readily in noisy streets. Their sound is military. Its suggestion is of stir and action, of war and triumph, of physical energy, of material mass in motion; of soldiers on the march, or of political electioneering tramps and triumphs. It has a natural affinity with the hoarse shouts of party; and not indiscriminately there; it is most in character with the more border-ruffian, barbaric, filibustering, might-makes-right kind of politics, than with that which goes for peace, for freedom, and for civilization. It is a kind of sound too apt to terrify or stun the gentler instincts. We had rather leave it, for the most part, to the enemy, and cultivate a gentler music.

Brass bands, then, are essentially military bands. They mean war, brute force, threats, defiance. Not that they may not be employed to better ends sometimes. But we are speaking of this universal overdoing of the fashion. It is the military employment which creates and supports all our bands. When music for non-military purposes is wanted, as for a civic procession, a serenade, a concert on the Common, the same bands are called upon. All the instruments are brass, all made for war; or if subdued to smoothness by the use of valves, a la Sax, it is with an awkward grace, a quality of tone resulting which is ambiguous, emasculated, at once loud and characterless. Yet the temptation is quite natural to a skilful player to try other music than plain marches, to imitate the orchestra, the opera singers, and make mere brass astonish you by showing itself so marvellously at home outside of its own element. And we have often had to compliment the brass bands on the degree of expression with which they have contrived to render music thus appropriated. Still it ceases not to be true that, compared with orchestras, or bands not altogether brass, such renderings are and must be inexpressive.

Why can we not, then, (to repeat what we have often urged,) why can we not have organized a civic or non-military band, expressly and primarily adapted to these gentler purposes, of music for the people in the summer evenings, and of inspiring accompaniment to civic festivals, processions, anniversaries, where the end is to humanize, refine and elevate? Give us at least one large band, composed as bands were wont to be before this filibustering age of brass, with plenty of reeds, clarionets, bassoons, &c., with the mellow and all-blending French horns; not without necessary brass—trumpets that are trumpets, and not sophisticated into vain resemblance of less fiery natures—with the old forest bugle, so long banished, &c., &c.;—a band numerous enough to tell as widely as our bands of brass. Give us this, O City Fathers, if you would realize the full intention of the good resolution which has prompted public music on the Common. Is it not practicable? Would it cost too much? Consider the value of innocent amusements for the people, and that all such outlay is for constructive and not destructive ends. Consider particularly the refining, harmonizing, law-and-order-inspiring influences of music. Then consider how many thousands of dollars worth of patriotic gunpowder, such as you blaze away in senseless fireworks in a single hour, some Fourth of July night, would give good music every pleasant evening through the summer to the crowds that would seek fresh air and comfort on our Common.

From the Country.

NATICK, JUNE 16.—"It is a good thing to be in the country," says Mr. Sparrowgrass. It is a good thing to be in the country, say I. Moreover it is an especially good thing to be in the country here in America, where, thank the stars! something of the wildness of nature still remains. Instead of the trim cultivated hedgerows with ditches, which I saw a few weeks ago in England, or the narrow footpaths of the Continent, which alone separate the fields and gardens of different owners, here I find old rambling stone walls half concealed by a thousand shrubs and flowers springing up as nature pleases—wild enough. I like them. Instead of the forest lands to which my eye has been accustomed for two years, in which but a single species of tree is to be seen, and in which all stand in regular rows, planted like so much corn, what an endless variety of tree and bush here crowds every wood, offering on all sides something new; new effects of light and shade, of hue and tint, of form and grouping! I like this too. Then here I have Cochituate, and Dug, and Morse's and Bullard's ponds, and Charles river winding through a beautiful valley, and all within the limits of a pleasant walk, such as William and I took yesterday. And these waters are not ruined yet by civilization, but here and there give me little pictures of sweet savageness, and carry me back to the days when Eliot's Indians were hunting and fishing upon their shores. Well-a-day—they are all gone! The Pegans, and the Wabuns and the Swamscoats—and the "place of hills" knoweth them no more.

But I sat down to write upon musical matters.—Music is a good thing in the country, Mr. Sparrowgrass might say. It flourishes here. In a quiet way, indeed, and yet I find surprising excellence even in this small country town, and with the high standard of foreign excellence still fresh in my memory. No matter now about the little society which has met for practice this past winter, and studied operatic choruses instead of psalm tunes; let me tell you of our new prima donna. She is a true soprano, her voice of the purest flute-like quality, of great compass and power, and she charms one alike by her tenderness and feeling, and by her marvellous execution. I walked up to Cochituate pond early this morning, where she lives, and she sung to me half an hour. She has not yet appeared in public—when she does I look for a great sensation. As a secret I give you her name, Mrs. Brown Thrush—no connection of Mr. Brown, by the way. She is the soprano of a new quartet of singers which will probably attract some notice yet, and put this sort of music on quite a new footing.

A near relative of this lady forms the second in the quartet. She is a very dark brunette, but very pretty, and one of the liveliest young creatures imaginable. She is a great favorite here, and as odd and queer in her ways as she is superb in her singing. The other day she suddenly broke off in a solo, uttered half a dozen meus like a kitten, and went on again as if nothing had happened—to the great delight of the youngsters, who have nicknamed her "the Catbird."

Mr. Oriole is the third on the list. In my ramble with William yesterday, I paid him a visit at South Natick. He practises altogether in the open air to strengthen his lungs, and has a small stage constructed high up in the branches of a grand old elm, which the Indians planted before the door of Parson Badger, as a tree of peace, some generations since. Mr. O. sang us some pieces in costume, a beautiful crimson robe through which appear the glossy sleeves of a superb black velvet coat.

The fine voice of Monsieur Robin, as he calls himself, completes the quartet. (Between you and me, his real name is T—h, and he is a near connection of the two ladies; but he is a rambling, wandering fellow, and can "do better" under the assumed name, upon the principle, "A prophet," &c.) M. Robin has not a very extensive compass, but is, notwithstanding, an admirable artist. The tune Portugal, in the old Handel and Haydn Collection, will give you an idea of his style of composition.

A Mr. R. O. Lincoln was until quite recently in Mr. Robin's place, but he has grown rich, fat and affects the sober manners as well as garb of the Quakers, exchanging his fine white vest and shining coat for solemn gray. I hear he is going South by and by for the winter; it is to be hoped that with Spring he may return to us and to art again.

Attempts have been made here to introduce the practice of congregational singing, and with some success, so long as the voices of the persons above mentioned, reinforced by those of the Warbler family, predominated; but as by degrees the Jays and others like them, acquired confidence and gave the public the full power of their strong lungs, the really fine singers were driven from the field, and we are now organizing again a select choir. The Jay and the Blackbird families are—well, not the best of singers. With the quartet and a chorus of the Warblers, the Martins and some other musical families residents of Natick, it is hoped that few places will offer better Sunday music than this "Place of Hills," as the name signifies.

It was already dark as William and I last evening came home from Bullard's and Morse's ponds. We were upon a rough, shady, wild road, with woods and swampy meadows on either hand, when suddenly our talk was interrupted by a short, sharp, anxious cry, "Whip poor Will!" My companion was a little startled at first; but we concluded some other Will was meant; though the thought occurred that possibly the voice was a spiritual manifestation from some poor perturbed Indian spirit, not yet oblivious of old colony times. It is truly a good thing to be in the country. The spirits of John Elliot's Indians do not visit you in the city.

Do you know that after two years absence a summer's evening concert in the meadow, by frogs and toads and what not, hath a charm? Such voices of the night are so American! I am reminded of Prospero's Isle, where the air was filled with voices that hurt not. The old people of Natick have a tradition that after old Squire Gookin, of Cambridge, died, who had long been the guardian of the Indians, and whose guardianship had sometimes not quite met their wishes, they explained the language of the frogs after this wise:

Deep Bass Voice. Old Gookin is dead! old Gookin is dead! (repeated ad lib.)

Tenor. I'm glad on't! I'm glad on't!

Soprano. So am I too! so am I too!

and so on indefinitely.

Yes, here in the country the air both day and night is filled with voices. What do foreigners mean by speaking of our want of singing birds and sweet-scented wild flowers? Why, I feel just that want abroad. The nightingale, skylark and finch no more supply to my ear the want of the tones I have heard and loved all my life than our thrushes, bob-o'-links, orioles and warblers supply their places to the European. I feel the beauty of the nightingale's song—"sad Philomel's" "soft complaining note;" it is beautiful in itself, and all the more so (as we learn from Shakspeare) because heard at night, when every goose is not cackling. Nor am I indifferent to the gushing joyousness, the bubbling melody of the skylarks springing up from the fertile plains about Breslau, as I heard them a year ago; but I can recall no spot abroad, on the banks of the Rhine, the Weser, the Elbe, among the the Hartz or the Saxon hills, where I have heard anything like the variety, the sweetness, the power and clearness of the bird voices which are delighting me in my walks about the hills and waters of old Natick.

"Vive la prejudice!"

Well, let it be prejudice; it can do no harm if I thus am more contented with home. A. W. T.

Musical Chat.

Mlle. VESTVALI's Opera troupe have gone from Boston. Since Ernani, noticed in our last, they have given three performances, namely, one of Lucia, one of Il Trovatore, and finally on Wednesday night a hash of single acts from four familiar operas.... The brothers MOLLENHAUER, in New York, have been joined by a third brother, HEINRICH MOLLENHAUER, violoncellist from the Royal Chapel at Stockholm. They gave a concert on the 5th at Dodworth's Academy, the principal feature of which was a Trio in G for their three instruments by Beethoven.... A Philharmonic Society has been organized in Springfield, Ms. Mr. JOHN FITZHUGH is the president, and Mr. A. GEMUNDER, leader..... Dr. LOWELL MASON and Mr. GEORGE F. ROOT are holding a "Normal Musical Institute" for the coming three months in the village of North Reading, Ms.

The London Musical World states, on positive authority, that the present is absolutely the last professional visit of Mme. JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT to England. Besides appearing at the two Philharmonic Societies, she will give three farewell concerts in Exeter Hall; the first, a miscellaneous performance, the 11th of June; the second, an oratorio, ("The Creation,") on the 25th; and the third, miscellaneous, on the 30th. On the 30th of June, at Exeter Hall, JENNY LIND sings her last song in England. The rumors about her return to the stage were rumors only. She has had no such intention. There is hope for us still, since it is nowhere positively stated that she has taken any vow never to return to America.

A writer in the New York Tribune states that 4,382 hand-organs are daily ground in the streets of that city.... JULLIEN, the monster concert man, is giving concerts at Liverpool and Manchester with twelve men in Zouave costume, purporting to be the trumpeters of the Second Regiment of Zouaves, "with the glory of the Crimea fresh upon them," as his small bills say.... MAX MARETZKE, it is said, will give a series of grand promenade concerts at the Academy of Music very shortly. LA GRANGE and GOTTSCHALK are spoken of as the soloists, assisted by a grand orchestra of eighty musicians.

The Pittsfield Harmonic Society performed Newkonn's "David" on the evening of the 17th.... The Waltham Musical Association have a new hall and have purchased De Monti's "favorite" Mass, in B flat, recently published by Oliver Ditson. When they have sung that through, they will do well to try some masses of a higher order, say by Haydn or Mozart, with which Mr. Ditson will be equally ready to supply them.

The PYNE troupe are singing English Opera in Montreal.

HENRY DRAYTON, the American tenor, will, it is said, visit this country next Fall with a first-class English company, comprising LUCY ESCOT and other celebrated vocalists.

JOANNA WAGNER, it is rumored, will come to America after her present engagement with Mr. Lamley expires, which will be next Fall.

There is much truth in the following remarks of the Quarterly Review: "We should hardly say that an ear for melody is the highest criterion of taste for music. It sets the head wagging and feet tapping; sends the ploughman whistling forth, and takes many a stall at the opera; but we suspect it is rather the love of harmony which is the real divining rod of the latent treasures of deep musical feeling. Grétry danced, when a child, to the sound of dropping water, foreshowing, perhaps, in this, the light character of his taste and compositions; but Mozart, it is well known, when an infant of only three years old, would strike thirds on the clavichord, and incline his little head, smiling to the harmony of the vibrations. Nothing proves more strongly the angelic purity of music than the very tender age at which the mind declares for it. No art has had such early proficient and such eager volunteers, and no art has so surely performed in manhood what it promised in infancy. All the greatest musicians—Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, (it seems not Beethoven, however)—were infant prodigies. There seems nothing to dread in prematureness of musical development; it grows with the growth and strengthens with the strength in natural concord. When we see a child picking out airs on the piano, or silent at a concert, we may rejoice in our hearts." We might add, (here at least, however it may be in England,) there is quite as much room for rejoicing when we see full-grown children silent at a concert.

Music Abroad.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. On the 22d of May Il Barbiere was repeated, with the same successes on the part of ALBONI, but with a new tenor, M. SALVIANI, a "a young tenor from Florence," in the part of Almaviva. The Times says he has an organ of considerable power, and sang the romanza with a great deal of feeling; but the occasional want of firmness in his notes betrayed the nervousness of a first appearance. ALBONI had appeared also in La Sonnambula, with CALZOLARI as Elvino, BENEVENTANO as the Count, and Mlle. RIZZI as Liza. On the 24th came Verdi's Traviata and the debut of La PICCOLOMINI, of which we copy a full report in another column. Of our old friend BENEVENTANO we are not surprised to read: "His feeling is evident, and his intention good, but both are spoiled by exaggeration." La Traviata was thrice repeated.—June 2. Verdi's Trovatore served for the debut of Mme. ALBERTINI, with a cast altogether novel. We quote from the Times:

Mme. Albertini (an English woman by birth) has for some years maintained a very high rank as prima donna assoluta in the "land of song." She was the favorite pupil of the celebrated Madame Ungher, and enjoyed the protection of Rossini himself, who entertained a great opinion of her talent, and materially assisted her in her career. The fame of Mme. Albertini, however, we have reason to believe, has been chiefly acquired in Verdi's operas; and whatever deterioration is now perceptible in her splendid natural gifts must be traced to the pernicious influence which the music of that maestro exercises upon all voices that come in contact with it. Though young, Mme. Albertini has suffered like the rest. Her voice is still a mezzo soprano of great power and extensive range; but the higher notes, which in their prime would have entitled it to be denominated a soprano sfogato of the most superb kind, are worn by incessant and painful exertion in the music that has for a long time taken possession of the Italian stage. Mme. Albertini possesses all the qualifications to make a dramatic singer of the first class. She has evidently studied her art with zeal and thoroughly mastered its secrets. In the first act of Il Trovatore, where Leonora has really some vocal passages to execute and some vocal phrases to sing, this was plainly manifested. The andante of the cavatina d'intrata, "Tacea la notte placida," was admirably delivered—the phrasing large and well-finished, the chest notes (voix de poitrine) full and satisfactory, and the expression as pure as it was fervid. The cabaletta, too, was a brilliant display of vocalization. In this bravura, Mme. Albertini, among other acquirements, displayed one which is rare among singers of the present day—viz., a close and even trillo, or shake, on several notes of the scale, a shake perfectly at command, graduated with ease from forte to piano, and exquisitely in tune. The enthusiasm created by her performance was quite legitimate, and was renewed with equal reason when the curtain fell at the end of the first act, after the trio with Manrico and the Count, in which Mme. Albertini exhibited a fire and impetuosity which took the audience by storm.

Sig. Baucarde the tenor, is no stranger to the habitués of Her Majesty's Theatre. The beautiful quality of voice which formerly gained him admirers, remains unimpaired, but his intonation is uncertain. His best effort was the adagio of Manrico's grand air in the third act—"Ah, si, ben mio," which was given with genuine feeling, and loudly redemanded. The noisy cabaletta too, "Di quella piza," was declaimed in a very energetic manner, and by this performance Signor Baucarde redeemed many faults that might be laid to his charge elsewhere.

In the character of Azucena Madame Albani not only delighted but surprised the audience. Besides singing the music to perfection, she evinced a dramatic power for which she has not hitherto received credit. The long and elaborate scena where the Gipsy narrates to Manrico the story of her mother's death, was delivered with a variety and intensity of expression that touched every hearer. Nothing could be finer than the climax, when, in one emphatic line:

"Sul capo mio le chiome sento drizzarsi ancor!"

Azucena summed up the extent of her emotions on referring to the dreadful catastrophe. This passage is set low in the scale; and the magnificent contralto tones of Albani—slowly and solemnly uttered—thrilled through the audience. The plaintive melody, "Stride la vampa," was warbled with charming simplicity.

Sig. Beneventano was more successful as Count de Luna than in any part he has hitherto essayed. He sang the familiar air, "Il balen del suo sorriso," extremely well.

We add also the opinion of the News about Albertini:

Mme. Albertini is worthy of her Italian reputation. She is a powerful tragic actress, and accomplished singer. She is tall and graceful; and though her features are, perhaps, not entitled to be called beautiful, yet they are, when in repose, very pleasing, and are also capable of strong and varied expression. Her voice is a pure soprano, of great power and compass. Its quality, too, is fine; but she sometimes forces it too much, making the high notes somewhat shrill and piercing. This, however, she does only in the expression of violent passion. In pathetic passages, where she subdues her voice, its high tones are often exceedingly sweet; and her "dying falls"—sustained sounds gradually diminished to an extreme pianissimo—are often as exquisite as anything we have ever heard. Her execution is clear, articulate, and brilliant; and she appears to have studied in a good school. We do not know her age; but her powers seem to be fully matured, and she is a finished and cultivated artist. Her declamation in the delivery of recitative is very fine, and her whole manner is brimful of feeling. She makes much use of the roce vibrata, without carrying it to excess; so that it adds earnestness and intensity to her expression. She made an immediate impression. Her very first air, "Tacea la notte placida," was given with such romantic tenderness, and rose at the conclusion to such an ecstasy of passion, that it drew thunders of applause from all parts of the house; and the enthusiasm of the audience went on increasing to the very end.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The last reports mention no novelties. In the last week of May there were repetitions of Rigoletto, Il Conte Ory, and Lucresia Borgia.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—At the fourth concert were performed Spohr's Symphony in D minor (No. 2,) and Mozart's "Jupiter"; overtures to "Midsummer Night's Dream" and "Fidelio"; Concertos for piano (OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT) by Beethoven, and for violoncello (PIATTI) by Haydn; and vocal pieces from Gluck, Cimarosa and Rossini, (by CLARA NOVELLO and VIARDOT.) Beethoven's Concerto (in G), says the Times, "was played with infinite spirit and a taste irreproachably classical by Herr Otto Goldschmidt."

ELLA'S MUSICAL UNION.—The programme of the fifth "sitting," (Tuesday afternoon, May 27,) was as follows:

Quartet, E minor, Op. 44..... Mendelssohn.
Piano-forte Solos..... Bach.
Quartet in A, No. 5, Op. 18..... Beethoven.
Septet, D minor..... Hummel.

ERNST, COOPER, HILL and PIATTI formed the quartet. HALLÉ was the pianist.

Mme. CLARA SCHUMANN gave, the same afternoon, a "recital" of piano music, performing from memory all, except the Bach piece, of the following programme.

Sonata in C major, Op. 53..... Beethoven.
Schlummerlied, Op. 121—Jagdlied, Op. 82—Traumewirren: Phantasiestück, Op. 12, Robt. Schumann.
Prelude and Fugue (for organ) in A minor, J. S. Bach.
Capriccio Scherzando in F sharp minor, Mendelssohn.
Nocturne in C minor—Polonaise in A flat major..... Chopin.

Germany.

WEIMAR.—Several compositions of young musicians have lately been produced. Among them were the overture to Lancelot vom See, by Herr Emil Büchner, of Leipzig; and two orchestral compositions, an "Orchestral Fantasia" on Lord Byron's Sardanapalus, and an overture to Alfieri's Eugenia di Asti, by Herr Karl Fendrich, of Freiburg.—Montag's Gesangverein have given a concert of sacred music before the Grand Duke, the Grand Duchess, the Court, and a large circle of guests, in the ducal chapel. The pieces selected were, "Lamentationen" and "Responsorien," by Palestrina; an old German "Marienlied," by Prätorius; "Regina Cæli," by Caldara; "Adoramus," by Ruffi; "Alla Trinita," by a composer of the 14th century; a cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbunden," by J. S. Bach; the 22nd Psalm, and "Mitten wir im Leben sind," by Mendelssohn; and two motets, "Wachet auf, ruft Euch die Stimme," and the 33rd Psalm, by Fasch and Reicha. The various pieces were executed partly a capella, partly with organ and quartet accompaniment.

BERLIN.—There have been two débuts lately at the Royal Operahouse; that of Mlle. Valentine Bianchi, from the Paris Conservatory, as Amina, in Sonnambula, and that of Mlle. Louise Michal, the Swedish aspirant, as the Queen of Navarre, in the Huguenots. Both were successful.—A grand military concert was given, recently, in Otto's Circus, for the benefit of the widows and orphans of military musicians as well as for invalided military musicians themselves. The band was selected from the bands of the infantry, cavalry, and Jäger regiments at present garrisoned here. The concert, under the direction of Herr Wiebrecht, opened with Spontini's overture to Olympia. This was followed by Count von Redern's "Fackeltanz," Löschhorn's "Belle Amazone," Schubert's "Lob der Thänen," a "Funeral March," by Beethoven, the same composer's symphony in C minor, and the march from Tannhäuser. Their Royal Highnesses the Princes Karl, Albrecht and Friedrich, were present.—Herr Liebig has brought his Winter Concerts, in Hennig's Wintergarden, to a close.

Advertisements.

WANTED.

A SITUATION as Organist, or Organist and Conductor, is desired by a Gentleman, who can give the best of references. Address H. H. B. at this office.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALOH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S COLLECTIONS OF GLEES, MADRIGALS, PART-SONGS, &c.

Novello's Glee-Hive.

A Collection of Popular GLEES and MADRIGALS, in Vocal Score, with ad. lib. Accompaniment for Piano-forte. Complete in 8 vols. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt lettering. Price $2 each volume.

These volumes contain eighty-three of the best Glee and Madrigals by standard ancient and modern English composers. Among them will be found some of the finest Glee of Attwood, Calcott, the Earl of Mornington, Spofforth, Stevens, Webbe, &c. Each Glee and Madrigal is printed separately, at prices varying from 4 to 12 cents each.

Novello's Part-Song Book.

In One Volume, handsomely bound in cloth, with illuminated lettering.

This work consists of new Glee and Part-Songs, by the best modern composers—among others, Bishop, Benedict, Macfarren, Rimbault, Wesley, &c.—with reprints of some of the best Madrigals by ancient composers, and Part-Songs by eminent German composers, set to English poetry. Each Glee and Part-Song printed separately, at from 4 cents to 18 cents each. Vocal parts to the whole work, 25 cents each part; Vocal parts to separate Glee, &c., 8 cents per set.

Orpheus:

A Collection of Glee and Vocal Quartettes, by the most admired German Composers, with English Poetry.

This collection is principally for male voices. Twenty nine books, each containing about six Glee, in separate Vocal parts, with separate Piano-forte accompaniment, have been published, and the issue is continued—the new books being received by J. A. Novello immediately on their publication in London.—Price 88 cents each book.

The Musical Times, AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR,

PUBLISHED (IN LONDON) ON THE FIRST OF EVERY MONTH.

Containing ANTHEMS, CHORALS, and HYMNS, or GLEES, MADRIGALS, and ELEGIES, for One, Two, Three, Four, or more Voices. Price 8 cents each.

A Monthly Journal, containing original articles by EDWARD HOLMES, Author of the "Life of Mozart," &c.; Short notices of Singing-Classes, Concerts, &c.; Advertisements of new and important Musical Works; and, in addition, three or four pages of Music. The alternate numbers contain Music with secular or sacred words. Price 3 cents each, or post-free, 4 cents. Nos. 1 to 48, (Vols. I and II.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 49 to 96, (Vols. III and IV.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 97 to 144, (Vols. V and VI.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75. Either Vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, may be had separately, in paper covers, 75 cents each. Annual subscription to the Musical Times, 50 cents, post-paid.

J. A. NOVELLO,

No. 389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Garcia's Complete School of Singing.

JUST PUBLISHED:—A Complete School of Singing, in which the Art is clearly developed in a series of Instructions and appropriate Examples, to which are added Exercises, written and composed by MANUEL GARCIA.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

ED. B. ROBINSON, PIANO-FORTE TUNER.

Orders received at Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington Street.

HEWES' PATENT AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE, Manufactory, 379 Washington Street, BOSTON, MASS.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER,

Will be happy to give instruction in Piano-forte and Organ playing, and the Theory of Music. Address:—No. 8 Maynard Place. May 26. tf

P. F. DODGE,

MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 789 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE, TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.

Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

MLLE. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE —GIVER— INSTRUCTION ON THE PIANO-FORTE, And may be addressed at her residence, 65 Hancock St.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. F. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD, TEACHER OF MUSIC, 265 Washington Street, Boston.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S

Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,

19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (loaded), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 221.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 28, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 13.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by
JOHN S. DWIGHT, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court
of the District of Massachusetts.]

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Translated from the French of Madame Dubéant, for the Journal of Music.

CHAPTER XIV.

CONCLUSION.

I went up into my box to take off my domino. I had hardly entered when Stella boldly joined me. She had torn off her mask quickly, and her beautiful wavy auburn hair had fallen down over her shoulders. She was pale and trembling, but her soul was wonderfully courageous, and she acted by impulse, and consequently exactly contrary to Cecilia.

"Adorno Salentini," said she, placing her white hand on my shoulder, "do you love me?"

I was entirely conquered by this bold question, evidently asked with pain and with the trouble of frightened modesty. So I took her in my arms and pressed her to my heart.

"You must not deceive me," said she, tearing herself away. "I am twenty-two years old; I have never loved, and I must not be deceived. My first love shall be my last, and if I am mistaken, I shall not try to find out if I have strength to love again; I should die. That is the only courage I should be capable of. I am young, but the experience of others has enlightened me. I have already thought a great deal; and if I do not know the world, I at least know myself. He who could trifle with a heart like mine must be a wretch; and if he should do it, I should despise and hate him. Death would seem a thousand times better to me than life after such a mistake."

"Stella," answered I, "if I should tell you that I loved you, would you believe me? Would you not rather prove me before trusting yourself so blindly to a person whom you do not know?"

"I do know you," answered she. "Celio, who esteems no one, esteems and respects you; and besides, even if I had not this cause of confidence, I should trust your word."

She hesitated a moment, and then said:

"Listen! I am not Floriani's child for nothing. I have not my mother's strength, but I have her courage. I love you."

This frankness overcame me. I fell down at Stella's feet and kissed them passionately.

"This is the first time," said I to her, "that I ever knelt to a woman, and it is the first time I ever really loved, and I thought I loved Cecilia an hour ago; I owe you this confession; but what I seek in a woman is her heart; and I saw that hers did not belong to me. You offer me yours with a bravery which touches and thrills me. I do not know you any better than you know me. Love is faith; faith makes one bold, and nothing resists it. We love each other, Stella, and we need no farther proof. Will you be my wife?"

"Yes," answered she, "for I told you I could love but once."

"Then be my wife," cried I, embracing her with transport. "Shall I not now ask you of your brother?"

"No," said she, pressing her lips to my forehead with calm and saintly dignity. "My brother loves Cecilia, and he must become worthy of her. He does not love her yet enough to deserve her. Let him believe that you are his rival. His passion needs a struggle to make him know it. Cecilia has loved him for a long time. She never told me so, but I know it well. You must first ask me of her, for I look upon her as a mother."

"I will go now," answered I.

"And why now? Are you afraid of repenting if you take time for reflection?"

"I will prove the contrary, generous and charming girl! I will only do what you desire."

We were called to begin the next act. Celio, who generally watched the slightest movement of his sisters with cautious and jealous eye, had not noticed our absence. He was strangely agitated. He seemed absorbed by his rôle. He finished it most brilliantly, but he was sober and silent at supper time and during the conversation with the marquis, which lasted until three o'clock in the morning.

I slept quietly, and I had not the slightest reaction, no trace of uneasiness, hesitation, or regret, in waking. I must say, that since the morning of the day before, Mademoiselle de Balma's two hundred thousand livres income came upon me like the blow of a club. I did not want to marry a fortune, and thus put an end to all my life-long dreams of ambition, which were to shape out a life for myself, and to have as partner of it a woman of my choice, taken from a station modest enough for her to consider herself rich in my success.

Besides, I am so constituted that the idea of struggling with a rival at even chances pleases and animates me, while the knowledge of the least disadvantage chills me and cures me miraculously. Is this prudence or pride? I do not know; but it is certain that in this respect I was the opposite of Celio, and instead of feeling driven, out of spite to my self-love, to dispute his conquest, I felt a noble pleasure in bringing them together and remaining their friend.

Cecilia sought me during the day.

"I am going to talk with you as if you were my brother," said she to me. "A few words of Celio's made me think you were in love with me, and I do not believe you are now. That is why I shall open my heart to you. I know that two months ago, when you knew me in a state bordering upon want, you thought of marrying me. I saw then the nobleness of your soul, and that thought of yours will always assure you of my esteem, and more still, of a sort of respect for your character."

She took my hand to her heart, where she held it a moment with such a pure and tender expression that I almost knelt before her.

"Listen, my friend," continued she, without giving me time to answer her. "I believe I love Celio! That is the reason why, in confessing this, I think I have the right to address you one humble, fervent prayer in the name of the most disinterested affection that ever existed. Flee from the Duchess de —; free yourself from her or you are lost forever."

"I know it," answered I, "and I thank you for having kept up this tender interest in me; but never fear—the fatal union was never made; your sweet voice, an impulse of your generous heart, and four lines of the divine Mozart, have saved me from that forever."

"Then you heard them? God be praised!"

"Yes, God be praised!" answered I, "for that magical song brought me here unawares, and here I have found my happiness."

Cecilia looked at me with surprise.

"I will explain all immediately," answered I; "but you have something to say to me, have you not?"

"Yes," answered she, "I will tell you all, for I desire your esteem, and without it my conscience would lack something of its repose. Do you remember that when last I saw you in Vienna you asked me if I loved Celio?"

"I remember it perfectly, and your answer also, and you need make no explanation, Cecilia. I know very well that you were sincere in answering, that you did not think of it, and that your devotion to him was only owing to Floriani's kindnesses. I understand what has taken place in you since then, for I know what has taken place in him."

"Thanks, O, thanks!" said she with emotion; "then you have not doubted my loyalty?"

"Never."

"That is the greatest praise you could claim for your own. But tell me, do you believe he loves me?"

"I am sure of it."

"And so am I," added she, with a divine smile and a slight blush. "He loves me, and denies it to himself; but his pride will bend, and I shall be his wife, for that has been my only ambition since I have become dama e contessa garbata. When you asked me, Salentini, I thought I should always be obscure and miserable. Why should I not have stifled in the depths of my heart all thought of being a wife to Celio, the ambitious youth, for whom the glory of wealth is an element of happiness and an indispensable condition of success? I should have blushed to confess to myself that I was moved at the sight of him; he would never have known it. I believe I did not know it myself, I was so resolved to pay no attention to it, and I am so accustomed and so capable in controlling myself. But my present fortune gives me back youth, confidence and right. Celio is not like you. I have read you both. You are calm, you are patient, you are stronger than he, who is only warm, eager and violent. He does not lack boldness and generosity; but alone he could not lead the wide and brilliant career he dreams of, and which is so necessary to the development of his faculties. He needs wealth, already acquired, and I owe him that wealth. Do I not owe it to Lucrezia's son? and even if I had loved you, Salentini, even if Celio's character should have made me tremble for my happiness, I have a sacred debt to pay."

"I hope," said I to her, smilingly, "that the sacrifice is not too severe. As far as it concerns me, it is none at all, and your supposition is only a kind consolation, which I am not so foolish as to believe. Concerning Celio, I believe that you are stronger than he, and that you will caress the young tiger with a firm and gentle hand."

"That may not always be as easy as you think," answered she; "but I am not afraid—that is certain. There is nothing which makes a person so courageous as to feel willing as I do to hold one's own happiness and life of small account. I will not magnify myself; I own that I am secretly delighted, and my courage is strangely rewarded by the love which speaks within me. No man can seem handsome to me after him, who is the living portrait of Lucrezia; no name illustrious or dear to own after that of Floriani."

"It is a fine name," answered I, "and frightens me. What if all those who own it should refuse to change it?"

"What do you mean? I do not understand you."

Then I related what had taken place between Stella and myself, and asked of her the hand of her adopted daughter. The joy of the generous woman was great. She threw herself upon my neck and kissed both cheeks. I saw her that day as she really was, sympathetic and motherly in her affections, in proportion as she was prudent and puzzling to the indifferent.

"Stella is an angel," said she, "and Heaven has blessed you a thousand times in inspiring you with such instant faith in her words. I know her well, and I know that among all Floriani's children, she is the one who has really inherited her mother's most precious virtue—devotion. She had yearned a long time for love, and, believe me, chances did not fail her; but her delicate and poetic soul did not feel that bewilderment of the senses which so often blinds young girls. She had an ideal, and for that she sought, for that she waited. You can see that by the freshness of her cheeks and the purity of her eyelashes. At last she has found him of whom she dreamed. Lovely Stella! exquisite nature! your happiness is dearer to me than my own!"

Cecilia Boccaferri took my hand again, pressed it with both of hers, and burst into tears, saying:

"O Lucrezia! rejoice in the bosom of thy God!"

Celio entered suddenly, and seeing Cecilia so moved and seated so near me, retired, slamming the door violently. He turned pale, and his features were frightful to look upon. It seemed as if all the furies of hell had entered his bosom.

"Let him say after this that he does not love you," said I to Cecilia.

I made her consent to Celio's suffering a little more, and then we went to find Stella and tell her of our interview.

Stella was at work in a tower, which served her for a studio. I was strangely moved in finding her painting, and to see that she had talent, genuine, tender, deep, charmingly true, for landscape, flocks, pastoral and simple nature.

"Then you thought," said she to me, as she saw my delight, "that I was to be an actress? O, no! I do not love the public any better than Cecilia, and I should never have the courage to face its gaze. I play here, as Cecilia and her father do, to help in the united work which furthers Celio's education, perhaps also Beatrice's and Salvator's, for those two children just now have a great passion for the stage; but you did not understand our dear Boccaferri, if you thought that he only looked upon us as future débutants. No, that was not his intention. He thinks that these dramatic attempts, in the free form we give them, are a salutary exercise to the synthetic (I use his word) development of our artistic faculties; and I believe he is right, for since we have studied it, I feel myself more of a painter and poet than I thought for."

"Yes, he is right," answered I; "and in these delightful attempts the heart too opens to poetry, sympathy and love. I feel it indeed, O my Stella! for the two days I have passed here. Elsewhere I should not have dared to love you so quickly; and in this sweet and happy waking of all my powers, I understood you from the first, and proved the depth of my own heart."

Cecilia took my arm and led me into Stella's and Beatrice's chamber, which communicated with the tower through a little passage. Stella blushed, but did not resist. Cecilia led me before a picture hung in my love's virginal recess, and I recognized a Madonna and child which I had painted at Turin and sold to a picture dealer two years before. It was very simple, but the feeling was true enough to cause me no shame in seeing it again. Cecilia had bought it for her young friend during her last journey, and then she told me that for two months, Stella, hearing the Boccaferri and Celio speak so often of me, had eagerly desired my acquaintance. Cecilia had cherished, without telling her, the idea that our union would be a beautiful dream to realize. Stella seemed to have divined it.

"It is true," said she to me, "that when I saw you pick up the cherry ribbons, I felt an inexplicably strange emotion; and when Celio came to tell us the next day that our picker-up-of-ribbons, as he called you, was still in the village and was named Adorno Salentini, I said to myself, foolishly perhaps, but undoubtedly, that my destiny was accomplished."

I could not express the sweet joy which was inspired in me by the young and pure love of a girl, still a child in freshness and simplicity, already a woman in devotion and intelligence. When the bell rang to call us to the theatre, I was almost beside myself. Celio read my happiness in my eyes, and was laughably ugly and brutal. I allowed myself to be almost insulted by him. I know not what passed that night. He seemed calmer to me and begged my pardon for his violence, which I generously granted.

I must say a few words about our theatre before reaching the denouement, which the reader knows beforehand. Almost every night we made some new attempt. Sometimes an opera; all the actors were good musicians, and each one played the piano in turn. Another time it was a ballet: the sober ones played in the pantomime; the younger ones danced from inspiration, with a grace, an abandon, and a fascination, which is sought in vain in the studied attitudes of the stage. Boccaferri was wonderful at the piano in such cases. He improvised the most brilliant fantasies, and at his pleasure ruled the dancers by his fancy to frenzy or to calm. He subordinated them to the requirements of the scene; for the pantomime, of which he was commonly the author, always had an action clearly developed and followed out.

At other times we attempted a comic opera, and we improvised arias and choruses; but who will believe me?—choruses in which there was no lack of harmony, and in which different remembrances of known operas were bound together by individual modulations, quickly conquered and understood by all. Sometimes we took a fancy to play a farce from memory, whose text we did not own, and which we remembered rather confusedly. These vague souvenirs had their charm, and for the children, who had never seen them played, they had all the attraction of originality. They conceived them, after a simple preliminary explanation, differently from us, and we were charmed to see them inspired with new characters and better scenes than those of the text.

We still had another resource left us—that of making good pieces out of bad ones. Boccaferri excelled in such discoveries. He rummaged his theatrical library, and found a happy subject to experiment upon in some obsolete, badly conceived and badly executed drama.

"There is no work so thoroughly bad and flat," said he, "in which there cannot be found some idea, some character, which may be of good service. At the theatre, I have heard a hundred plays hissed, which would have been applauded had an intelligent man handled the same subject. Then let us hunt everywhere, doubting nothing, and be sure we could go on so for ten years, and every night have some new material to invent and develope."

This life was so charming and so impassioned us that it would have seemed puerile and absurd to any one else. We did not weary of our pleasure, for the morning was devoted to more serious labor. I painted with Stella; the marquis and his daughter carefully fulfilled their self-imposed duties. Celio directed his brother's literary and musical education, and also that of our little sister, to whom I was also allowed to give a few lessons. So the hour for acting always came as a well-deserved and ever new recreation. The ivory gate always opened to us the sanctuary of our sweetest illusions.

I felt myself grow better from the contact with these fresh artist imaginations, whose key, whose harmony, whose soul old Boccaferri was. Lucrezia Floriani best knew and understood him, the most unprofitable and powerless member of formal society, the most complete, the most inspired, in short, the most artistic of artists. I owe him a great deal, and my gratitude to him will endure beyond the grave. I never heard any one talk upon painting with so much sense, clearness, depth or delicacy. While daubing coarse scenery, (for he painted very badly,) he poured into my mind a flood of brilliant ideas, which nourished my powers, and whose creative influence I shall always feel.

I was astonished that, since Celio was to become rich and noble through marriage with Cecilia, the Boccaferri should seriously think of his recommencing his débuts; but I understood it, like them, after studying his character, and recognizing his vocation and the superiority of his talent, which was unfolding day by day. "Are not great dramatic artists almost always rich at some time of their life?" said the marquis to me; "and does the possession of lands, castles and even titles disgust them with their art? No. Generally it is old age alone which drives them from the stage, for they feel that their greatest power and deepest joy are there. Well, Celio will begin where the others leave off. He will devote himself to Art at his leisure; he will be so much the more precious to the public, since he may make himself a rarity, and still be so much the better paid, as he cares least about it. So goes the world."

Celio was living in excitement, and these changes of fury, hope, jealousy and delight developed within him a terrible passion for Cecilia, a power superior in his talent. We let him pass two months in this burning ordeal, which he was strong enough to bear, and which was, so to speak, the natural element of his genius.

One morning, when the spring began to smile, and the pines were adorning their sombre branches with points of tender green, the lilacs were bursting forth in the warm breeze, and the birds were filling the thickets with their wild little cries, we were drinking coffee on the terrace in the first beams of a mild and clear sun. The lawyer from Briançon arrived and threw his arms around his old friend the marquis, crying out:

"All your debts are paid!"

These prosaic words were as sweet to our ears as the first showers of spring. It was the signal of happiness to us all. The marquis put the hand of his daughter in Celio's, and Stella's within mine. While I write these last lines, Beatrice is in the green house gathering white camellias and cyclamens for the bridal wreaths. I am happy and proud to call this dear child openly my sister, and master Volabù has just entered the castle as coachman.

NOTICE.

The "Castle of the Wilderness," (Château des Désertes) is an analysis of some ideas of Art, rather than an analysis of feelings. This romance has served once more to confirm me in the conviction that real things, transported into the domain of fiction, appear there but to disappear the instant their transformation becomes necessary.

During several consecutive winters, living retired in the country with my children and a few friends of their age, we had conceived the idea of playing comedy upon the stage, without spectators, not for our own instruction in any sort, but simply to amuse ourselves. This amusement became a passion for the children, and by degrees a sort of literary exercise, not without its use in the intellectual development of several among them. A sort of mystery, which we did not seek, but which resulted naturally from this little uproar prolonged far into the night, in the midst of an uninhabited country, when snow or fog enveloped us without, and when our servants even, neither aiding in the changes of our decoration nor in our suppers, left the house at an early hour entirely to ourselves; the thunder, the pistol shots, the rollings of the drum, the cries of the drama and the music of the ballet, all this had something fantastical about it, and the infrequent passers by, who caught a little of the sound afar off, did not hesitate to believe us crazy or bewitched.

When I introduced an episode of this kind into the romance just finished, it became there a serious study, and assumed proportions so much larger than in the original, that my poor children, after having read it, looked now only with chagrin upon the blue curtain and the costumes cut from paper, which had been their delight. But the exaggeration of fancy always serves some end; for they made themselves a theatre as large as the contracted place allowed, and in the following years got so far as to play themselves the pieces of their own composition.

Whether these were good or bad, is not a question of much interest to others; but did they not do better to amuse and exercise themselves in this way, than to pursue that wild Bohemian course of actual life, which at their age we find in all grades of society?

Thus fantasy, romance, imagination, in a word, has its indirect but certain influence on the employment of our life—an influence often fatal, say the rigorists, in bad faith or bad humor. I deny it. Fiction begins by transforming reality; but it is transformed in its turn, and infuses a little ideality, not only into the little facts, but into the great ruling sentiments of real life.

GEORGE SAND.

Nohant, Jan. 17, 1853.

TO MR. W. G. MACREADY.

This little work attempts to agitate a few ideas on the Dramatic Art. I place it, therefore, under the protection of a great name and an honorable friendship.

GEORGE SAND.

Nohant, April 30, 1847.

ANECDOTE OF ROSSINI AND FÉTIS.—"Must all this be learned—cher Fétis," asked Rossini, smiling, one day, when they met accidentally in the shop of M. Troupenas—"must all this be learned in order to compose?" Rossini alluded to the Treatise on Counterpoint and Fugue, by Fétis, which was lying on the counter, and which the author of Il Barbiere and Guillaume Tell was "feuilletant" with his fingers. "Ah, maestro!" rejoined the compiler of the Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, "you are a living proof of the contrary."

ANTIQUITY OF THE POLKA.—The description of the lavolta, in Sir John Davies's poem on dancing, "The Orchestra," (1596.) shows that it must have closely resembled the dance which we fondly boast of as one of the great inventions of the nineteenth century. It runs as follows:—

Yet there is one, the most delightful kind,
A lofty jumping or a leaping round,
Where arm and arm the dancers are entwined,
And whirl themselves with strict embraces bound;
And still their feet an anapest do sound:
An anapest to all their music, song
Whose first two feet are short, and third is long.

The "anapest" is exclusive; it points exactly to the peculiar nature of the polka—the pause on the third step. Moreover it appears that there is not an especial figure for the polka—so there was none for the lavolta; for it was classed among those dances—

Wherein that dancer greatest praise has won,
Which, with best order, can all order shun;
For every where he wantonly must range,
And turn and wind with unexpected change.

Who can doubt, after this, that the polka was certainly danced before Queen Elizabeth.

The Grand Organ Controversy.

I.

(From the Transcript, June 19.)

THE GRAND ORGAN FOR THE MUSIC HALL. Mr. Editor: The article in Thursday evening's issue, under the above caption attracted my attention, and I perused it attentively, hoping to learn the necessity of sending abroad for an organ of even "the size, power and quality of the famous instruments of the Old World."

I must confess the article confirmed me, as it doubtless has others, in the opinion that the organ should be built in this country, and in Boston. Inasmuch as a solicitation to the public is made for means to procure the instrument, will you allow me to express the hope that the necessity for such a course will be made more apparent, and if it can be shown that there is a sufficient reason for thus slighting our American manufacturers, I shall cheerfully contribute my portion to the proposed enterprise, or to encourage one of our builders to go abroad.

With the hope of obtaining further information, I beg leave to simply notice some of the points in the article referred to.

You say, 1st, "Travellers and musicians who have been abroad, uniformly concur in speaking of the great organs in France and Germany as superior, not only in volume, but in all other desirable qualities, to those heretofore produced in this country."

On reading this, I could but ask, is it so? and must confess, with an extensive musical acquaintance with persons born and educated, or who have travelled abroad, I could not call to mind one, possessing the necessary qualifications to judge in this matter, who would advise the course proposed. On the contrary, from some of the best German, English, and American organists, I have repeatedly heard expressed opinions adverse to such procedure.

Would our Hayter, Müller, Dr. Tuckerman, and others of this city, and Zundel, of European reputation, late organist at St. Petersburg and Frankfort, advise us to send abroad? And are the opinions of such, and others, to be disregarded? If our builders are not equal to the undertaking—a proposition I do not admit—would it not be better they should examine and give us the benefit of their discoveries in the old world? I understand some of them are ready to do so with far less encouragement than is often extended to our sculptors and painters. We have the best authority for believing that, stop for stop, our best American manufacturers furnish equal to those of foreign lands. To estimate the extent of their ability by their productions, is as absurd as it would be to determine the extent of the ability of our best architects, judging of district school-houses erected by them, in comparison with other structures of greater size and more pretensions.

If we mistake not, the principles involved in the construction of a $4,000 organ—especially as it regards tone—are no different than in one costing $20,000. Enlarged scales, increased pressure of wind, and additional stops, suited only to an organ of the required size, constituting the principal difference, but involving no principle in voicing which is not well understood by our best manufacturers.

When informed that to our builders many stops, "such as the vox humana and others," are unknown, I could not resist the inclination to walk among them, and learned at the first establishment I visited, that they were prepared to furnish any stop that was known in Europe one year since, and to warrant as good as can be produced abroad.

That I might be fully satisfied "that they were posted up," scales, drawings, &c., as received from abroad, were placed before my eyes, and the reason given for their non-production, "want of opportunity."

The second consideration named by you, the question of durability, is one I would dismiss by asking, why metals and wood cannot be of as good quality (and stand this climate far better), and be as well put together in this, as in any other country, provided—"aye! here's the rub"—a sufficient price be paid. This, I must believe, is seldom done, and our builders, especially those with a laudable ambition to excel, are, in their great works, generally obliged to pocket more loss than profit. Much could be said on this point, but I forbear. Your third consideration is susceptible of proof, and I hope it may be made to appear, but regret my inability to learn from our Boston builders that they have furnished the information necessary to enable any one to arrive at the conclusion named by you, that "it has been shown by actual estimates, a saving of $3,000 can be effected by employing a foreign builder.

These are matters that should be intelligently discussed, and while all will accord the right to parties of purchasing where they please, it seems but proper, if the public are to aid in the enterprise here, they should at least understand that the expenditure be judicious, and not such as shall secure to our citizens a standing monument of folly; or an instrument to which, be it good or bad, all will be required to award the palm of superiority, and thus, as has been heretofore done, insult our artists by holding up as a model for their imitation, because from abroad, an instrument equal only to the productions of our second or third rate builders.

The question is asked in Dwight's Journal: "Is it not natural to suppose that Germany, the musical land par-excellence—the home of great organists for centuries, the land of Bach, Mendelssohn, and Schneider, should possess the art of organ building in the greatest perfection?" It seems to me the same question would apply with equal propriety to German music halls, most of which are among the poorest of all Europe; or to piano-fortes. But where is the impartial musician that would not laugh at such suggestions. As well might we argue that the land of Goethe, and Schiller, must necessarily produce the best printing presses, or that in the Holy Land must be found the best exemplars of our Christian religion, because there our Saviour dwelt.

In conclusion, I would venture to express the opinion that an organ of double the size of either of the largest two organs in our city—the Temple and Williams Hall organ—would possess power and variety sufficient for a music hall, considerably larger than ours, and that 12 or $14,000 expended here will produce an organ which will equal in effect and beauty, and stand in order much better than any from abroad costing twice as much.

Can we be informed how it applies in organ building that a better instrument can be built abroad, owing to price of labor, and long practice? German stops voiced and finished there, have been imported by our builders, but have in no respect proved superior to those made and voiced here.

With the hope that more information may be elicited, and that we may see the names of some competent judges quoted in favor of this scheme, and that it may be made fully to appear that the mover in this matter in acting understandingly, with no other motive than a sincere recognition "that art is of no country and knows no kindred,"

I remain yours truly, MODERATO.

II.

(From the Transcript, June 20.)

THE ORGAN FOR THE MUSIC HALL—If the subject were one in which only professional musicians took an interest, there would not be much need of a rejoinder on our part to the communication in our paper of yesterday. But as it is desirable that the action of the committee shall meet the approval of the subscribers to the fund as well as of the public, we deem it necessary to restate our position, and adduce some facts to meet the objections made by our correspondent. The case rests upon these points:

1st, The testimony of musicians and travellers, both in past and present time, as to the superiority of foreign instruments, particularly those of Germany.

2d, The ability of American builders to imitate successfully these chefs d'œuvre, and 3d, The comparative prices.

With regard to the eminent organists of this city whose names are introduced by our correspondent, we should not think ourselves warranted in quoting their opinions separately, if we had them; but we have the best reasons for believing that nearly every one of the gentlemen named would advise the committee to go abroad. But there is other evidence, so much indeed, that it is difficult to select the most convincing.

Mr. Hopkins, who has recently written a History of the Organ, the best treatise extant, after a careful study of all the famous instruments, comes to the conclusion that the German builders are surpassed by those of no other country; in fact, in many respects. The opinion of this author will be conclusive with all who have read his book.

These concessions are from Englishmen, a race not without pride, and not wholly devoid of national prejudice. In this country we have had few such scientific tourists. But the foreign correspondence of almost every paper in the Union will be found to contain abundant testimony of the same purport. We have a pretty distinct recollection of the letters of Lowell Mason from abroad some years since, in which he expressed the most unbounded admiration for the German organs.

If it is claimed that the organs built in the United States are superior to those in England, then of course the testimony of Hopkins and Chorley will not be conclusive. But it would not be fair to cite any instances of either English or German manufacture now in this country, for the purpose of comparison; for there are no fair specimens here.

But it is needless, we think, to pursue this topic further. The fact we have stated is as well known as that Switzerland has sublime scenery, or that the Cathedrals of Cologne and Rouen are more imposing than the Old South Church.

Upon the second point we may remark that it is no derogation to our people to say that they have not as yet reached that perfection in art which it has taken the old world centuries to acquire. For the organ builder is as truly an artist as a sculptor; it is not a matter of mere mechanical skill. And then the spirit of the two countries is essentially different. We put up thin-walled houses; our furniture is made by steam; our churches are generally clap-boarded or stuccoed. We are more ingenious to save labor than to reach perfection. Very few things in America give one the idea of performance, solidity, and finish. The organs in Germany like the cathedrals, are the out-growth of the religious sentiment of the people; and all the resources of science as well as of art have been devoted to the improvement of the instrument. So much importance has been attached to the subject that for many years a royal commission has existed in Prussia for the inspection of organs; the materials, mechanism, and effects all passing under the most rigid scrutiny before approval.

Our correspondent asserts that an organ costing $4,000 involves all the principles in one costing $20,000. This statement, or rather the inference from it, we must be allowed to doubt. Place any number of school-houses together, and they do not make a church; unite churches and they do not form a cathedral. The spirit that conceives the instrument as a grand whole, and combines every thing in due order to embody that conception, is very different from that required to originate and complete the smaller model.

An American builder might be successful in a large instrument; all that ingenuity and mechanical skill could accomplish would undoubtedly be given to the work; but after all, when upon one side there is a moral certainty and upon the other only a probability, we do not think the committee would be justified in running the risk. This is really the great point; the question of price is comparatively unimportant.

We repeat that were the cost the only question, we should not hesitate; but since our statement has been doubted, we shall show that we have been far within the mark, instead of overstepping it.

Says Hopkins, whom we have before quoted:

"It must be obvious that there is a durable, complete, but costly way of building an organ, and an unsubstantial, incomplete and cheap way of making it. It is also equally evident that organ building may be viewed as a calling of high art, or treated merely as a matter of business; and it will be exercised in either the former or the latter spirit according to circumstances."

It is in this view of the matter that estimates are to be considered. To assume that an organ with any given number of stops is equal in value to any other of similar extent, would be as wise a judgment as that of Wouter Van Twiller, who settled a dispute between two litigants by weighing their respective books. We have before us minute and detailed estimates, procured by one of the Committee, who has thoroughly investigated this subject, both in this country and in Europe; the one from an eminent American manufacturer, the other from a celebrated builder in Germany. The estimates are for organs of similar calibre and quality; both being exclusive of the case, as that is to be made here. And instead of a difference of $3000, as we stated, the actual cost of the American instrument would be more than thirty per cent. greater than that of the one made abroad, including duties, freight, insurance, and other expenses. Perhaps the German builder is willing to make the instrument without profit, or even at a loss, for the sake of showing a specimen of his skill; but, nevertheless, the fact of the offer is as we have stated. We may readily find a reason for this difference in the price of labor; how great that difference is, every well-informed man knows. The market value of tin for the last five years has been at least ten per cent. less at the Dutch ports than in ours.

There are a great many points which we might make if we had not already exceeded our limits. We are persuaded that there cannot be two opinions upon this subject among disinterested men, when it is thoroughly understood. We believe that it is for the interest of the organ builders that we should have such an instrument as we have endeavored to describe. And we are sure that the views of our correspondent will not be sustained even by those who might be supposed most deeply interested. Several manufacturers have already expressed a desire to see a specimen of German or English skill, and one, at least, has subscribed in aid of the fund.

We wish we could quote further the remarks of Hopkins in regard to the price and completeness of an organ, because, emanating as they do from one who is wholly unconnected with the organ building business, and who, therefore, can be in no way interested in the issue beyond what is shared by all who admire true excellence, irrespective of country, they may be permitted to exercise some influence with those who have to weigh the merits of competing estimates, and because they really involve the permanent interest of the purchaser, the credit of the builder, and the progress of art, in equal degrees.

The Original Score of Mozart's Requiem.

BY E. F. EDLEN VON MOSEL,
Custos of the Imperial Library at Vienna.
(Translated for the London Musical World.)

(Continued from page 76.)

The first test consisted in comparing this score with the other MSS. of the Requiem contained in the Imperial Library. I have already announced, in my preface to G. N. von Nissen's Biography of W. A. Mozart (Jahrbücher der Literatur—vol. xlix., page 209), that of these MSS. the movements "Dies iræ," "Tuba mirum," "Rex tremendæ," "Recordare," and "Confutatis" were presented some years ago to the Imperial Library by the Abbé Stadler; the movements following these, however, viz.: "Lacrymosa" (and, indeed, of this only the first eight bars), "Domine Jesu," with the fugue "Quam olim," and "Hostias," were at that time the property of the Imperial Capellmeister, Herr Joseph Edlen Eybler, who has since then presented them as a donation to the Imperial Library.

The Abbé Stadler, in his disquisitions upon this masterpiece, often refers to the two above mentioned divisions of it. They are the same which he, and with him Herr André, of Offenbach (in his introduction to the second edition of the Requiem, page 1), is fully justified in calling "the actual scores." Herr André has, moreover (in his introduction to the first edition of the Requiem page 12), confirmed, by reference to his great collection of Mozart's MSS., that this master was accustomed, in writing vocal compositions with orchestral accompaniments, to make sketches of the score, in which the voice parts and mostly the instrumental bass were written complete, but of the other parts, the subjects were only occasionally indicated. It could therefore not appear singular, nor lessen the probability that the present complete score is an autograph of Mozart, that of a composition of such great importance there should be found such previously made sketches, besides the score under consideration.

* The remarks referred to may be found on page 22 of the present volume of this Journal (for April 19, 1866.)

The division from "Dies iræ" to "Confutatis," inclusive, is doubtless the same that the widow Mozart sent to Herr André, with a letter dated the 26th of January, 1801, requiring him to return it. (See his introduction to the first edition, page 5.) The filling up in a strange hand—not that of Süßmayer—of the blanks left by Mozart, which differs almost entirely from the score now under consideration, appears not to have been inserted at that time, since Herr André makes no mention of it. Why this instrumentation should have been added to the original sketches of Mozart, when the complete score was already published by Breitkopf and Härtel in Leipzig, is unaccountable.

The second division, from "Lacrymosa" until "Hostias," inclusive, is, (with the exception of two bars of the soprano in the "Lacrymosa," an attempted continuation in the same unknown writing, the melody of which differs completely from that of the score,) untouched by any strange hand; and exhibits only the hand-writing of Mozart, namely the voice parts and the fundamental bass, with occasional indications of the accompaniment for the violin and viola.

With these original sketches the complete score was in the first instance carefully collated. They were particularly appropriate for such a comparison, since the eight movements contain the same notes and the same words. The resemblance, with the exception of the shape of some of the capital letters in the writing of the text, was found to be perfect. Not satisfied with this, the greatest possible number of specimens of Mozart's hand-writing was brought together, for the purpose of inspection and comparison. We are indebted to the kindness of the younger Mozart, now living in Vienna, for the contribution of four large portfolios, which, besides several completed compositions of his celebrated father, contained above eighty fragments, belonging to nearly every stage of his career, including the last, as for example, several of the subjects in the operas Die Zauberflöte and La Clemenza di Tito. The Society of Musical Amateurs of the Austrian Empire had the courtesy to send in the original score of the before-mentioned cantata—"Laut erschalle uns're Freude"—which in respect to the time of its composition stands nearest to the Requiem. Herr Aloys Fuchs, the possessor of a great collection of valuable and interesting musical autographs, brought two small MSS. of Süßmayer, a quartet for male voices, and a minuet and trio for the orchestra; and I added to these the original score of a quartet of Mozart for flute, violin, viola and violoncello, belonging to myself.

Thus provided, several of the principal musical connoisseurs in Vienna, all familiar with Mozart's hand-writing, were invited to inspect and judge the newly acquired score.

This consists of thirty-two sheets of Italian (oblong) music-paper, of twelve staves. The sheets are not numbered according to the pages, but, as was the custom of Mozart, according to the leaves. The score is not sewn together, but in loose sheets, without any title page or wrapper. At the top of the first page in the middle is written, "Requiem;" on the right, "Di me, W. A. Mozart, m. p. 792" (sic); on the left, "Adagio." In the fugue, "Kyrie," on the second page of the seventh leaf is found a remarkable correction; namely, in the fourth bar Mozart wrote according to his first thought:—

He changed his mind, however, at the last quarter of the bar, crossed through this bar, to which the instrumentation was not yet written, and instead of it, continued the movement as follows:—

as this passage occurs in the edition of Breitkopf and Härtel. Commencing from the fugue, the accompaniment appears in a paler ink than the four voice parts and the fundamental bass, from which it seems that it must have been written at a later period. In both movements, in the "Requiem" as well as the "Kyrie," the fundamental bass is carefully figured, as was Mozart's practice in his compositions for the church, on account of the organ. The second page of the ninth leaf, though numbered 10, and the remainder of the sheet, is blank.

Upon the next leaf, which is not numbered 11, but again commences at 1, begins the "Dies iræ;" this is followed by the other pieces, of which the last, "Hostias," concludes on the second page of the thirty-third leaf; it is to be observed that leaf five is succeeded by leaf five-and-a-half; after this, from leaf six, the numbering is regularly continued.

The numbering of the pages commences again at 1 at the Sanctus; and the whole concludes on the second side of the nineteenth leaf, having the word finis at the bottom of the page. On the twentieth leaf, which bears no number, are written the parts for the clarini of the Benedictus, for which there was not room on the page in the complete score. On comparison of this manuscript with the edition of Breitkopf, it is found in all essentials most perfectly to agree with it. This edition must, therefore, have been printed from a copy of the score under consideration.

We may particularize the following important variations:—The time of the movement Requiem is in the MS. marked with C and in the printed score with C .

In the "Tuba mirum" the case is exactly reversed; also in this movement Mozart has assigned not only the first three bars, but the entire solo, to the tenor trombone, which in this edition is given to the bassoon.

Herr Rochlitz, who was an eye-witness of the following circumstances, kindly gave me this explanation of the discrepancy; at the time when the widow Mozart gave a performance of the Requiem in Leipzig for her benefit, there was not at hand a trombone player who could execute this solo as it stands in the original. Hiller, at that time cantor of the Thomas-schule, who conducted the performance, found himself obliged, at the rehearsal, to mark this alteration with pencil on the copy of the score before him. The same copy was afterwards made use of by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel for their edition of the work, and thus this passage still was allotted to the part of the bassoon in print. Besides this, the fourth bar of the "Domine Jesu" presents the following variation in the MS.:—

In the printed score:—

In Mozart's sketch of the score, mentioned above, to which I have carefully referred, the instrumental accompaniment in this passage is wanting the alto voice part, however, stands as it appears in the printed copy.

When the connoisseurs who had been invited had examined the score with the greatest attention, the majority of them declared it to be, as well in the formation of the violins and alto voice notes as of the letters, and even of the figures for the thorough bass, without doubt Mozart's hand-writing, while the comparison of this with that of Süßmayer, written hastily on small sized paper, scarcely shewed the most distant resemblance, but on the contrary, in some of the characters, as for instance, the treble and bass clefs, exhibited a marked difference. The minority of the judges admitted that the reasons which spoke in favor of the genuineness of the whole far outweighed the objections to it, which were grounded on the supposition which had prevailed till then, that only a portion of the genuine originals had ever existed. Upon being repeatedly requested, these parties expressed their doubts as follows:—

On the first page there stands under Mozart's name the date of 1792, whereas it is well-known that Mozart was torn from the world by death on the 5th December, 1791.

That Mozart could scarcely have been guilty of the consecutive fifths in the fourth bar of the "Sanctus." Amongst the most characteristic signs of his hand-writing are the naturals, which he always formed as a close square, narrower at the top than at the bottom; whilst in the "Dies iræ," and the instruments belonging to it, there appear naturals which are formed with an open square, agreeing with those in the leaves of Süßmayer's writing, which were laid before them.

Amongst the capital letters in the writing of the words, commencing from the "Dies iræ," the letters B, P, Q, R, and T, differ from those in the "Kyrie" and "Requiem," and in the two divisions of the sketch of the score.

Almost on every page there are, at the beginning of the top line, straight strokes and crosses, which may have been made by Süßmayer, in order to remind himself of Mozart's intentions.

[To be continued.]

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 28, 1856.

THE ORGAN FOR THE MUSIC HALL.—Where shall it be built? This question bids fair to create a good deal of discussion. Even in the heat of politics the newspapers find room for it. In music as in politics there is a great American party, who cannot listen with composure to the proposition that we must look abroad, to the old musical countries, for the great organ which shall be the pride of Boston and the rival in celebrity of those famous instruments at Haarlem and at Freyburg. Our Yankee confidence in our own powers—this ready assumption of ability to beat all the world in every (even if it be an untried) sphere of action—is surely one great element of success. And so much has been accomplished in the manufacture of pianos and church organs by our own makers, that we cannot wonder they should look with jealous eyes upon the withdrawal of so grand an opportunity entirely out of the usual competition between them. We believe the question is essentially decided in the minds of the directors, after long and careful consideration, and on what we conceive to be good grounds, and that the organ will be ordered of the best manufacturer in Germany. Yet the comparative advantages offered by American and foreign builders, is still an open and an interesting question, which all friends of music must be glad to hear discussed. Let us have all the knowledge, all the argument that can be produced on both sides. With this view we have copied on another page two pieces, pro and con, which appeared last week in the Transcript. Both are written in good tone and temper, and throw light upon the matter. We wish to keep a record of all the important points and stages in the controversy. We have not thought it necessary, however, to go back to the original article in the Transcript, which called forth the strictures by "Moderato," because the views therein contained were essentially the same which we have before imperfectly presented in this Journal. We may from time to time make comments and comparisons, but we do not see that we have much to add at present, since the last piece in the Transcript does its work so ably.

It is admitted, we believe, on all hands, that great organs, the greatest that the world knows, have been built and have stood for centuries, the wonder of the world, in Germany. Such organs have not yet been produced here. What our enterprising builders might do, with such outlay and such spur to ambition as are now offered, who shall say? The strong consideration is, that the thing now wanted, and at such great expense provided for, is too great a matter to be risked upon such mere experiment; that it is safer to go where these great works are no vague possibilities of the future, but monuments of actual achievement, and ever present models of a living art—an art in which the great traditions are kept fresh and vital, while it is open to all the new suggestions of to-day. That we shall one day build as great organs, as that we shall one day grow up to be as musical a nation, as any in the world, we do not doubt; but we cannot expect to jump the intermediate degrees. We are to climb step by step to that eminence. In organ building it can only help us onward, to have in the midst of us a model of the highest art attained to in the old world.

What is least appreciated thus far in the ingenious and Briarean activity of our new country is, the difference between Art and manufacture. This has been alluded to, in connection with the organ project, both by ourselves and others. It is not easily explained to those who do not feel it; and we do not wonder at the comment made by "Moderato" upon a remark of ours. He says the idea that the art of organ-building should naturally exist in the highest perfection in Germany, since that has been the land par excellence of the great organists and of great music, is as absurd as to look there for the best printing-presses because there lived Goethe and Schiller! The very confounding of Art and mechanism to which we referred!

The two things are not parallel. The great German organs were built, as the Transcript well remarks, in the same religious and artistic spirit, the same striving for perfection, the same thought of eternity and not of momentary effect, as were the old cathedrals; the spirit so well illustrated in Schiller's "Founding of the Bell." Such artistic piety in labor is scarcely known yet in our mechanic enterprises. The love of Art must pervade and inspire a people, before the machinery of Art will be itself artistic. Music must be in the people, music as revealed by the great Bachs and Handels, before they will build great organs in a deeper spirit than we build our factories and rail-roads; just as no mere materialistic skill in mechanism, nothing short of the deep Faith of those old times, can bid cathedrals spring up, winning the senses to the soul's side and refuting all our literal and soul-starving views of life. As to music halls, if they have not the largest and the best in Germany, it is because music there is chiefly listened to by smaller audiences where all are truly musical. It is not in the spirit of the old world society to have great popular concerts, as we do, for most miscellaneous audiences. Both systems have their advantages. As to pianofortes, it is only necessary, to see the force of that comparison, to understand one fact not generally known among our people, namely, that the square piano, which has been the chief boast of our makers, is scarcely looked upon in Germany as a legitimate instrument, but as a mere cheap substitute, sustaining about the same relation to the only true piano, the Grand, or Flügel, that the Melodeon or Harmonium here does to the organ. It is not said the Germans have no good grand pianos. Finally, if Palestine has ceased to be the Holy Land in more than name, it is not equally clear that Germany has ceased to be the musical land, in the sense necessary to our argument.

Musical Tales and Romances.

We confess to a great liking for works of the imagination, providing they are the offspring of a truly creative and poetic mind, and make no pretensions as history. So long as the writer deals with imaginary men and women alone, we have patience, and in most cases sympathy, with him, though he be as wild as Hoffmann and Chamisso, as strange and weird as Poe, or the author of "Peter Rugg." But the case is very different when historical personages are made the subjects of fanciful tales, and Beethoven, Mozart, Handel, Bach, Corelli, Giardini, Rossini, and so forth, are dressed and tricked out in gaud and tinsel—are made the lay figures upon which weak—very weak modistes too, sometimes—display their want of skill and taste. When Hoffmann wrote his fanciful meeting with "Ritter Gluck," he carefully stated it to be an "imaginary circumstance"; and yet many have read that as history! German and French musical literature are full of these things, and poor Beethoven has been victimized to an extent incredible to any one who has not had opportunity to look somewhat extensively through the musical journals of Europe of the last thirty years.

We have had occasion two or three times in the pages of this Journal to warn our readers against giving the least credence to stories professedly historical, and our attention is directed to this topic again by noticing a story going the rounds, translated from the Courier des Etats Unis but which we have a dim impression of having seen and smiled at in some other quarter. A kind friend translated it for us several months since, but we could not with a good conscience abuse our readers with publishing that as history which has no foundation in fact whatsoever. We refer to a sketch entitled, "History of a Sonata."

This is the so-called "Moonlight" Sonata, in C sharp minor, dedicated to Countess Julia Guicciardi. Half a dozen words are sufficient to show the utter absurdity of the pretended "history" here given. First, it was not composed in Bonn, but at Vienna. Secondly, Beethoven was not in the low, miserable condition described by the writer, but flourishing in the height of his popularity and prosperity. Thirdly, the symphony in F was not written until some fifteen years after the publication of the Sonata.

The facts in the case, so far as we know them, we will give, in answer to an inquiring correspondent. The pecuniary condition of Beethoven during the years 1800–1–2–3 is sufficiently set forth in an article in this paper published April 22, 1854, and needs no further notice. All this time he was deeply in love with Julia Guicciardi, and the fantasia dedicated to her was understood, by those who knew him best, to be a musical expression of that love. Schindler intimates as much. Of any particulars connected with the immediate labor of composing the work, no record is to be found. Beethoven's beautiful Sonata, Op. 26, with the "Marcia Funebre," had hardly become known in the Musical circles of Vienna, when Cappi, one of the publishers of that city, displayed upon his counter two new sonatas, both given as one Opus—Op. 27—from the same fertile brain. The first was a (we copy the original title) "Sonata quasi una Fantasia per il Clavicembalo o Pianoforte, composta e dedicata a sua Altezza la Signora Principessa Giovanna Lichtenstein, nata Langravina Fürstenberg, da Luigi van Beethoven. Opera 27. No. 1. In Vienna presso Giov. Cappi etc."

The second was the one in question: "Sonata quasi una Fantasia per il Clavicembalo o Pianoforte composta e dedicata alla Damigella Contessa Giulietta Guicciardi, da Luigi van Beethoven. Opera 27. No. 2. In Vienna presso Giov. Cappi etc."

The latter became very soon one of Beethoven's most popular works, was most highly praised by the critics, and the dreamy, half-sad first movement, so full of tender melancholy and a spiritual condition, which can find no expression out of music, obtained for it among the pianists of the city the title "Moonlight Sonata." This title no more came from Beethoven himself than the title of "Jupiter," given by the English to Mozart's Symphony with the fugue, originated with that great master. In short, Beethoven, like other men, took a musical thought, worked upon, thought upon it, studied it, elaborated it, wrote it out, corrected it, finished it to his own satisfaction, and then sold it to some publisher. The first thought was an inspiration; the thought as we read it on the printed page is the result of long-continued, persevering labor.

In the name of all who devote themselves to historical and biographical researches, we utter our protest against fanciful sketches of which real persons are made the heroes. The more facts, the more well-founded, characteristic anecdotes of great men in all stations, professions and arts, the better; the more imaginative, fanciful tales and sketches which are adapted to the improvement of musical taste and to the spread of a love for true music, also the better; but do not abuse the reader by presenting as history stories utterly without foundation, and which in every line are fitted but to deceive and convey false ideas.

"THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS."—We give to-day the concluding chapter of this beautiful Art novel by GEORGE SAND. We regret, and so will many of our readers, that it is so short. As many will desire to read the whole connectedly, we have had a limited edition struck off in a neat octavo pamphlet form.—Price fifteen cents per copy. To be had at this office, and at the periodical stores.

Musical Review.

POPULAR COLLECTIONS.

The American Collection of Instrumental Music; consisting of Marches, Quicksteps, Waltzes, Contra-Dances, Quadrilles, Cotillions, Polkas, Hornpipes, Reels, Mazourkas, and other popular music, selected from the works of various masters, and arranged for Wind and Stringed Instruments, such as the Violin, Flute, Clarinet, Cornet, Bugle, Violoncello, &c., without the Piano-forte, Organ, Melodeon or Seraphine. Volume 1. pp. 104. By JOHN W. MOORE, author of the "Complete Encyclopedia of Music," &c. Boston: Geo. P. Reed & Co.

This book is really a curiosity. There is a certain naïve benevolence as well as shrewdness in the plan. It breathes the broadest popular sympathies and shows acquaintance with the largest market. The author in his preface says:

In my intercourse with music loving people, I have noticed, that in every town and village, there are many young persons of some musical talent, who play upon the Violin, Flute, Clarinet, Cornet, Bugle, Violoncello, Piano-forte, Organ, Melodeon, or Seraphine—all of whom, for the want of a suitable collection of music, are compelled to practise alone. Nearly all the collections of Instrumental Music which have been, from time to time, published in this country, have consisted of simply Duets and Trios, with an occasional Quartette—and I know no work where the arrangement is for various and many instruments with Piano-forte accompaniment. It has been my object and in preparing this compilation, not only to supply a great and growing want, but so to arrange all the music in the work, that it may be made a source of pleasure and rational enjoyment to such as may meet together for practice, and yet so to write the parts, that one, two, three, four, six, eight, or even a large member may with equal profit use the music as occasion and circumstances may require. For the social circle, where there may be for use only a Violin or a Flute, or some one or two of the many instruments, the music here presented will be found agreeable with the simple Piano-forte accompaniment.

The design, thus stated, is a good one. To help the scattered musical ability throughout our country villages, our stray and isolated flutists, cornists, clarinetists and pianists, in a small way, to club together and perform in quartet, or in larger bands, the old familiar tunes which, with the Sabbath psalm tunes, constitute the chief musical pabulum of the beginning-to-be musical millions, is in itself a worthy object and may lead to something higher. In the execution of the plan two things are to be considered.

First, the selection of music, which is mainly of the very lightest, homeliest, commonest, most popular description. Here are all the old hacknied dance tunes, patriotic marches, &c., which boys whistle, and which village fiddlers, through successive generations, have employed to keep young feet in motion. Here are "College Hornpipe," "Fisher's Hornpipe," "Dashing White Sergeant," "Wait for the Wagon," "Jordan," "Yankee Doodle," and what not. Here, too, are various well-known sets of quadrilles, and some new ones, as also marches, with the letter "M" to indicate (are we to understand?) original authorship. Add a few bits from Rossini, Mozart, Strauss, and well-known "masters," (though nine-tenths of the whole can scarcely be attributed to any masters) and you have seventy or eighty pieces which surely cannot be complained of on the score of being "over-classical" or "scientific."

Secondly, the arrangement and treatment. This is partly explained in the above extract from the preface. Each piece is scored in six staves. The upper staff contains the melody, for first clarinet, or flute, or violin. Then comes a second treble for the same class of instruments. The third, or tenor, is for cornet, bugle, or third violin. The fourth staff is for violoncello, Saxhorn, or bass. The two lower staves are for piano, organ, &c. This score is extremely convenient, to suit all emergencies. Each part may be played by a single instrument or by enough to make out quite a band. If you have not four instruments (besides the piano), omit the third part. If you have but two, omit the second violin; or you may omit the piano part; and one is wickedly tempted to inquire sometimes: why not omit the whole? Such convenient dilution for conveying an imagination of music with so little of the material, reminds one of that cup of "tea" wherewith "the Marchioness" regaled Dick Swiveller. However, since the ingredients of a stronger cup are here, we will not complain of the suggestion for the benefit of those who like to take it weak. So far as we have noticed, the pieces are correctly and clearly harmonized. But we must wonder at the want of care shown in the case of the few pieces taken from real masters, to go back to the original sources. One of these is the well known Vedrai carino of Mozart, here called "Zerlina's Air." Why these alterations and curtailments, so great that the soul and beauty of the song are lost? It would be quite as easy to give it just as Mozart wrote it; far easier and far wiser than to undertake to improve on Mozart. So, too, another Mozart melody, the well-known O dolce concerto, which is here called an "English Glee"! Among the minor defects, we may mention the omission of all time marks, as Adagio, Allegro, &c.

On the whole, we doubt not that the book is fraught with a good deal of amusement and some musical profit, (which might be much more) for amateurs in the most rudimentary stages of the art in country towns. The idea of arrangements for such social practice, we have said, is good; and as the present is but Volume I, we trust the next will be well filled with music of a little higher and less hacknied order, such as will tend to raise the general taste somewhat, and that the "masters" will be freely drawn from, only provided that their compositions be presented without needless alteration.

The American School Melodist, and Pestalozzian Teacher, &c. &c. By JOSIAH OSGOOD. pp. 224. Boston: G. P. Reed & Co.

A useful little book for schools and classes, as well as for home circles. A large portion of it is devoted to elementary instruction on the inductive or Pestalozzian system; intermingling explanations with exercises, solfeggi and vocalizations arranged in attractive forms of rounds and tunes in one, two, three and four parts. This part of the work seems done with thoroughness and clearness. Then follows a collection of over a hundred simple children's hymns and songs, on all sorts of subjects, partly original, and partly selected and arranged. These are mostly written in three parts; i. e. for one or two trebles and bass.

The Golden Wreath, a choice Collection of Favorite Melodies, for Schools, &c. Also a complete Course of Elementary Instructions, upon the Pestalozzian System, with numerous Exercises, &c. By L. O. EMERSON. pp. 224. Boston: Oliver Ditson.

A book very similar to the above and for a similar object. The Elementary part covers less ground, but seems well arranged. The songs are of like variety of subjects, only the music is more familiar, consisting mostly of little pieces already favorites in schools and singing circles. They are harmonized in the same simple way for three voices. Every good addition to the stock of school songs should be welcomed; perpetual novelty in this department seems a more reasonable aim than it does in the matter of plain psalmody.

Musical Chat-Chat.

There has been music on the Common two evenings during the past week; as usual, a brass band of about sixteen instruments. What we heard the first evening was played in remarkably good tune and with careful expression; but many of the pieces partook too much of the doleful sentimental to affect the crowd much. Cheerful was the multitudinous clapping of hands when something like the "Eclipse Polka" or the "Anvil Chorus" struck up. The Verdi music takes well with brass instruments. On Wednesday again three pieces out of the ten or twelve were reminiscences of Travatore. O for a harmony not wholly brass! But with any kind of music for a magnet, it is good to see such happy crowds drawn to the Common these June nights. The scene is beautiful, and does away with a great deal of the day's dull prose.... In Providence, last Monday evening, a very successful concert was given by the "Musical Institute," under the direction of Mr. L. T. DOWNES, assisted by the "Beethoven Orchestra," conducted by Mr. W. F. MARSHALL, comprising altogether about 125 performers. The first part of the programme consisted of the Adagio and Allegro from Beethoven's first Symphony; the chorus: "The heavens are telling," by Haydn; a soprano duet with chorus, from Mendelssohn's Lodge-sang (beautifully sung, we are told, by Miss PRATT and Miss MORELL); a chorus for male voices: "The Praise of Jehovah," by Beethoven; the Trio: "Lift thine eyes," (finely sung by Miss CARPENTER, Miss MORELL and Mrs. WADSWORTH) and Chorus: "He is watching over Israel," from "Elijah"; and Chorus: "O great is the depth of the riches," &c., from "St. Paul." Part second was of a lighter character, including an overture by Weigl; two choruses from Ernani; a Sextet by Zollner; chorus from "William Tell"; selections from a light French Mass, by a quartet of voices; but ending with Handel's "Hallelujah" chorus. Mr. Downes, who is one of the best organists and teachers in the city, is full of zeal for good music, especially that of the great masters in the sacred style, and will do much we doubt not, to inspire a love for the best in Providence.... The many friends and admirers of Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS will be pained to learn that her concert tour westward has been interrupted by a pretty serious accident in Utica, N. Y., where, by a fall from her horse, her ankle was broken.

From the "Statistics of the Industry of Massachusetts for the year ending June 1, 1855, prepared from official returns by FRANCIS DE WITT, Secretary of the Commonwealth," we glean the following facts pertaining to our speciality.—The number of Piano-Forte manufactories in Boston was 20; Pianos manufactured in the year, 6,122; capital employed, $941,000; all other musical instrument manufactories, 10; value of instruments manufactured, $1,984,700; capital, $102,100; persons employed, 1,248. The value of the musical instruments manufactured that year in the whole State is set down at $2,295,680. Of this Boston alone claims $2,004,700.

Still they come! Another musical journal greets us from Chicago, the second from that city. It is called The Western Journal of Music, and announces its determination to make itself the musical journal of the great West. It is a neat print of eight pages, promising music hereafter, and is published once a fortnight by R. G. GREENE. WM. H. CURRIE is the editor. The more the merrier, if they will only serve the cause of Music, and not merely music trade. The Introductory article augurs well.... The German Musik-Verein at Milwaukee has worked well in the cause of music. According to the annual report of the secretary, the following operas were performed during the past year: "Freyshutz," twice; "Norma," "Czar und Zimmerman," "Stradella," also twice. Besides this, they gave a grand concert once a month. The operas of "Don Juan," and "Daughter of the Regiment," are now in rehearsal.

The Criterion tells us of a new musical prodigy, one Signor VALLO, a Philadelphian. "He is a professor of magic, of ventriloquism, and of the violin, and for the receipt of a ridiculously small sum, promises to send by mail, to any given address, full instructions in either of these elegant accomplishments. According to a contemporary, a 'celebrated composer' speaks thus of the violin performances of Signor Vallo: 'I have heard Paganini, Sivi, Vieuxtemps, Spohr, and many other great violinists, and I have thought that for power of tone, difficult execution, variety of sound, and management of the bow, nothing more could be done, but Signor Vallo surpasses them all. He draws more powerful tones from the instrument than Sivi or Spohr. His execution of the staccato, pizzicato, and harmonic passages is far superior to those of Paganini or Vieuxtemps. He executes the Carnival on one string, while at the same time he performs two distinct airs on the piano.'

Mr. CHORLEY, of the Athenæum, does not admire ALBONI's present singing, or dramatic efforts, so much as the critics we have quoted. Her performance in the Sonnambula, he says, "besides being singular to see, was dramatically null, and only partially effective as a piece of singing." "She was frequently out of tune." "In her final rondo the pleasure which her executive brilliancy must otherwise have given us, was impaired by the diversity of weight and quality of her notes—no two roulades being taken without a mixture of thick and thin, destructive of that flow of serenity which the music of Bellini's village opera demands." By the same writer we are reminded that we did not give due credit for the improvement in respect of shortness of M. BENEDICT's annual concert. Chorley says: "The giver seems this year wisely bent on surprising those who have been used to carry home to Germany the bill of his concert, as a curiosity, which, although it was printed, nobody there was expected to accept as a reality." We have already noticed symptoms at last, in the London concert criticisms, of getting weary of too much of a good thing, and several instances of moderation in the length of programmes, showing that John Bull's musical digestion is not of such superhuman capacity as we had so long supposed. . . . A flute of gold has been made in London for a gentleman in Australia. Its tone is said to have a certain superior richness, roundness and sonority, as compared with flutes heretofore made of box-wood, cocoa-wood, ivory, glass, or silver.

The European journals announce the death, at Florence of ADOLPH FUMAGALLI, a young pianist already highly distinguished, and who fairly promised to become one of the marvels of his time. His fine taste, added to a power of rapid execution quite unrivalled, rendered his performance with one hand an illusion far beyond the one string of Paganini; but the grand feature of Fumagalli's playing was mind; he was assuredly the most intellectual interpreter of the old masters that has been heard in Paris, and was considered as one of the best living interpreters of Chopin's music. He was settled in that city, and was on a musical tour in his native country when death surprised him in the midst of his artistical triumphs. On Thursday evening he gave a concert, which was attended by all Florence, and crowned with the most brilliant success; on Saturday he was no more—two little days between the plaudits of the public and the tomb! He was in his 27th year.

Advertisements.

WANTED.

A SITUATION as Organist, or Organist and Conductor, is desired by a Gentleman, who can give the best of references. Address H. H. B. at this office.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S COLLECTIONS OF GLEES,
MADRIGALS, PART-SONGS, &c.

Novello's Glee-Hive.

A Collection of Popular GLEES and MADRIGALS, in Vocal Score, with ad. lib. Accompaniment for Piano-forte. Complete in 3 vols. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt lettering. Price $2 each volume.

These volumes contain eighty-three of the best Glee and Madrigals by standard ancient and modern English composers. Among them will be found some of the finest Glee of Attwood, Calcott, the Earl of Mornington, Spofforth, Stevens, Webbe, &c. Each Glee and Madrigal is printed separately, at prices varying from 4 to 12 cents each.

Novello's Part-Song Book.

In One Volume, handsomely bound in cloth, with illuminated lettering.

This work consists of new Glee and Part-Songs, by the best modern composers—among others, Bishop, Benedict, Macfarren, Rimbault, Wesley, &c.—with reprints of some of the best Madrigals by ancient composers, and Part-Songs by eminent German composers, set to English poetry. Each Glee and Part-Song printed separately, at from 4 cents to 12 cents each. Vocal parts to the whole work, 25 cents each part; Vocal parts to separate Glee, &c., 8 cents per set.

Orpheus:

A Collection of Glee and Vocal Quartettes, by the most admired German Composers, with English Poetry.

This collection is principally for male voices. Twenty nine books, each containing about six Glee, in separate Vocal parts, with separate Piano-forte accompaniment, have been published, and the issue is continued—the new books being received by J. A. Novello immediately on their publication in London.—Price 88 cents each book.

The Musical Times, AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR, PUBLISHED (IN LONDON) ON THE FIRST OF EVERY MONTH.

Containing ANTHEMS, CHORALS, and HYMNS, or GLEES, MADRIGALS, and ELEGIES, for One, Two, Three, Four, or more Voices. Price 8 cents each.

A Monthly Journal, containing original articles by EDWARD HOLMES, Author of the "Life of Mozart," &c.; Short notices of Singing-Classes, Concerts, &c.; Advertisements of new and important Musical Works; and, in addition, three or four pages of Music. The alternate numbers contain Music with secular or sacred words. Price 3 cents each, or post-free, 4 cents. Nos. 1 to 48, (Vols. I. and II.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 49 to 96, (Vols. III. and IV.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 97 to 144, (Vols. V. and VI.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75. Either Vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, may be had separately, in paper covers, 75 cents each. Annual subscription to the Musical Times, 50 cents, post-paid.

J. A. NOVELLO,

No. 389 Broadway, New York,
And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Garcia's Complete School of Singing.

JUST PUBLISHED:—A Complete School of Singing, in which the Art is clearly developed in a series of Instructions and appropriate Examples, to which are added Exercises, written and composed by MARCEL GARCIA.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF
EDWARD L. BALCH,
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER,
Will be happy to give instruction in Piano-forte and Organ playing, and the Theory of Music. Address:—No. 8 Hayward Place. May 26. tf

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

Mlle GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE
—GIVES—
INSTRUCTION on the PIANO-FORTE,
And may be addressed at her residence, 55 Hancock St.

CARL HAUSE
OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S
Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,
Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.
Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line 10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line 5 cts.
For one column, (120 lines) first insertion . . . $12.00
do do each subsequent . . . $6 00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 222.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 5, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 14.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 232 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row, "
" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I. "
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
" G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Mozart's Father.

[We translate the following from the new biography of MOZART, by OTTO JAHN, of which the first volume has recently appeared in Germany.]

JOHN GEORGE LEOPOLD MOZART, the father of the great composer, was the son of a book-binder in Augsburg, and was born in 1719. Naturally gifted with a clear, sharp understanding, and a firm, energetic will, he at an early age resolved by proper intellectual culture to work his way up out of the limited circumstances of his family into a higher position; and he could boast before his son that this was only realized after a protracted conflict with unfavorable circumstances, and through earnest perseverance and most watchful prudence. His musical talent, which appeared quite early, must have relieved his studies, as it does with many. When the son visited Augsburg in the year 1777, he learned many things about his father's youth which helped to refresh the latter's recollections. Thus he writes to his son about his having sung while a boy as discantist in the cloisters of St. Ulrich and at the Holy Cross, and how afterwards he was able to make his appearance as a clever organist. * * * * *

Life had early led him into a hard school of privation, which gave a definite direction to his character and views of life. He had long been settled in the conviction that only by continual and intense exercise of his faculties and powers can man attain the goal set before him, either in spiritual culture or in social position. Accordingly, what stood out as the distinctive feature of his character was an unshaken conscientiousness and faithfulness to duty in all the relations of life, in great things and in small, whence an uncompromising severity in his requirements of others, but before all, of himself. This he shows in his official relations, as teacher and educator, and particularly in his religious deportment. He was a strict Catholic, who, however, recognized, not without admiration, morality and virtue in Protestants. Nothing does he fear so much as the injurious influence which a long stay in Protestant countries might exert upon the soul's welfare of his children; and occasionally too he makes efforts at conversion with an inward satisfaction.* All that the church requires of its professors he fulfils not only dutifully, but with zeal; he has masses read, buys relics, and so forth, where opportunity presents itself. There cannot be a doubt that herein he followed an unfeigned conviction.

Leopold Mozart was a man of real piety, which maintained itself through serious losses, under pressing circumstances, steadfast and unaltered; it was but the natural consequence of his education and his position that he knew no other ground, no other form for this pious disposition, but those transmitted in his church. With the same strict conscientiousness which he maintained in other matters, he fulfilled his duties also towards God and his church.

But it would be a great mistake were we to consider him a narrow devotee. On the contrary, he was endowed with a sharp, clear understanding, for whose many-sided cultivation he made extraordinary exertions, and he had a decided tendency and talent for criticism, nay even for ridicule and sarcasm. The hard and needy circumstances through which he had to toil so painfully, amid environments which he looked far beyond, led him very early to turn his criticism upon the practical relations of men to one another in their ordinary, for the most part small and pitiful relations, which he saw through so easily. And so he acquired the firm conviction that self-love and self-interest are the only springs of human action, on which one may calculate with certainty, and which may be employed with prudence; that to pre-suppose philanthropy and friendship is a folly such as seldom goes unpunished. This want of faith in men in personal intercourse, which he regarded as the highest result of practical experience, he sought also to impress upon his son, but with the smallest success. And in himself this gloomy view of life by no means stifled generous thought and feeling; in him, as in so many, the theory is sharper and more hostile than its application is in actual life. Where Leopold Mozart criticizes, where he analyzes men's ways of acting, he is sharp and shows himself possessed by no prejudices. In spite of his piety he expresses the profoundest contempt and utters the most bitter ridicule against priestcraft and priestly living;—he had opportunities to know both intimately. Quite as little did high birth and position dazzle him; with full consciousness he opposed to these the independence of true culture and ability.

* "Among my friends in London is a certain Sipruntini, a great virtuoso on the violoncello. He is the son of a Dutch Jew, but after travelling through Italy and Spain, he found that faith, its ceremonies and commandments, laughable, and he forsook it. Talking with him a short time since about matters of faith, I found from all his conversation that he was satisfied at that time with believing in one God, and with loving, first Him, and then his brother as himself, and living as an honorable man. I took pains to give him some idea of our faith, and I carried it so far that he is now agreed with me that of all Christian creeds the Catholic is the best. I mean very soon to make another attack upon him; one must step very softly in such matters. Patience! Perhaps I shall yet become a missionary in England."—Letter from London, Sept. 13, 1764.

But also towards those who stood most near to him, even to his beloved son, he remained still impartial. It is a remarkable spectacle, and one which had the most wholesome influence on Mozart's development, to see how the father never let himself be dazzled by the son, whom he loved as much as ever father loved a son, whose artistic genius he recognized with truest judgment, and admired and revered it as it continued to develop; how he never disguised from himself his weaknesses, but warned and blamed him with inexorable severity, and trained him up to systematic loyalty to duty. In this relation to his son the singular mixture of various peculiarities in Leopold Mozart's character with a clear, conscious ability, shows itself in the most pure and edifying manner: he has himself declared that the education of this son was the highest mission of his life. Meanwhile the warmth of his heart and disposition, his readiness to serve and to assist, were by no means limited to those who were united with him by the ties of nature; he shows himself a true and trusty friend, a liberal benefactor within the narrow limit of his means.

The efforts it had cost him to acquire only a tolerable position, the unceasing toil demanded merely to support daily existence, gave him a lively sense of the importance of a secure social position; and the more convinced he was that his son would hardly learn to attach enough importance to that, the more he strove by his own prudence and experience to help him. Remarks have been made in a tone of depreciation or of ridicule about the care which Leopold Mozart manifested about economical affairs. But such writers are unjust, partly in blaming him for what was but the necessary consequence of the straitened circumstances, against which he was forced to contend; partly in failing to see, that the correspondence, out of which we draw this knowledge, must have involved communications of this sort necessarily. At all events, if a certain anxiety here betrays itself, which was increased in later years by infirmity and hypochondria, still it is cast entirely in the shade by the rare union of general and musical culture, of love and austerity, of correct judgment and earnest fidelity to duty, which Leopold Mozart developed in the education of his son, who certainly without this never would have been what he became through it.

[To be continued.]

The Original Score of Mozart's Requiem.

BY E. F. EDLEN VON MOSEL,
Custos of the Imperial Library at Vienna.

(Translated for the London Musical World.)

(Continued from page 101)

These remarks, which prove with what extraordinary care and conscientiousness that examination was conducted, are to be explained in the following manner, by means of the MSS. of Mozart, already mentioned, which were collected for this purpose:—

As regards the date, 1792, it would be too bold a conclusion to suppose that Mozart purposed to have a transcript made for himself of this, his most important work, when it should be completed, before consigning the original to the person who commissioned him to write it, and which could not be effected before the first days of the approaching new year, and that in this expectation he wrote the date of the coming year upon the first page. This inscription can, however, be explained by another and more obvious probability.

Among the MSS. of Mozart contained in the portfolios referred to, there is a score of a concerto for a French-horn, with accompaniments for string instruments and two oboes, which Mozart composed for his friend Seitzel, a celebrated horn-player. At the end of this stands in his handwriting, "Vienna, Vener de Santo, die 6 Aprile, 1792." Evidently here 1792 is written in mistake, instead of 1791, in which year Good Friday fell upon the 6th of April, and thus it might also have happened with the date in the Requiem; although for my own part, I prefer the former solution of the question. Further, no one who designed to make a forgery of a MS. of Mozart would have added to his signature the date of a year in which he no longer existed. Nevertheless, it is worthy of remark that the Abbé Stadler did not notice this date, since if he had he would certainly have mentioned it, as we know, from his dissertations upon the work, that he copied the Requiem, Kyrie, and the Dies iræ "from the first written score, and the genuine autograph of Mozart," and, indeed, this not long after his death.

The consecutive fifths in the violins in the Sanctus, the effect of which is softened, and almost annulled by the contrary motion of the first and second violins, may have escaped the composer's attention in the ardour of writing, or may intentionally have been written by him as an exception that may well be permitted to such a master. Moreover, there might be quoted not a few consecutive fifths well known to me, from works of Handel, whom however no one would accuse of impure part-writing.

It is true that Mozart was accustomed almost always to write his rehearsals in the manner described above, and that this is indeed one of the chief peculiarities by which to identify his handwriting. It is, however, to be observed, that in the rondo for the Horn, before referred to, the open-shaped natural, exactly resembling that used in the Dies iræ of the score in question, appears throughout; and it is to be remembered that this Rondo and the Requiem were both written during the last year of Mozart's life. These open, unusual shaped naturals are, moreover, in the MS. under judgment, the less questionable, as they are not continued from the first page of the Dies iræ throughout the score, but from the second page of the sixth leaf the close ones which he usually wrote begin to be mixed with all the open ones, and are more and more frequently employed until folio 27, and they only appear from the 28th leaf until the end of the work.

With regard to the capital letters above referred to: in the MSS. of the four Portfolios are many examples of the B corresponding with those in the score under notice, and there is an R exactly like that in the superscription of the above-mentioned Rondo. The remaining letters in the Dies iræ to the end, do not precisely correspond with the MSS. with which they have been compared; on the other hand, the word finis, at the conclusion of the whole, might be supposed to be an impression from that at the end of the before-named Cantata of the 15th November, 1791.

What was meant by these little perpendicular lines and crosses, which either alternately or side by side, at greater or less distances, appear at the top line of almost every page, must always remain a problem which Mozart himself alone could solve. That, however, they were inserted by himself, and not by Süssmayer, is proved by their appearing not only in the sketches of the score of the Requiem, which are entirely in Mozart's handwriting, but also in many other vocal pieces in the portfolios, and even in instrumental compositions, for example, on every page of the original MS. of the beautiful sonata for the pianoforte in A minor, which Mozart wrote in Paris in the year 1778, and which is included in his collection.

With respect to the numbering of the pages, it is certainly remarkable that it is not, as in the sketches of the score, in connected succession; but, as is well known, Mozart wrote this work at interrupted periods, and probably was not at the pains of referring to the numbering of the previous portion, to ensure the regular succession of figures in the complete work, and so began numbering afresh each time he resumed the composition. At all events, the figures in the leaves exactly resemble those of the sketch of the score.

Finally, the question, why Mozart did not write the instrumentation from the "Dies iræ" to the "Hostias" inclusive, in the blank lines of the sketches, rather than make a new copy of the score, may be solved by a letter from his widow to the Abbé Stadler of the 31st May, 1827, wherein it is said: "It may be brought as a reproach to Mozart that he was not very orderly with his papers, and often mislaid what he had begun to compose; rather than spend time in seeking for it he preferred to write it out again; the consequence of this was that many things were twice written, the second of which was in no respect different from the one that had been mislaid; for whatever idea he had once worked out in his mind was firm as a rock, and never altered." It might certainly be objected to this, that such might probably be the case with shorter pieces or single movements, but was very unlikely to have been done with a long series of vocal movements.

What may be cited from the writings of the Abbé Stadler against the possibility of the present score being in the handwriting of Mozart, loses its power through the consideration, that throughout these workings, and even in conversations with myself, his intimate friend, he has never mentioned that he had once spoken with Mozart, or even with Süssmayer, on the subject of the Requiem.

The Abbé only knew, and only could know, what had been told him in the house of Mozart, and could only write so much as was there communicated to him. He was not even apprised, as appears from several passages in his writings, what became of the first movements—"Requiem" and "Kyrie"—after he had copied them. "It will probably soon explain itself," he writes, "into whose hands the first leaves of the original score, from No. 1 to No. 10, have fallen." And subsequently—"Two copies were immediately made, of Süssmayer's score; the MS. score of Süssmayer was sent to the person who had given the commission for the work, and probably, for his greater satisfaction, Mozart's original MS. of the "Requiem" and "Kyrie" may have been sent with them." In case it was intended thus to convince the person who gave the commission for the work, that Mozart had really composed it, it seems inexplicable that the two divisions of the sketches of the score, from folio 11 till 45, were not sent also, in order to render this conviction as complete as possible.

The well-known letter of Süssmayer to the Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, which has so often appeared in print, was still less calculated to make those waver in their opinion who declared the score to be Mozart's genuine handwriting, quite independent of the opinion of such connoisseurs as considered that he "had composed the 'Sanctus,' 'Benedictus,' and 'Agnus Dei,' anew"—of which further hereafter,—the credibility of this letter is destroyed by its first words, which contains a manifest untruth. He writes:—"in the 'Requiem,' as well as in the 'Kyrie,' 'Dies iræ,' 'Domine Jesu,' Mozart entirely completed the four vocal parts and the fundamental bass, as well as the figuring, but had only indicated the chief passages of the instrumentation."

I have already mentioned that the Abbé Stadler transcribed the first two movements, viz., "Requiem" and "Kyrie," shortly after Mozart's death, from his original copy. This transcript, as well as that of the "Dies iræ," has been in the possession of the Imperial Library for several years. Stadler says, in the Addenda to his Defence, etc.—"Should these original MSS. ever come to light, which is very possible, it will be proved that my transcript (of the 'Requiem' and 'Kyrie,') corresponds with them, just as the 'Dies iræ,' at present in my possession, corresponds with the sketch of the score." These original MSS. have been found, and the most complete scores produced of the transcript of the two first movements with Mozart's MS., which forms the division from folio 1 till 10 of the score in question, has proved itself; but this transcript contained, as is now seen in the original MS. itself, a score completed in every detail, of the "Requiem" and "Kyrie;" consequently these were not sketches of scores similar to the following numbers, and Süssmayer could not have had the slightest share in these two movements.

There remained, therefore, no doubts, or as good as none, as to the perfect authenticity of the newly acquired score; after many fruitless endeavors to obtain some more important MSS. of Süssmayer than the two already mentioned, the Freyherr von Lanog kindly supplied two from his collection, namely: a trio for soprano and two basses, with orchestral accompaniments, consisting of fifteen leaves, and an aria for bass with orchestra of ten leaves, both pieces designed for the opera La Serva Padrona, and both of the year 1793. If the resemblance of these scores to Mozart's handwriting generally, both as to the notes and the words, was almost incredible, it was still more perfect to that of the score of the Requiem commencing from the "Dies iræ." The capital letters P, Q, and T, which had been in vain sought for throughout the MSS. of Mozart in that particular shape, were here the only ones that appeared, and the slight deviations in the score from Mozart's general manner, that had been before regarded as unimportant, as well as the twice interrupted numbering of the leaves, now assumed a greater significance.

The longer and the more carefully the comparison of these two MSS. with the score was continued, the more confusing it became; the more so as, on the other hand, the latter presented many characters more peculiar to the handwriting of Mozart than to that of Süssmayer.

[To be continued.]

MUSICAL PLAGIARISM.—The London Athenæum has the following:

That ballad music is as curious in its origin and completion as ballad literature, we have frequently had occasion to point out. Where memory ends—where appropriation steps in—where creation begins—are so many questions, which, it appears, cannot be in music settled by a jury. Are all musicians great robbers, with or without being aware of the theft? Handel was, there is no doubt. Mozart picked and stole a little in a most poetical way. Beethoven, even, was obliged to Clementi, it has been said. Mendelssohn took from Beethoven in the overture of his 'Lobgesang,' and from Herr Lindblad in his second 'Zuleika.' Signor Rossini has gathered treasures from every one,—his crucible, however, having within it a magical power of transformation, so that oftentimes the thing which was put in as emerald has come out a diamond. If we turn from the Tritons to the minnows,—from creators to copy-right holders and copy-wrongs,—from melodies to memories,—the following extract from a late number of the New York Musical Review and Gazette will be found curious. It throws a light on the origin of some of our ballads, justifying all that we have advanced as to the extreme difficulty of ascertaining the paternity of tunes which belonged to days when there were no Gazettes to point out "coincidences." Here is the American paragraph:—

"A song lies on our table from the press of Messrs. —, London, received by a late steamer, the title whereof runs as follows: 'Bonny Jean, as sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, to whom it is dedicated by G. Linley.' The music of this song is, note for note, Wurzel's (George F. Root) very popular 'Hazel Dell.'"

—Our readers will not have forgotten the literal resemblance betwixt a song by Mr. Linley and one by Herr Lindblad, which a few years since gave rise to some correspondence in the Athenæum. It is a pity that even if international law has nothing to do with the matter, and even if courtesy be waved aside on such occasions a title like the above should have not been followed by the words "an adaptation of an American melody,"—supposing Mr. Root's tune to be Mr. Root's property, and not some French, Italian, or English melody naturalized and altered by emigration.

The Grand Organ Controversy.

III.

(From the Transcript, June 30.)

MUSIC HALL ORGAN. To the Editor of the Transcript: In again asking the favor of your columns, for the purpose of noticing the remarks in the rejoinder of the 20th inst., to an article by myself of the 19th, I take occasion to express a recognition of your former courtesy, and assure you that I would not thus obtrude myself upon your notice, but from the conviction that very incorrect views are entertained by many in our community, yourself included, as evinced by the rejoinder. In my remarks I would not be understood as expressing the least doubt that highly honorable and laudable ambition prompts the movers in their proposed action for procuring the Music Hall Organ, and believing myself to be incited by no less laudable motive, hope no such intimation may be again pointed at myself, as was contained in the article referred to, and which was, perhaps, inadvertently made, as no gentleman of the committee could feel more opposed than myself to any expenditure, large or small, that did not give full promise to ensure us an instrument, equal in point of merit to any abroad.

Knowing that a very large and respectable portion of our citizens entertain views similar to my own, and are equally desirous that reasons more satisfactory than have yet been adduced should be presented in justifying the proposed course, I sincerely hope that anything like evasion, will be avoided in the manner.

As you have chosen Hopkins for authority, to him I will refer in all cases where he is available, in sustaining my position, (relative to your comments upon my article) which I will notice in the order presented. I will first speak in reference to the opinions of the "eminent organists" named by me; from those who have had personal interviews with them, I cannot learn that any one of the number are advocates of the proposed course—but that the large majority doubt its expediency.

To show you were in error in the statement, "Mr. Hopkins comes to the conclusion that the German builders are surpassed by those of no other country," I will copy from his work, as follows:

"The modern German metal pipes" (which comprise at least five-sixths of all) "are made and voiced more nearly as in England"—from which it seems to me but fair to infer that the Germans recognize the English method as superior to their own; and in passing let me remark, that nowhere in his work does he award superiority of skill to the German builders, nor to the tone of their individual stops. The only indication of preference expressed by him is in reference to the use of more durable metal, and of the combination of stops contained in their organs of the last century, and almost entirely to these points are his remarks directed. Read the following: "The prevailing taste or prejudice, or both, of English organists run counter to the attempted advance of the most eminent builders toward the production of a complete and well-balanced organ." "Had Harris and Smith" (builders in England of the last century) "worked unfettered; there is little doubt the attributes of tone specified would always have been combined in as eminent a degree in their organs as in those of the great Strasburg builder." (Silbermann.)

Again, in speaking of a late English organ by one of their youngest builders, he declares it "unrivalled." The following is from John Crosse, Esq., F.S.A.:

"Notwithstanding the imposing enumeration of so many stops, the large organs upon the continent" of Europe "are inferior, in the choice and variety of them, to the best English instruments, a great part being merely duplicates of unisons and octaves, and some of them performing other services, such as turning wheels with bells, &c.; so that though 70 or 80 may be in sight, only 50 or 60 of them are actually used."

The important addition of pedals was first made by Bernard, a German, to whose countrymen we owe improvements of the instruments in bellows, stops, &c., and among whom its construction has always been a work of great repute, though in excellence of finish they have been surpassed by our English builders.

Such "concessions from Englishmen" seem to me so far the opposite, as so become claims for superiority.

The attempted advance alluded to by Hopkins was the introduction of Double Manual and Pedal Stops, and the opposition offered was probably not different from that which has since been encountered by our American builders—as I well recollect remarks made by some of our professors of music and organ builders, not at all complimentary to the modesty of one of our youngest New England builders—because of his presumption in introducing the equal temperament, and Double Manual Flue and Reed Pipes, contrary to usage and their approval. Hopkins goes so far as to intimate that to the lack of such stops in English organs, is to be ascribed the introduction of the "vulgar, trifling, and ridiculous voluntaries," which are "void of science, taste, and decorous gravity of style."

Much could be said tending to show that our artists—real artists, I mean, are now needing the same support and encouragement, as did Smith, Harris, and Snetzler a century ago. To your statement that not unfrequently letters from tourists, among which you call to mind some from Lowell Mason, contain expressions of "the most unbounded admiration for German organs," I will observe that as organ display is a business abroad, we should be cautious in attaching too much weight to such authorities, and think it well to bear in mind Dr. Burney in his comments when speaking of the Haarlem organ.

The world is very apt to be imposed upon by names—the instant a common hearer is told an organist is playing upon a stop resembling the human voice, he supposes it to be very fine; and never inquires into the propriety of the name, or of the exactness of the imitation.

The propriety of Dr. Burney's remark will appear by comparing the following quotation from "Encyclopædia Roret Facteur d'Orgues," with Mr. Mason's letter relating to the Freiburg organ—which all who have read will doubtless remember—showing as it does how easily one may be deceived, even of Mr. Mason's experience in the theory of music, although, as I understand, not claiming any particular or critical knowledge of either the tone or mechanism of an organ.

Extract Biographical. "Mooser, a celebrated organ builder, was born towards the close of the eighteenth century. His early works attracted but little attention from the public, and he was already advanced in years when he undertook the famous Freiburg organ, which achieved for him a European reputation. This instrument possesses some good qualities, but has likewise important defects, and perhaps in no small degree owes its great reputation to the talent of the distinguished artist who exhibited it, as well as to the self-interested stories which country hotel keepers relate to travellers in quest of the marvellous."

Extract Historical. "We cannot pass by in silence the famous Freiburg organ, as renowned for its vox humana, but far more extolled than it deserves. It is constructed after the German plan, as may be seen from our description. The foundation stops, and particularly the Gambas, Salcials, and Quintaton, are of a very good quality. It contains, however, but few reed stops, and their tone is rough and without brilliancy, insomuch that, to obtain effects analogous to those of the "full organ" in our (i. e., French) organs, it is necessary to combine all the stops, among which the "quints," "furnitures," and cornets produce great discord and an offensive quality. As for the vox humana, which has nothing peculiar in its construction, I attribute its exaggerated effect entirely to the acoustic properties of its situation, and to the skill with which the organist knows how to display it. This stop is placed in the lower part of the organ, behind a small front opposite to the great one, and opening into a porch through which you pass in entering the church.

The tones of the vox humana, as also that of the other stops placed upon the same wind-chests, must therefore travel through the porch before they can be diffused into the nave, whence they do not reach the ear until they are, as it were, purified of all that which is material in them, and then so weak that the imagination is sometimes obliged to supply the place of the organs of hearing. Finally, if there be added to this prestige that which follows from the selection of pieces performed by the organist, one must acknowledge that these transient illusions, under the influence of which impressive persons may find themselves, are rather to be attributed to association than to a direct imitation of the human voice. As to the rest, this organ has serious defects; the touch is hard; the wind undergoes great alterations, producing in the sound of the pipes a disagreeable shaking. In fact, the whole mechanism presents nothing wonderful, either in its general plan or execution. However, in spite of these defects, which must be noticed upon a careful examination, the Freiburg organ possesses some good qualities, and the skill of Mr. Nogh, who displays it, is not the sole cause of pleasure experienced from hearing it."

In another article, further comments will be made on this interesting subject. MODERATO.

IV.

(From the New York Musical Review, June 28.)

They are about to procure a noble organ for the Music Hall in Boston—one that shall rank with the greatest of the old world. * * * Boston has hitherto proved that her "solid men" are liberal in matters of charity, and the funds for so noble a purpose should not be wanting. The purchase of this organ was the subject of much thought, examination and comparison for two years past. A prominent member of the committee has visited the large organs and the most renowned factories of Europe, expressly on this errand, and specifications and proposals have been received and carefully considered, from all important quarters. The opinions of leading organists and men of judgment and experience have been duly weighed, and the determination arrived at is, to have an organ from Germany, most probably from the factory of the Messrs. Walcker of Ludwigsberg. On the score of economy this is well, but there are other reasons which render it equally advisable.

We have had most excellent instruments built in America, and have reason to be proud of the enterprise and skill of builders in New York, Philadelphia and Boston. But the German builders lead the world in this respect, and it cannot but be of advantage to art to have the master specimen of European organ-builders accessible to our own manufacturers as well as organists. We are rejoiced that this project has been started with such probability of being speedily carried out, and it is very right that Boston should have taken the lead in the matter. We trust that the organ will be procured, and that the committee to whom this matter is entrusted will not be prevented by want of means from procuring as grand and good an instrument as can be made. We have known the reputation of the Messrs. Walcker for some years, and know that they may be relied upon as capable and faithful. We should have every confidence in an organ from their establishment, but should recommend that the late improvements of the French and English manufacturers should be carefully examined, with a view to their incorporation in the instrument for the Boston Music Hall.

LONDON OPERATICS.—Our townsman, HARRISON MILLARD, the tenore, is in London, and has opened a musical correspondence with the Saturday Evening Gazette, over the signature, "La Spia." The following extracts pleasantly recall artists with whom we here are not unfamiliar. But think of a city haunted by Il Trovatore throughout this hot season!

I arrived in "the great metropolis" before nine, and went to the Drury Lane Theatre, where an English version of "Il Trovatore" was performed, and the American artists, Mr. and Mrs. Florence, played a farce and a comedy. Miss (Mrs.) Lucy Escott (Eastcott—somehow or other, artists have a strange fancy for changing or altering their name! why is it? she was born in Springfield, Mass.) sang the soprano part of the Trovatore with considerable effect. She is, I believe, the only bona fide American prima donna who has appeared with long continued success. It was, last night, the 48th performance of the opera, which is a pretty good run. I shall say more of her in future. Mr. A. Braham sang the part of Manrico with much effect. I hardly know whether to praise him most as an actor or a singer. The effect of the English adaptation was sometimes droll, as some of the recitatives were spoken and some were sung, and nothing could exemplify the incongruities of the stage more than when, in the duo with the Count, Leonora offers herself as a victim, if her lover is permitted to go free. The Count (Barytone) said: "Speak! and wilt thou?" Leonora screams to a note held thirty seconds, "I swear it," and the rest of the duo is sung. The stage, so artificial at the best, is only made to seem real by a stretch of the auditor's imagination, when we hear a chorus of forty or more, who sing, "Let's fly, or in a moment we are lost!" instantly made to forget, by a solo which lasts twenty or more minutes, the impending danger, and even to loiter round talking most unconcernedly about "matters and things in general," we can even imagine it real, forgetting its absurd incongruities; but the sudden change from singing to spoken dialogue requires still a greater stretch of the imagination, and destroys the equilibrium of the thing. To-night (Tuesday) Wallace's "Maritana" is to be done, with also the Florences, who say they are very homesick for Boston. They have been very successful here, particularly Mrs. F. To-night I have the choice of hearing Albertini (sop.) and Boucarde (ten.) (old Florentine acquaintances), Alboni and Beneviento, of American renown, in the ever-popular Trovatore at Her Majesty's Theatre, or Bosio, Mario, Ronconi, and Didiée, in Verdi's "Rigoletto," at the Lyceum. The question is soon decided in favor of the latter, and I will reserve for my next something about the artists now performing in London.

There are three Italian troupes of the first order, and two English troupes, besides about twenty concerts each day (excepting Sunday, when people do nothing but drink beer "on the sly," of all sorts, prices, and descriptions. There are however, from two to three million people in the city, and some of the artists ought to do well. The price to-night to the Lyceum is, in the parquette, only about $5.25, (£1 1s.) and in the amphitheatre or sky parlor only $1.75 (7s.) What would Americans at home think, if obliged to pay these prices for the opera? There would be few who would do as I intend doing to-night.

"Rigoletto" has always been a favorite opera with me, having heard it at least forty times in different parts of Italy when first produced three years since. On Tuesday at the Lyceum it was brought out in fine shape, having Costa at the head of the orchestra, with Bosio, Ronconi, Mario, and the ever-charming Didiée for interpreters. The theatre is quite small, about one half as large as the Boston, and not at all wonderful as regards beauty and elegance. The first, second and third rows are all made into private boxes, on the Italian plan, and the prices for boxes which contain from four to seven persons range all the way from \$20 to \$35. The parquette price is \$5.50, thus making it rather an expensive as well as exclusive thing. The voice of Bosio is one of the most sympathetic organs I ever listened to in my life, not even excepting the wondrous quality of Jenny Lind's; added to that she sings with all the perfection of Lagrange, which is saying everything. Such liquid, musical bubbles I never heard from human throat. She retains very pleasing recollections of Boston, and made numerous inquiries for old remembered friends, some of whom have, alas! finished their earthly career, for which she expressed much sorrow, and paid them many eulogies for their kindness to her when she was in Boston. She is deservedly the soprano of the present day, and in fact is "all the rage." Her rendering of the Cavatina, "Caro nome," was perfection, and called, even from Englishmen, a hurricane of bravos and a "bis." Ronconi is an immensely great artist, although he would not be appreciated in America. He sang nearly the whole opera, all the way from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ of a tone flat below the orchestral pitch! a thing which in America would grate upon our ears; but here they are accustomed to it from him. He is the operatic actor of the age, and does not neglect any of the by-play, which he does to perfection. Mario is the same good-natured, jolly, gentlemanly grand seigneur tenor as ever—always complaining of not being "in voice," and always distancing his competitors. His manner of singing is so natural, that he merely plays with his pearly notes and then tosses them away, as if saying, "There, take them; I am ennuied with having so many at my command." His "La donna é mobile" was "bis'd," notwithstanding his determination to sing it badly in order to avoid its repetition, as was also the "Quartet," in which he had a part, though a small one, with the sympathetic Didiée. They both express themselves warmly about Boston, giving it the preference over all the cities of the United States for musical taste, judgment, kind people and perfect theatres. It is at least gratifying to hear one's own home praised by nearly all the artists who have visited it.

At a dirty little theatre called Sadlers Wells, about as large as Burton's of New York, Mr. Sims, ed altri, have been doing English Opera. On Wednesday they gave "The Bohemian Girl." Mr. Reeves is the best English tenor, without any exception, that ever lived, and with the exception of "little Mario," the best voice and singer I ever had the pleasure of listening to. His "Then you'll remember me" was perfectly exquisite, and not only "made one quite forgive Balfe for having written it," but made one feel quite like asking for more of the same sort. He sang about a dozen quaint old songs in "The Beggars' Opera" the same evening, in fine style. I find he is not at all popular with the Italian artists. Is it because he was born in England? He is not going to the States at present; the plan has been abandoned. So the Yankees will have to wait until his voice is more worn ere they listen to his delightful performance.

The North Western Musik-Fest,

HELD IN MILWAUKEE, WIS., ON THE 19th, 20th, 21st and 22d of JUNE, 1856.

My dear Mr. Dwight:—I have just returned from Milwaukee, where I spent a few days, witnessing the musical performances of different German associations, which met there from almost all the North Western cities, as far South as Cincinnati, and North as far as St. Paul, Minnesota. It has been the custom in Europe for years past, and the custom has lately been adopted by the German singing societies in this country, to meet in a certain city for the purpose of forming grand choruses, and, all companies combined, to sing several select compositions. Such music as has been chosen by the Directors is previously forwarded to the different "Vereine" for practice, and with one or two rehearsals, is then produced by the mass of singers, forming one body. Each of the societies sing, besides, a piece of their own choice, and with an ambition scarcely equalled, every company is anxious to do as well as the best. The Germans call Milwaukee the "Athens" of America, and, leaving all other advantages out of the question, the musical zeal of its enlightened foreign population justifies the appellation.

I have for the first time since I left Boston, really enjoyed a concert; with few exceptions every single production was as near perfect as you can reasonably expect to hear. The visitors commenced arriving on the 18th, were received by a committee, and greeted with music by the domestic bands. The Germans of Milwaukee, famous for their hospitality, led them to their different abodes. Hotels and private houses were filled, hotel-keepers in many instances exhibiting the greatest liberality, accommodating as many as fifteen and twenty persons without charge, finding gratis all drinkables and eatables. The reception ceremonies, including a very appropriate speech by Dr. F——, being duly performed, the guests were invited to visit the opera on the evening of the 19th. Flotow's "Stradella" was executed by a corps of vocal and instrumental amateurs in such a manner, that there was no allowance needed on the score of the actors and performers being only dilettanti. The principal soprano, the wife of one of their eminent German citizens, sang admirably well; in fact, all the solo parts were so sustained, as to leave little room for criticism. Chorus and orchestra went well.

The principal concert, embracing the ensembles of the Milwaukee and the invited societies, came off on the following afternoon. The general choruses were perfect, and I was delighted particularly with "The Prayer before the Battle," and Salomo's Tempelweihe, both choruses for male voices, the latter with accompaniment of the orchestra. Speaking of the performances by the single associations, the lady society of Milwaukee, (The Frauenchor), who sang the chorus from Die Vestalin, and the members of the "Milwaukee Music Verein," who produced Die Nächtliche Wanderung, deserved the palm of the evening. All the productions of the "Vereine" from other places were, although not equal to those of the Milwaukee singers, yet very creditable.

On the following morning we had a Matinée Musicale, by the "Milwaukee Music Verein" exclusively, which formed the principal and most laudable feature of the festival. I give you the programme:

1. Beethoven's C major Symphony.
2. Aria for Soprano.
3. Concerto for Piano.
4. "Prayer of the Earth," Zöllner.
(Male chorus, with orchestra.)
5. Overture to Don Giovanni.
6. Aria for Soprano, from Oberon.
7. "The heavens are telling," from "Creation."

The execution of every morçeau was excellent, without exception; orchestra, choruses and solo parts left no wish for improvement. Fraulein H——, the lady who sang the air from "Oberon," possesses a powerful voice of great compass, and Milwaukee is justly proud of such an artist. The success of the Milwaukee Musikverein is mostly owing to the untiring efforts of their talented and energetic director, Herr HANS BALATKA, who also was the president and director of the festival. He is unassuming, and a gentleman of high intellectual qualities; and besides his marked capacity as a musical director, he is a very fine violoncello player. I have often listened with pleasure to a trio or a quartet, in which he sustains his part with masterly ability. Dr. F——, a violinist of the old German school, plays the violin parts in these classical productions, and is often more true to the interpretations of the composer than many of your modern artists.

By resolution, it was voted that the coming season, our "Garden City," i. e., Chicago, should be the place of meeting.

You see that, although far away from Boston, the city so famous for its liberal support of arts and science, we are yet having a treat now and then, such as any of your gourmands need not blush to hear.

The corners of our streets are to-day ornamented with those large sized posters, bearing the names of OLE BULL and his party. This, however, being no unusual occurrence and their productions nothing new to you, I omit particulars.

I am truly,

CHICAGO, Ill., June 27.

H. B.

Ristori's Debut in London.

(From the Athenæum, June 7.)

Every foreign actor who presents himself to new audiences ought to be regarded by all who think—as distinguished from all who stare—not altogether from their own point of view, but partly from his. The alphabet of pantomime—the vocabulary of tone—are entirely different in different nations. An Irishman shall be recognized by his shoulders—an Italian by his hands—a Frenchman by the closing of his mouth upon his r's or his vowels—a German by his bodily telegraphic signs. The Southern people are intense, self-abandoning, sudden, subtle, to a superfluity which, by those who are nothing save not home-bred, may be found startling, sharp, melo-dramatic. In proportion, too, as the gestures of Italian actors say much, the words they have to utter yield little, if taken abstractedly as words. There is little or none of the poetry of thought, however much of the passion of feeling, in Italian drama. For wit, the actor must shower abroad the buffoon exuberance of high animal spirits—in place of fancy, work out conceiti. As interpreters, their personality, which is more rich, more flexible, more self-sacrificing, than French, English, or German personality, suffices to fill up outlines—to color the sketch—to put flesh on the limbs of the skeleton, and speculative eyes into the sockets of the skull—and to impart to common stage rags and blankets the flow and sweep of the draperies of the grand school of sculpture.

Some preliminary remarks like these are called for as sequel to the perpetual comparisons betwixt Mlle. Rachel and Madame Ristori, which have heralded the Italian actress to this country. Those who are led by precedent, however—those who balance and stereotype and apportion—are invited to recollect how, on the appearance of the French tragedian, our Shakspearians were so busy in proving the poverty of Corneille (in place of trying to find out his riches) that they only gave a qualified praise to all that was most admirable in the new-comer, who devoted herself to a farm of drama not Shakspearian. Madame Ristori arrives fifteen years later than "the Muse of Israel." She comes to be judged by a public fifteen years less Siddonian, or Keanite, or Macready-ish—less exclusively insular, that is, and better taught the larger charities of Art by foreign intercourse—than were Mlle. Rachel's first audiences; yet, no less true is it, that while Madame Ristori comes to play to us—unless we be willing in some measure to play to her—her means of executing and expressing her conceptions run some risk of being misunderstood.

Never was actress more earnestly, passionately, gracefully Southern than Madame Ristori:—Southern in the self-forgetfulness of what may be thought of this or the other attitude or tone, provided either be true—Southern in an instinct for the beautiful, which harmonizes gestures the most hazardous and effects the most daring. Not merely the single sounds of her voice, but its gamut of unequalled range, have the music of Italy, in them. Her features are large and impressive, yet delicate in their mould. Her mouth is susceptible of a rare sweetness of expression; her eyes gleam with many different lights. She is above the middle height, and thin; but her demeanor is indeed queenly. We have never seen such a mass of drapery as she wears in 'Medea' so little of an incumbrance to the play of a figure—to the motion of arm and neck—to the gestures of the most rapid passion. Madame Ristori's delivery is admirable: never over-measured—never feverishly hurried. She may not pile up a tirade to a climax with the graduated and progressive force of her French compeer; but she throws a hundred tones into as many words, and this without affectation, and consequently without fatigue to the listener. In brief, to end these few general remarks, our public did well to welcome the gifted woman as she was welcomed on Wednesday. When Ristori's audience shall become more habituated to her style, it will welcome her yet more cordially, we believe.

A poorer tragedy, giving scope for the display of strong passion, was perhaps never upborne in triumph by an unassisted woman of genius than this 'Medea' by M. Legouvé. The Sorceress has been almost entirely forgotten. The cauldron of poisons is gratuitously hidden:—the cup of human tears is too largely emptied. The Colchican Princess has here little to distinguish her from any deserted woman who seeks justice, if not generosity, from her faithless lover,—and who, when all things (even her own children) turn against her misery and hunt her from among men as a creature noxious by reason of her agony, flings herself into revenge as her last resource. The baleful power of the enchantress, which should give at once a motive to Jason's faithlessness and a fearful emphasis to Medea's presence and pleadings, seems never to have presented itself to the French tragedy-carpenter. It may have been owing to Mlle. Rachel's disappointment in not being able to find this in the part, or to dig it thence by the resolute force of her divining will, that the French tragedian, who has such a small store of tenderness at command, shrunk from a character in which the very jealousy is to the last soothed by tenderness and chequered with hope. But the French dramatist, to compensate for the low flight which he has taken—for his total avoidance of those heights of the old fable, where the upas-tree groweth—has shaped the legend neatly into scenes and acts, ending each of the three with a mot for the heroine, in order to bring down the curtain with an attitude, an effect, and a tableau.

How must the heart of the author of so meagre a play be gladdened, after having been cast on one side by Mlle. Rachel, to be set in a high place by such an actress as Mme. Ristori! Not an instant or syllable of opportunity from first to last is neglected by her. From the moment when first she appears wending her melancholy way towards the sea-shore, and bearing in her weary arms the last treasure left her—her children—to her attitude of aghast horror when she is disclosed at the feet of the statue, looking down on the dagger which has avenged her, there is not a touch forgotten—not a point neglected. Let us particularly call attention to the growth of suspicion in her entire scene with Creusa, culminating in the menacing Vedremmo, which closes the first act:—in the second act, to the wondrous coolness of sarcasm with which she almost anticipates Jason's designs and expedients for disposing of her,—to the tone of half-encouragement with which she compels him to unfold his purpose, as if eager to have done with suspense, to see the snake uncoiled to its fullest length;—and, greatest of all, to her scene with her children, towards the close of the tragedy, when, on being permitted to choose one of the two as the companion of her exile, she finds that the hearts of both have been stolen from her by her rival, Creusa. These are but a few of the things to be studied in this magnificent piece of acting. We may return to it again to specify more. Meanwhile, in recording Madame Ristori's triumph, it is needful to record also that it has been won single-handed. The Creusa of the tragedy is tolerable,—the other members of the company are wretched.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 5, 1856.

The Great Organs at Hamburg.

The following descriptions of the noble instruments for which this ancient city has been so long celebrated, are taken mainly from the work of Mr. Hopkins, (Organist of the Temple Church, London, &c.) from which we have had occasion to quote before. They will, no doubt, prove interesting to our readers at the present juncture, while so much is being said on the subject of Organs and their construction.

Of the splendid structures at Hamburg, two perished in the great conflagration of 1842. Of the three which remain, that in the church of St. Michael is best known, and is also the most modern one. Silbermann, the celebrated organ-builder of Dresden, was first invited to construct it; which invitation he accepted; but he dying shortly afterwards, the execution of the work was entrusted to his principal workman, Hildebrand. This was about the year 1768. Matheson, the celebrated composer and theorist, left by will 50,000 gulden towards paying for this organ; which sum, however, did not nearly equal the amount expended in its fabrication. The disposition of its stops is as follows, viz:

GREAT ORGAN. 18 stops.

1	Principal, tin.....	16 feet.
2	Quintadena, wood and metal, 16 "
3	Octave, tin.....	8 "
4	Gedeckt, wood and metal.....	8 "
5	Gamba, tin.....	8 "
6	Gemshorn, metal.....	8 "
7	Quint, tin.....	5 1/2 "
8	Octave, tin.....	4 "
9	Gemshorn, metal.....	4 "
10	Nasat, metal.....	2 2/3 "
11	Octave, tin.....	2 "
12	Rauschpfeif, 2 ranks, tin.....	2 3/4 "
13	Mixture, 8 ranks, tin.....	2 "
14	Scharf, 5 ranks, tin.....	1 1/2 "
15	Cornet, 5 ranks, tin.....	8 "
16	Trompete, tin.....	16 "
17	Trompete, tin.....	8 "
18	Oboe, tin, from tenor f.....	8 "

CHOIR ORGAN. 16 stops.

19	Rohr Flöte, wood and metal, 16 "
20	Principal, tin.....	8 "
21	Principal, to fiddle g.....	8 "
22	Rohrflöte, metal.....	8 "
23	Flauto Traverso, wood.....	8 "
24	Klein Gedackt, wood.....	8 "
25	Octave, tin.....	4 "
26	Rohrflöte, metal.....	4 "
27	Nasat, tin.....	2 2/3 "
28	Octave, tin.....	2 "
29	Flach-flöte, metal.....	2 "
30	Quint, tin.....	1 1/2 "
31	Rauschpfeif, 2 ranks, tin.....	2 3/4 "
32	Cymbal, 5 ranks, tin.....	2 "
33	Chalameau, tin.....	8 "
34	Trompete, tin.....	4 "

UPPER WORK AND SWELL, ON THE SAME MANUAL. 20 stops.

Upper Work.

35	Bourdon, wood and metal.....	16 feet.
36	Principal, tin.....	8 "
37	Quintadena, wood and metal.....	8 "
38	Spitz-flöte, metal.....	8 "
39	Unda Maris.....	8 "
40	Octave, tin.....	4 "
41	Spitz-flöte, metal.....	4 "
42	Quint, tin.....	2 2/3 "
43	Octave, tin.....	2 "
44	Rauschpfeif, 2 ranks, tin.....	2 3/4 "
45	Cymbal, 5 ranks, tin.....	1 1/2 "
46	Echo Cornet, 5 ranks.....	8 "
47	Trompete.....	8 "
48	Vox humana, tin.....	8 "
49	Cremona, to tenor f.....	8 "
50	Glockenspiel, to tenor f.....	8 "

Swell.
51 Octave	8	"
52 Octave	4	"
53 Cornet, 5 ranks in the treble, 2 in the bass	8	"
54 Trompete	8	"
PEDAL, 16 stops.
55 Principal, tin	32	"
56 Sub-bass, wood	32	" tone.
57 Principal, tin	16	"
58 Sub-bass, open wood	16	"
59 Sub-bass, stopped wood	16	" tone.
60 Violine, wood	16	"
61 Rohr-quint, metal	10 $\frac{2}{3}$	" tone.
62 Octave, tin	8	"
63 Gedackt, tin	8	"
64 Octave, tin	4	"
65 Mixture, tin, 10 ranks.
66 Posaune, tin	32	"
67 Posaune, tin	16	"
68 Fagotto	16	"
69 Trompete, tin	8	"
70 Clarino, tin	4	"
ACCESSORY STOPS.
1 Tremulant to Great Manual.
2 Cymbalston.
3 Wind to Great Organ.
4 Wind to Choir Organ.
5 Wind to Upper Work.
6 Wind to Pedal Organ.

The case of this magnificent instrument presents a front sixty feet in height, and sixty feet in width. The 32-foot pipe stands in the centre, by itself, in an immense pilaster; the remainder of the 32-foot stop in two great concave compartments, one on each side, and every pipe is supported below by a base, and finished off above with a Corinthian capital, gilded, the pipes themselves forming the shafts, being of their natural bright silvery color. The organ is finely laid out inside, in four stories, to each of which free access is obtained by wide stair-cases with hand-rails. Passage boards occur in abundance, and any pipe in this immense instrument can be got at without disturbing a second one. The diameter of the 32-foot Posaune is 16 inches at the bell, and of the 16-foot Posaune, 10 inches. The CCCC pipe in the middle of the front is made of pure tin, is 35 feet 6 inches in length, weighs upwards of 960 pounds, and is 20 inches in diameter; the body of it was cast in one sheet.

The fine-toned organ in St. Catharine's church at Hamburg is said to be about 400 years old. It is not known by whom it was built. It contains 54 sounding stops, distributed among four manuals and pedals, and like the preceding has a 32-foot front of tin.

The organ in the church of St. Jacobi was built by the Abbé Schnitker, and was completed towards the close of the 17th century. It has 60 sounding stops, four manuals, and a pedal of 14 stops. The name of the builder of this excellent organ is held in great veneration in Germany, where his instruments are as highly prized for their stability as they are justly celebrated for their dignified and impressive tone. The Abbé Schnitker resided at a place about thirty-six English miles distant from Hamburg, in the Hanoverian territories, in a house that has gone by the name of the "Organ-builder's box" or villa, ever since.

The three fine instruments just noticed, says Hopkins, form most interesting objects for examination to an English admirer of the organ; not simply on account of the very distinct character of the tone of each, but because they so closely resemble in quality the organs of three of the most celebrated builders of that country of past times, and thus, therefore, picture to the bearer what the instruments of those builders would have been, had the art in England been in a more advanced state in their day.* The organ in the church of St. Catharine, which is the oldest of the three, he continues, is strikingly like Harris's in tone; clear, ringing, and dashing in the mixtures. That in the church of St. Jacobi calls to mind the instruments of Father Smith; resonant, solemn and dignified; with somewhat less fire than that at St. Catharine's, but rather more fullness. The organ at St. Michael's, the most recently constructed one of the three, is also the largest in scale; is less powerful than the others, but very musical and pleasing; and, in all respects, calls to mind the excellent instruments of Greene.

Athenæum Gallery.

TWENTY-NINTH EXHIBITION OF PAINTINGS AND STATUARY.

Two or three hasty visits to the picture-rooms have satisfied us that the collection this year is larger, more various and more interesting than we have had for some years. Besides the old familiar specimens, which are the property of the Athenæum, and which have so often formed the nucleus and sometimes almost the whole of the exhibition, including the ALLSTON works and studies, we have this time many valuable contributions from private collections, and from the recent efforts of a large number of our own native artists.

Of the former class great interest attaches to the contributions from our townsman, Mr. C. C. PERKINS, whose entire collection, it would seem, has been most generously placed here for the public good. It includes not only pieces with which he has thus favored us before, such as the "Dante and Beatrice" of SCHEFFER, but nine very interesting water color copies from RAPHAEL's Vatican "Stanze" frescoes, made by CONZONI and several of the best young Roman artists under his direction. These of course are pictures to be studied. Also a large number of good copies and originals, of which we have only room now to specify as particularly interesting an original drawing by MICHAEL ANGELO, called "The Lost Soul," a face of terrible expression, which suggests ideas of guilty passion ever renewing itself and tormenting itself in its own fire unquenchable.

The specimens from our own artists are uncommonly interesting, although several of the foremost names, as KENSETT and CHAMPNEY, are but poorly represented, and HICKS and others not at all. This department of the exhibition was placed under the direction of our Boston artists, and only at so late a day that they could only partially effect the arrangements they desired with artists in all parts of the country. As it is, we wonder at the rich results they have realized. Next year, we understand, the whole

* Bernard Schmidt, as the Germans write the name, brought over with him to England from Germany, of which country he was a native, two nephews, Gerard and Bernard, his assistants; and to distinguish him from these, as well as to express the reverence due to his abilities, which placed him at the head of his profession, he was called Father Smith.—Dr. Burney.

Renatus Harris went from Vienna to England shortly after the arrival of Father Smith in that country, and became his formidable rival.—Id.

Samuel Greene was an English builder of great celebrity, who flourished about the middle of the 18th century.—Ed.

exhibition will be placed under their charge. It could not be in better hands, as they have already given evidence, both in the selection and arrangement which now prove so satisfactory. We can but recall, almost at random, a few of the paintings that are well worthy the visitor's attention.

Of the landscapes the most brilliant and effective again, the most marvellous in execution, is a scene by CHURCH—one of our autumn forest views, in which the colors are so gorgeous as to seem at first exaggerated; but the more you look into the picture, the more you feel its truth. You can sit long before it, and recall golden October hours, when such excess of light and color seemed as incredible in fact as they do here in picture. In an opposite vein admire three sweet, cool, quiet little beach scenes by W. A. GAY. Most unpretending, truthful and refreshing little bits of nature. You see no paint about them—none of the vanity or mannerism of the artist. We have never seen a beach so naturally represented; with such a level sameness of subject, the artist has contrived to give us the far-sweeping and harmonious perspective, the exquisite blending of shore and sea and sky, the cool sense, the very color of the sand, the very atmosphere. It is at once the poetry and exact truth of seashore painting. There are some nice little "Pre-Raphaelite studies," as it is the fashion now to call attempts to copy the details of nature with a scrupulous exactness. Some grasses, leaves and flowers by a meadow brook-side, painted by SHATTUCK, have a microscopic truthfulness, so that you almost smell the fresh grass. He has also a study of rocks. And Mr. STILLMAN, of "The Crayon," a man religiously in earnest with his art, sends a small landscape, which, though cold in color, is singularly true in form and detail. We do not see that there is less poetic spirit in these careful transcripts than in more ideal and free reproductions. In a larger way, the "Bay of Naples," and other landscapes, by G. L. BROWN, a fine sea piece by HUNTINGTON, CROPSY's Newport scene, &c., &c., deserve notice.

WILLIAM PAGE contributes two admirable specimens of his ripest skill, both full length figures; the one being one of his wonderful copies from TITIAN, the "Bella Donna;" the other original, an Italian peasant girl, which has more sentiment and depth of beauty than appears at once.

WM. HUNT has two capital female portraits, besides those same specimens of his peculiar style, so strong and individual, in spite of a certain affectation of antiquity in their grey, rain-beaten color, which were exhibited last year, viz; the "Fortune-teller" and boy with the hurdy-gurdy. The head of a Capuchin monk, and portrait of a lady and child, by M. WIGHT, a young Boston artist of rare promise, (who painted the portrait of Humboldt, now at Cotton's) do him great credit.

There is a most lovely female head by E. D. E. GREENE, which hangs in a modest corner, so pure and sweet in sentiment, so transparent, sincere and substantial in its flesh color, almost Titian-like, that you are amazed to think what kinds of portraits sell and are famous, while the name of such an artist is scarce known.

ELLIOTT's portrait of Col. Kinney is admirable. There are fewer positively bad portraits than we remember in any miscellaneous exhibition, while besides so many noticeable new ones, there are the Washington heads by STUART, and two exquisitely beautiful female heads, the image of each other, on one canvass, by the same. Nor can one pass by the excellent crayon heads by LAWRENCE, of Longfellow, Everett, Tuckerman, and G. H. Calvert. The first and last, especially, are speaking likenesses.

We can but allude to some of the fancy compositions; to ROSSITER's three large voluptuously colored pictures, which hang fitly round about that Autumn scene of Church's. One is called "The Wise and the Foolish Virgin," one is "Venice," and the third "Primitive America." They are among the best of his peculiar vein of fancy, which is all of the rainbow school; his characters all seeming like inhabitants of some gorgeous sunset realm, and not at all of common day-light. "The Fortune Teller," by SANT, a London Art Union Prize picture, is another brilliant effect piece, which cannot fail to catch the fancy of the many. In a quieter way, enjoy the humor, the quaintness, and the honest love of luxury in color and in all things, which mark Mr. HAMILTON WILD's scene from "Don Quixote," and "Spanish Girl reading a letter."

There is much more of interest which we cannot even mention now. But the gallery will continue to invite us, and we may continue to report. The Sculpture room presents but little that is new, except some ancient bas-reliefs from Nineveh.

Musical Review.

SHEET MUSIC.

(Published by Oliver Ditson.)

Transcriptions of Favorite Melodies. By G. A. OSBORNE. No. 8. "Of what is the old man thinking?" pp. 7. Price 25 cts.

A moderately difficult piano arrangement of a sentimental, commonplace melody. The old man's thoughts, we judge, could not be very interesting. Even the elaborate variation of the song, when repeated, is more exercise to the fingers than edification to the mind.

G. A. OSBORNE'S Beauties of Scottish Melody No. 1. "Scots wha ha." No. 6. "Auld Lang Syne." No. 8. "Comin' thro' the Rye." pp. 7 each.

A page or so of introductory fantasia precedes each song, which is then simply played through, and then follows one tame variation. Well enough for practice, and not difficult. But neither variations nor preludes are such as might spring from a fertile musical brain, really quickened by the inspiration of the song.

Le Prophète; Fantaisie de Salon, pour le piano, par TH. ØRSTEN. pp. 11. Price 50 cts.

Here are reminiscences from Meyerbeer's great showy opera strung together, and varied in the usual fantasia manner; not at all, however, on the broad scale of the Thalbergian and Lisztian operatic fantasias. This one is comparatively literal and easy. The themes introduced are the first strain of the wild, fanatical song of Zacharias: Aussi nombreux que les étoiles, which is alternated with the second strain of the Coronation March; then the pastoral andante (tenor), in which Jean of Leyden sings of Un impero piu soave, which is given simply and with variation; and then some of the dance music, the pas des patineurs (skater's dance), &c.

Grand Coronation March (March du Sacre,) from Le Prophète. By MEYERBEER. Arranged for piano, for four hands. pp. 9. Price 40 cts.

A full and effective arrangement of this brilliant and famous march.

Six Songs without Words, arranged for flute and Piano, by WILLIAM FORDE. 25 cts each.

No. 5, the one before us, is the song: Einsam wandle ich, by KALLIWODA. The other subjects are to be partly from the same composer and partly from SCHUBERT. They will make pleasant pieces for young flutists and pianists of moderate skill, the melodies having a somewhat choicer flavor than those often used for the same purpose.

Revue Melodique, Collection des petites Fantasias, &c., for four hands. By FERD. BEYER. No. 1. Don Juan. pp. 11. Price 50 cts.

Here are dovetailed together into one piece, for four hands, (master and pupil) a succession of favorite themes from Mozart's opera. First a touch of Leporello's opening song; then the duet: La ci darem; then the dashing wine song: Finch' an del vino; then the minuet; and finally the serenade. The title page promises similar bouquets from Norma, Martha, Moïse, William Tell, L'Etoile du Nord, &c., &c.

Six Morceaux Elegans, for piano, upon favorite German Airs. By FERD. BEYER. No. 1. GUNGL's March, Krieger's Lust, or "Warrior's Joy." pp. 7.

The Melodien: Airs from Popular Songs and Operas, for Flute and Piano, easily arranged by CASP. KUMMER. Book I. pp. 13. Price 60 cts.

Odd title! Melodien means melodies; and probably the true English of this German collection of little pieces would be, "Melodies for Flute and Piano." However, judging from this Book I, the parlor flutist and pianist will find here just the melodies of song, dance or opera, which are most apt to please the fancy and haunt the memory of amateurs. It contains the minuet from Don Juan; Allegretto, from Zampa; Song: "When the May breeze," by Kreipl; the Prayer, from Freyschütz; Air from Preciosa; "Last Rose of Summer," "from Flotow's Martha," (!); Suono La Tromba, and Polacca: Son vergine, from I Puritani; "When the swallows homeward fly," by Abt; air from Le Pre aux clerics, waltzes, &c.

Twelve Recreations, or popular airs for Piano and Flute or Violin, with embellishments by RAPHAEL DRESSLER. No. 3. "Isabel." pp. 5. Price 25 cents.

Mozart's Songs, "Who treads the path of duty," (Qui s'adegna non s'accende); Bass Song from "The Magic Flute."

Another number of Ditson's beautiful edition of "The Favorite Songs, Duets and Trios of Mozart, with the original Italian or English words, and new English version; arranged from the scores of Mozart, &c., &c., by S. S. WESLEY, Mus. Doc." It is the famous bass song: In diesen heiligen Hallen, with which the name of every great German basso has been associated. A more noble, satisfying song for a true basso profundo could not be recommended. The arrangement (accompaniment) is excellent. But it would seem more natural to see the voice part printed in the good old bass clef, instead of the G Clef here used. And why not give the original German words, together with the English and Italian?

Suoni la Tromba: the celebrated Liberty Duet, from "I Puritani," by BELLINI. Translated and adapted by THEODORE T. BARKER. pp. 17. Price 75 cts.

More food for big lungs and deep voices. Here we have complete the "Sound the trumpet" duet, with the whole scena, the introductory movements: Il rival, &c., which we have heard sung and roared upon the stage so often, and with such fiore, by our Badialis and Marinis, and all the lusty pairs of baritone and basso. Many a pair of amateurs will welcome it.

MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY.—At the annual meeting of this Society, held at Chapman Hall, June 27, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year, viz: for President, Merrill N. Boyden;—Vice President, Sidney A. Stetson;—Recording Secretary, William Statton, Jr.;—Corresponding Secretary, Jerome A. Richardson;—Treasurer, Norman Morton;—Librarian, James A. Shedd;—Directors, William L. Brown, Edward L. Balch, Joseph W. Foster, Ellery C. Daniell and Charles T. Sylvester.

The Gazette says "We have had a new notion the past week in the shape of iced operas. This is an improvement, we can assure our readers who were not present, and Ernani cooled down and Lucia frigidified go very well. In winter it requires two tons of coal to keep the Boston Theatre warm, and Mr. Barry has been experimenting to see how it could be kept cool. By placing a few hundred weight of ice in the ventilators, the atmosphere was reduced 10 degrees, and with 500 weight, it is thought that the house can be rendered the coolest place in Boston."

It is the mission of Counts to marry prime donne; at least all the prime donne who have visited us have had Counts for husbands. Miss ELIZA OSTINELLI, of Boston, married a Count as soon as she became a prima donna; and it is reported that Miss HENSLEY, also of Boston, is engaged to a Milanese nobleman, a Count of course. The London papers, in announcing the engagement of Signora ALBONI, speak of her as "now Countess of PEPOLI." The Count Pepoli accompanied Alboni to this country.—N. Y. Times.

The N. Y. Churchman (May 2) has a letter describing the services of Ascension Day in St. Paul's Church in Albany. In speaking of the music, the following compliment is paid to a most faithful and enthusiastic servant of the good Saint Cecilia:

The music, under the direction of Mr. GEORGE W. WARREN, the excellent organist of St. Paul's, was very well worthy of special note. In this department there has been in this church a vast improvement within a few years. Mr. Warren, and a portion at least of the choir, are communicants, and it has been a great satisfaction to the lovers of true Church Music to witness the zeal and industry with which Mr. W. has devoted his genius and talents—for he possesses both in a more than ordinary degree—to promoting the true worship of God in the Church. In these efforts he finds a most effectual assistant in Mr. Whitney, who, through all the changes of years past, has been identified with every effort to promote true musical taste and skill in this congregation. The choir consists of four adults—Soprano, Mezzo Soprano, Alto, and Bass, and of some twelve boys, to whose instruction he very sedulously devotes himself. At the Service, of which we now speak, the Venite and Proper Psalms were given in plain song, antiphonally, and with very good effect. The Te Deum and Jubilate, with the Psalm tune (Ps. 123,) were of Mr. Warren's composition, and possess a high degree of merit, and show that he is studying in a good school. The responses to the Versicles and Amens were given by the choir, and it only needed that the rich and sweet voice of the officiating clergyman should take up the tone to have given us a full choral service. Indeed, to those who know his taste and ability in such matters, it seemed strange how he could help it. The usual parts of the Communion Service were given musically, and altogether the effect was much what it should be, to elevate the sentiments of the worshippers, and to aid their approaches to the majesty of heaven.

The Albany paper, from which we copy this, understands that the success of Mr. Warren in the management of the musical exercises of St. Paul's, has attracted the attention of the ministers of the various churches comprising the Western Diocese, and they have requested him to meet with them at Utica, to consult regarding such measures as will tend to improve their church music.

Music Abroad.

London.

MME. GOLDSCHMIDT'S CONCERTS. (From the Times of June 12.) The last but two of these entertainments took place last night, when Exeter Hall was crowded in every part by an audience whose vehement applause testified that Mme. Goldschmidt's popularity remains as great as ever. Among the other merits of this admirable artist, it must not be forgotten that her concerts have always possessed an intrinsic musical value; an admirable orchestra, an efficient chorus, and a programme in which classical music has largely preponderated, have been marking features in the Lind concerts. This is, indeed, a most important merit in a singer whose attractions are sufficient to draw crowded audiences, were she to sing only to a piano-forte accompaniment. This sacrifice of a large expenditure in the getting-up of her concerts is sufficient proof that Mme. Goldschmidt has that essential quality in a truly great artist, an abstract reverence for the art itself. The following was the programme of last night's concert:

PART I.

Overture, "Les deux Journées,".....Cherubini
Cavatina, "Di militari onori," Signor Belletti,
(Jessonda).....Spohr
Air, Mme. Goldschmidt (Armida, Act III. Sc.1) Gluck Fantasie on Themes from "Don Juan" of Mozart, with Orchestral Accompaniments, Violoncello, Herr Moritz Ganz (from Berlin).....M. Ganz
Duo { "Ebbene a te: ferisci," } (Semiramide) Rossini
 "Giorno d'errore," }
Mme. Goldschmidt and Mme. Pauline Viardot.
Concertstück, for Pianoforte, with Orchestral Accompaniments.....C. M. von Weber
 Mr. Otto Goldschmidt.
Scena and Aria, "Ah non credea," "Ah non giunge," (Sonnambula).....Bellini
 Mme. Goldschmidt.

PART II.

Choral Fantasia, pianoforte, orchestra, and chorus.....Beethoven
(Piano-forte, M. Otto Goldschmidt.)
Adagio—Allegro—Adagio—March and Finale, (Chorus.)
Duet, "Per piacer alla Signora," (Il Turco in Italia).....Rossini
 Mme. Goldschmidt and Sig. Belletti.
Air, "Prêtres de Baal," (Le Prophète).....Meyerbeer
 Mme. Viardot.
Morning Hymn, Solo and Female Chorus, the solos by Mme. Goldschmidt and Mme.
Viardot.....Spontini
Duo Concertante, for violin and violoncello, without accompaniment, Messrs. Leopold and Moritz Ganz (from Berlin.)
 L. and M. Ganz
Scotch Ballad, "John Anderson, my Jo."
 Mme. Goldschmidt.
Swedish Melody, "The Echo Song."
 Mme. Goldschmidt.
Part-Song.....Pearsall
Coronation March.....Meyerbeer

In the vocal selection Mme. Goldschmidt was heard to great advantage, the pieces in which she sang exhibiting the great variety of her style and the wide range of her studies. In the tranquil air from Gluck's Armide, the subdued pathos and tenderness of expression were breathed forth with a delicacy of refinement which evinced the possession of the most exquisite taste, while in the duets of Rossini and the scena of Bellini, the greatest difficulties of vocalization and the most elaborate tours de force in the cadenzas and interpolated ornaments were executed with a power and brilliancy, and an apparent abandon, combined with real self-control, which can only co-exist in the highest order of artist. In each performance Madame Goldschmidt was received with an enthusiasm as great as on any previous occasion. She was admirably supported by Madame Viardot and Signor Belletti, whose thoroughly artistic singing was not thrown into the shade even by the brilliancy of the Lind performance.

Mr. Goldschmidt appeared to more advantage in the choral fantasia than in Weber's concerto, which latter he played with a want of ease and freedom that somewhat marred the impulsive effect which should be given to it; nor was the passage playing always faultless. The choral fantasia would have been an effective performance but for the inefficiency of the chorus soprani, who were both out of tune and out of time on several occasions. The Messrs. Ganz are skillful players, with great command of the finger-board on their respective instruments, but their music was a mere collection of fiddling passages and reiterations of mechanical difficulties. As at the other concerts, Mr. Benedict was the conductor.

Advertisements.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)
389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S COLLECTIONS OF GLEES, MADRIGALS, PART-SONGS, &c.

Novello's Glee-Hive.

A Collection of Popular GLEES and MADRIGALS, in Vocal Score, with ad. lib. Accompaniment for Piano-forte. Complete in 3 vols. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt lettering. Price $2 each volume.

These volumes contain eighty-three of the best Glee and Madrigals by standard ancient and modern English composers. Among them will be found some of the finest Glee of Attwood, Calcott, the Earl of Mornington, Spofforth, Stevens, Webbe, &c. Each Glee and Madrigal is printed separately, at prices varying from 4 to 12 cents each.

Novello's Part-Song Book.

In One Volume, handsomely bound in cloth, with illuminated lettering.

This work consists of new Glee and Part-Songs, by the best modern composers—among others, Bishop, Benedict, Macfarren, Rimbaud, Wesley, &c.—with reprints of some of the best Madrigals by ancient composers, and Part-Songs by eminent German composers, set to English poetry. Each Glee and Part-Song printed separately, at from 4 cents to 13 cents each. Vocal parts to the whole work, 25 cents each part; Vocal parts to separate Glee, &c., 8 cents per set.

Orpheus:

A Collection of Glee and Vocal Quartettes, by the most admired German Composers, with English Poetry.

This collection is principally for male voices. Twenty nine books, each containing about six Glee, in separate Vocal parts, with separate Piano-forte accompaniment, have been published, and the issue is continued—the new books being received by J. A. Novello immediately on their publication in London.—Price 88 cents each book.

The Musical Times, AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR,

PUBLISHED (IN LONDON) ON THE FIRST OF EVERY MONTH.

Containing ANTHEMS, CHORALS, and HYMNS, or GLEES, MADRIGALS, and ELEGIES, for One, Two, Three, Four, or more Voices. Price 3 cents each.

A Monthly Journal, containing original articles by EDWARD HOLMES, Author of the "Life of Mozart," &c.; Short notices of Singing-Classes, Concerts, &c.; Advertisements of new and important Musical Works; and, in addition, three or four pages of Music. The alternate numbers contain Music with secular or sacred words. Price 3 cents each, or post-free, 4 cents. Nos. 1 to 48, (Vols. I. and II.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 49 to 96, (Vols. III. and IV.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 97 to 144, (Vols. V. and VI.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75. Either Vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, may be had separately, in paper covers, 75 cents each. Annual subscription to the Musical Times, 50 cents, post-paid.

J. A. NOVELLO,

No. 389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Garcia's Complete School of Singing.

JUST PUBLISHED:—A Complete School of Singing, in which the Art is clearly developed in a series of Instructions and appropriate Examples, to which are added Exercises, written and composed by MANUEL GARCIA.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THIS beautiful Art novel, by Mme. GEORGE SAND, just completed in the Journal of Music, for which it was expressly translated, has been reprinted in a neat pamphlet, and may be had at this office, and at the periodical and bookstores. Price 15 cents.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 55 Kneeland Street.

Mlle GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE
INSTRUCTION on the PIANO-FORTE,
And may be addressed at her residence, 55 Hancock St.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S
Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 223:

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 12, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 15.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I. "
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

Mozart's Father.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JAHN.

[Concluded from p. 106.]

It is much to be lamented that we are so uninformed about the education and the early life of Leopold Mozart. In Augsburg he was not successful, and his allusions at a later period to the life there are bitter and sarcastic. "As often as I have thought of your journey to Augsburg," he writes to his son, Oct. 18, 1777, "Wieland's Abderites have occurred to me; only one must have occasion to see in natura what one takes for pure ideal when he reads about it." We only know that he set about the study of jurisprudence with great perseverance, and that to this end he went to Strasburg; but failing to obtain a situation, he found himself compelled to enter the service of Count Thun, canon in Salzburg, as valet de chambre. But he had always pursued music thoroughly, had mainly earned his support by teaching it, and enjoyed especially a high reputation as a violinist; so that the archbishop Sigismund, in the year 1743, took him into his service as court musician, and afterwards appointed him court composer and leader of the orchestra, and in 1762 vice kapellmeister. *

Of the compositions of Herr Mozart which have become known in manuscript, the most noteworthy are many contrapuntal and church pieces; farther a large number of Symphonies, partly only à 4, and partly for all the usual instruments; also 30 grand Serenatas, in which solos for various instruments are introduced. Besides many Concertos, especially for Flauto traverso, Oboe, Bassoon, Horn, Trumpet, &c., innumerable trios and divertimenti for different instruments, he has composed also twelve oratorios, a mass of theatrical pieces, and even pan-tomimes, and especially music for particular occasions, such as a military piece with trumpets, drums, kettle do., and fifes, in addition to the usual instruments; a piece of Turkish music; a piece for a steel spring-keyed instrument; and finally a sleigh-ride piece with five strings of sleigh bells; not to speak of marches, nicht pieces, so called, and many hundred minuets, opera dances, and such small matters.

* * * * * In his later years he composed but little; circumstances in Salzburg were so unfavorable that he found no occasion to do more than his position required of him; the education of his children claimed his whole time, and after his son had come forward as a composer, he would not in any way compete with him. Nevertheless, he was honorably recognized as a composer in his day. * * * Schubart says of him: "His style is rather old-fashioned, but well grounded and full of contrapuntal insight. His church pieces have more value than his chamber pieces." * * *

But he gained his greatest and widest fame through his "Attempt at a fundamental School for the Violin," which appeared in the year 1756. It was the first and for many years the only work of its kind, and was spread abroad in numerous editions and translations: a proof that in its time it has done good service in the technical formation of the violinists. What makes the book still interesting is the earnest, sterling tone pervading it, and which reveals to us the whole man. Thorough, solid musical culture is what he would give the scholar; he must not only exercise his fingers, but must everywhere be clear about what he has to do and wherefore; "it is such sorry work to keep playing on at random, without knowing what you do" (p. 245); a good violinist must be even versed in rhetoric and poesy, to be able to deliver a piece with understanding (p. 107.) Hence he constantly insists that the scholar must not hasten onward before he is fully master of what he has to learn; he is very particular not to make the thing too easy and convenient to the pupil; let him exert himself and take pains. Thus he writes at the beginning of the exercises (p. 90): "Here are the pieces for practice. The more unpalatable you find them, the more I shall be satisfied; I tried at least to make them so;" that is, to prevent the scholar from falling into a habit of playing them by rote. The same sterling character appears in the direction of his taste. He requires before all an "honest, manly tone" (p. 54); the scholar must from the very outset draw the bow somewhat strongly, "so that by the firm pressing down of the fingers and strong holding on of the bow the organs may be hardened, and a vigorous and manly stroke may be acquired. For what can be more absurd than when one cannot trust himself to take right hold of his instrument, but scarcely touches the strings with the bow, (which oftentimes is only held with two fingers) and commences such an artificial whispering up to the bridge of the violin, that you hear only here and there a note hissed out, and cannot tell what he would say, since it all seems merely like a dream! Such air-violinists often are so rash that they make no hesitation about playing off the most difficult pieces at first sight. For their whispering, when they do not hit, is not heard; but that is what they call playing agreeably. The greatest silence seems to them very sweet. Must they play loud and strong? then all at once all art is gone" (p. 101.)

A simple and natural cantabile is also the highest goal for the violin player; so that one should imitate with the instrument, as much as possible, the art of singing; for this is "the most beautiful in music" (p. 50.) He is severe upon the virtuosos, who "think they bring wonderful things to pass if they give the right frizzle to the notes in an Adagio cantabile, and make a couple of dozen notes of one. Such note-stranglers expose their want of judgment in this way, and tremble if they have to hold out a long note or play a couple of notes in singing style, without intermixing their usual absurd and ridiculous trickery" (p. 50.) They are the more severely blamed, because they generally lack the means of knowing where they may introduce their ornaments without committing faults in composition; and on a suitable example he remarks:

"Here those bungling players, who want to twist up all their notes, may see the reason why a rational composer is indignant if the notes are not played simply as they are written." Other faults, too, are severely censured in the virtuosos, such as the incessant tremolo of players, "who shake continually on every note, as if they had the unintermittent fever," (p. 238) or "the continual intermixture of the so-called flageolet tone, producing a ridiculous sort of music, entirely contrary, in its inequality of tone, to nature" (p. 107); or the hurrying and dragging of the tempo common among "virtuosos of imagination." I add the entire passage here, because it proves how highly Leopold Mozart valued the freedom of the master, while he rejected the wilfulness of the virtuoso.

"Many," he says, (p. 262) "who have no idea of taste, are never willing to observe equal time in the accompaniment in a concerted piece, but strive always to imitate the leading voice. Such are accompanists for bunglers and not for masters. When one has before him an Italian cantatrice or other such imaginative virtuoso, who never will produce what he has learned by heart in correct time, he really is obliged to drop out whole half bars, to save them from open shame. But when one accompanies a true virtuoso, worthy of the name, then he must not let himself be misled into dragging or hurrying, by that protracting or anticipating of the notes which said virtuoso can employ with great skill and expression; but he must always play on in an equal rate of movement; else what the concertist would build up, the accompanist tears down again. A skilful accompanist must thus be able to criticize a soloist. To a real virtuoso he certainly must not give in; for by so doing he would spoil his tempo rubato. But what stolen time is, can be better shown than written. But has one, on the contrary, to do with a virtuoso of imagination? then often one will have to hold an eighth note out through half a measure, till he recovers from his paroxysm; for he plays recitativo."

But technical development and cleverness is not with him the end, but only the means of reaching the higher goal. He wants the player to be able to transport himself into the feeling which pervades the piece to be performed, that so he may penetrate the soul of his hearers and excite their feelings. The most essential requisite to this end for the violinist he declares to be the stroke of the bow, which is "now an altogether modest, and now a bold one; now a serious, and now a playful one; now produces a soothing, now a composed and elevated, now a merry melody, and consequently is that medium through the rational use of which we become enabled to excite the passions at first indicated in the hearer. I understand," he adds, "when the composer makes a judicious choice; when he chooses melodies that correspond to each passion, and knows how to indicate the fit delivery." "For there are plenty of half-composers," he says elsewhere, "who do not even know how to indicate a good delivery, or who place the patch beside the hole. Many a half-composer is delighted, and conceives a new idea of his own importance when he hears his musical nonsense performed by good players, who know how to introduce at the right place a feeling which he never dreamed of, to bring in (as far as possible) characters that never occurred to him, and so make the whole miserable botch-work tolerable to the ears of the audience by a good delivery." We see he was a sworn enemy to halfness and to superficiality; thorough-going study in all the technicals and intellectual training to clear, reasonable thinking, are what he requires of artists with uncompromising severity. He grants, indeed, that rare natural talent sometimes redeems deficiency of learning, and that a man with the best natural endowments often has no opportunity to look about him in the sciences (p. 103); but that does not set aside the rule.

* * * These passages show us the views and principles upon which Leopold Mozart proceeded in the musical education of his son; and when to these we add his true insight into the freedom and superiority of a nature full of genius, we must confess that in the young Mozart's case genius was most fortunately met by the most admirable schooling. * * *

His style of writing is clear and sharp; his tendency to sarcasm so prominent that he bespeaks indulgence for it in his preface. And as in this book, so also in his letters you will recognize a man who has not only acquired a finer culture in his intimacy with the world (and indeed his travels brought him into the most varied intercourse), but who is acquainted with literature, has read intelligently and critically, and who maintains his independent, self-formed convictions with equal clearness and decision on æsthetic as on moral subjects.

With such a culture and such claims, Leopold Mozart must have felt himself somewhat isolated in Salzburg. Towards the court he had to fulfil the duties of his office, and the more scantily he was paid for it, the more care was taken to make him feel, like all place-holders, his dependence. In the noble families which lived in Salzburg, he was for the most part employed as teacher, since his instruction justly was esteemed the best; but no more intimate relation could grow out of this. To ingratiate himself by flattery Mozart was far too proud, feeling that these persons stood below himself in culture, through which alone could any equal intercourse be possible. However much his criticism and his sarcasm might be turned against them in silence, he had enough experience and composure not to risk his situation, to keep himself in favor and respect without loss to self-respect. Even towards his brother artists we find him unsocial. The most of them no doubt were hack musicians, without any higher interests or culture, with whom any special intimacy, intellectual or social, was not possible for him. Even with the most important musicians of Salzburg we find him in no closer intercourse than that involved in their office and the practice of their art. Their want of intelligence beyond the technical part of music, frequently, too, of moral culture, their loose and easy way of living, kept Mozart from them, and in no case does it appear that any ignoble passion influenced his reserve. We find a little circle, mostly of the middling station, with which the Mozart family maintained a social intercourse, which was in part, to be sure, quite lively and friendly, but which on the whole seems to have afforded more entertainment and amusement, and in the humblest way, than it did intellectual stimulus and culture. "The spirit of the Salzburgers," says Schubart (in his Æsthetik der Tonkunst) is exceedingly inclined to the low comic. Their popular songs are so droll and burlesque, that one cannot hear them without having his sides shake with laughter. The Jack-pudding peeps out everywhere, and the melodies are generally excellent and wonderfully beautiful." This tendency could not possibly have suited the earnest and critical Leopold Mozart, who was caustic indeed, but not comic.

The Original Score of Mozart's Requiem.

BY E. F. EDLEN VON MOSEL,

Custos of the Imperial Library at Vienna.

(Translated for the London Musical World.)

(Concluded from page 106)

In this state of things there appeared to remain but one course in order to arrive at the truth, viz., to resort to the still surviving widow of the great composer, and put the question to her, whether, according to her knowledge, he did or did not complete the work. Certainly several expressions of hers, which have at different times appeared in print, testified in favor of the latter; but through the recent discoveries this important fact was newly brought in question, and a decision from the first authority was in the highest degree desirable.

The estimable matron did not leave the question long unanswered; she replied on the 10th of February of this year (1839):

"If this score be complete, then it is not Mozart's, for he did not finish it, and in that case it will be easily seen what Süßmayer has written, because, according to my ideas, it would not be possible for any man to imitate the writing of another to such an extent as not to be detected. So much for this; and now I assure you that no one but Süßmayer completed the Requiem, which was not a difficult thing to do, since, as is well known, all the chief points were indicated, and Süßmayer could not go wrong."

Although this reply leaves several minor circumstances unexplained, and rests too much upon generalities to lead to a complete and satisfactory elucidation, it coincides, nevertheless, with the account given by the Abbé Stadler.

"The first piece," he says in his Defence, etc., "Requiem," with the fugue, and the second, 'Dies iræ,' until 'Lacrymosa,' are instrumented, for the most part, by Mozart himself, and Süßmayer had no more to do to them than most composers leave to their copyists. Süßmayer's work really commenced at the 'Lacrymosa.' But here, also, Mozart had written the violin parts himself; only from the words 'Judicandus homo reus,' Süßmayer continued them till the end. Just in the same way, in the third piece, 'Domine,' Mozart has himself written the violin parts wherever the voices are silent; and when the voices enter has plainly indicated the form of passages for the instruments. Before the fugue, 'Quam olim,' he has given to the violins two and a half bars to play alone. In the 'Hostias' he has written out the violin parts in the two bars before the voices enter, at the words 'Memoriam facimus,' throughout eleven bars, with his own hand. After the end of the 'Hostias,' there is nothing more seen of his pen than the direction, 'Quam olim da capo.' There is the end of the hand-writing of Mozart in the original MS. But let it not be believed that Süßmayer has introduced anything of his own in the filling-up of the instrumentation. He made himself a score, exactly similar to that of Mozart, commencing from the 'Dies iræ,' (which would be the one under consideration.) Into this he first transferred, note for note, all that the original contained, and then followed the indications of the instrumentation in the most minute manner, without introducing any new feature of his own."

The whole of this explanation is, however, rather a description of Mozart's scores of the "Kyrie" and "Requiem," and of his sketches from the "Dies iræ" until the end of the "Hostias," than a proof that Süßmayer really did what the Abbé ascribes to him, since he did not witness it, and, as has before been mentioned, never spoke with Süßmayer upon the subject, and consequently could only have derived these particulars from a third party.

Some of the cognoscenti, who were invited to the examination of the score, men of recognized authority, persist, however, in the opinion that the whole MS. is in Mozart's hand-writing, notwithstanding the letter of Madame von Nissen, just cited, and the declaration of the Abbé Stadler.

We see, indeed, from the following passage in Stadler's "Defence," etc., how little certainty Madame Mozart herself possessed as to Süßmayer's real share in the work of her husband:

"The widow told me, that after his death, she had found several small leaves of music upon Mozart's desk, which she had given over to Herr Süßmayer. What these papers contained, and what use Süßmayer made of them she did not know."

It can easily be imagined that grief for the early loss of her husband, and the sad position in which she found herself, with two young boys to provide for, left this unfortunate lady neither time nor calmness of mind sufficient in the first weeks after her bereavement to occupy herself with the papers, finished or unfinished, that Mozart left behind him. In what disorder these papers were, and for how long a time they remained so, is shown in another portion of the "Defence," when Stadler relates that the widow Mozart had requested him to put the remains in order, to which end she offered to send the whole to his house.

"I declined this offer," he continues, "and promised, as often as my time would permit, to visit her, and in the presence of Herr von Nissen, who lived adjoining, to look through all that the great departed had left behind him, to put it in order, and to make a catalogue of the whole. This was done in a short time. I named everything, Herr von Nissen wrote everything down, and the catalogue was soon ready."

I have seen a "solemn declaration," in the handwriting of Herr von Nissen, in which he states that he conducted the affairs of Mozart's widow, afterwards his own wife, "with the most perfect independence;" and that, therefore, the entire responsibility of the management of her business fell upon him. From the same document it appears, however, that he first made the acquaintance of the widow towards the end of the year 1797, and, therefore, as Herr von Nissen assisted at the examination and cataloguing of Mozart's papers, this cannot have taken place, at the earliest, until six years after the composer's death. Who can tell what advantage Süssmayer took of these papers, during the long time they remained unknown, to enable him to complete the Requiem, which merit he claims entirely for himself?

The opinion of celebrated musicians as to the extent of his claim, may be gathered from what has been expressed upon the subject. In the criticism on Breitkopf and Härtel's edition of Mozart's Requiem, from the pen of one of our first musical judges, Herr Hofrath Rochlitz (in the Leipziger Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, volume iv.), the assumptions of Süssmayer's letter, though not flatly contradicted, owing to the well-known delicacy and kindness of the critic, are quoted in such a way that any one may infer how little claim the writer can have felt him to possess to the merit of the work. "That Mozart's setting of the Requiem, as Süssmayer says at the commencement of his celebrated letter, is unique, and could not be paralleled by any living composer, is the belief of the writer." And further, "That the whole did not proceed from Mozart's pen, is proved, amongst other things, by the occasionally very faulty instrumental accompaniment." Then the page and bar of several of these places are cited, amongst which examples are the consecutive fifths in the "Sanctus" already mentioned. "That a great part of the instrumentation may be attributable to Herr Süssmayer is very possible," it is said further on, "but the known productions of Herr Süssmayer subject his assumption of an important share in the composition of the Requiem to a very stringent criticism." After Herr Rochlitz has illustrated the beauties of each single movement, he comes to the consideration of those which Süssmayer claims to have "originally composed."

"Sanctus, etc.—A veritable "Holy," full of lofty simplicity, grandeur, and dignity. What mortal has more powerfully expressed the repose of the Infinite and His immeasurable plenitude than is here done by the C natural doubled in the unison? (p. 130, bar 3)." "Benedictus, etc.—On account of the easily appreciable melodies and harmonies prevailing throughout, one of the simplest, most insinuating pieces, not only in the Requiem, but in the whole range of music. To signalize particular beauties above the rest, is, on account of the great unity of the whole, the almost unexampled similarity and equality of the single portions, the beautiful and manifold combinations and complications, not to speak of other qualities, impossible; one would quote the whole." "Agnus Dei etc.—This chorus, too, contains several individually distinct beauties. The critic would particularly cite the noble, touching, longing expression of the following prayer for eternal rest, which occurs in several different keys."

Here the passage to the words "Dona eis Requiem" is quoted at length.

Would any one believe that after what he has expressed above, with regard to Süssmayer, the critic would consider compositions which he deemed worthy of such praise, to be the work of this author?

Herr A. B. Marx (Berliner Musikalische Zeitung, 1825,—pp. 378, 379) expresses himself still more decidedly on the subject of Süssmayer's assumed additional compositions to the Requiem:

"Where is there, throughout the Requiem, a movement that contains not some trace of Mozart's creative power? Let us instance the 'Agnus Dei,' a movement that Süssmayer ascribes entirely to himself. Who would accredit him with the figure of the violins, the three phrases 'Dona eis Requiem?' If Mozart did not write these—well!—then he who wrote them is Mozart."

As regards the repetition at the end of the first movement and of the fugue, the opinion of Hofrath Rochlitz is elsewhere expressed in such a manner as to give no countenance to the supposition that Süssmayer's idea of giving thereby greater uniformity or unity to the work emanated from himself.

"At the repetition of the 'Requiem,' it is usual and quite in keeping, and was, moreover, most probably a part of Mozart's design to resume the first 'Requiem' abbreviated and with some slight modifications; and thus, if the recapitulation after this manner is not by himself, it is as he would have written it."

Thus the Abbé Stadler, who was intimately acquainted with nearly every work of Mozart, who was so imbued with the style and spirit of the master that three unfinished posthumous compositions by him (a brilliant minuet for pianoforte, a grand Kyrie, and a smaller Fantasia for pianoforte in C minor) were such that the most sharp-sighted connoisseur could not guess them to be anything but works of Mozart; how this man, I say, could receive the assertions of Süssmayer's often-mentioned letter with trusting belief it is difficult to conceive. Certainly I must confess I have myself been led away by this widely circulated belief, always, however, with the reservation that Süssmayer had formed the three movements that he claims upon motives that he discovered among Mozart's MSS. But my knowledge of Mozart's genius, boundless as my veneration for it is, was far inferior to that which my departed friend Stadler was proved to have possessed.

Besides the above-mentioned reasons against Süssmayer's claims to Mozart's Requiem, the following passage of a letter from the États vâleins von Nissen to the Abbé Stadler of the 31st May, 1827, will be of great weight.

"When he (Mozart) felt weak, Süssmayer often had to sing through what was written with him and myself, and thus he received formal instructions from Mozart. I still hear Mozart saying, as he often did, to Süssmayer, 'Ah, there stands the ox at the mountain again,—you are far from understanding that.' And then he would take the pen and write, what were, probably, the leading points."

And yet is it possible that Süssmayer should have completed this masterwork as we have known it for these forty years and as it stands in the MS. before us, that he should have created three of the chief pieces, and that the best cognoscenti—in spite of the belief of the majority that they were his—recognized them as Mozart's work.

However this may be, the score, acquired by the Imperial Court library, the only existing original score, is the same, from written copies of which the different printed editions have been taken; the same which after Mozart's death was delivered to the party who gave the commission for the work.

That this party was the Count Walsegg, is now generally known; that the score was consigned to him as not only Mozart's own work, but as his own handwriting seems beyond a doubt; since, although he gave the commission with the understanding that he should retain the exclusive possession of the work, he took no steps to prevent or complain of its public performances here and in Leipzig in the year 1792 for the benefit of the composer's widow; but upon the report being spread that it was not entirely Mozart's own, and that it was about to be published, he commenced an action, through his advocate, D. Sootschan, an esteemed lawyer of this city. In consequence of this the conference took place between this gentleman, Herr von Nissen, and, at the widow's request, the Abbé Stadler; which he mentions several times in his writings and in the appendix to W. A. Mozart's biography by Nissen, page 170, in a note.

It is singular that Süssmayer, whose death did not take place until the year 1803, was not invited on this occasion, for he surely ought to have been able to give the most reliable testimony, of any one living, upon the subject. The strange whim of Count Walsegg, to bring forward the Requiem as his own work, proved by the copies upon the title-page, of which this is stated, scarcely lessens the merit of the gentle intention to commemorate by this work the obsequies of his departed wife, but it entirely explains why the original score was so long kept secret.

The contentions as to the genuineness of the Requiem had either not reached as far as to the quiet rural retreat of the Count, upon his seat, Stuppach, or else he had no inclination to take a part in it.

Thus the MS. in question remained hidden from every eye until, in the year 1828, the Count Walsegg followed his beloved consort into a better world, whose death, thirty-seven years before, had called this chef-d'œuvre into existence.

After his decease, the MS., together with other music, passed into the hands of an amateur, who prized it too dearly to relinquish it, until at last it came by lawful inheritance into the possession of the gentleman from whom the Imperial Library has received it.

This library, therefore, possesses the original autograph score of the movements "Requiem" and "Kyrie" (leaf 1 till 10.), as well as the original sketches of the "Dies iræ" until the "Hostias" inclusive (leaf 11 till 45). All in fact that exists of the dying strain of Mozart in his handwriting; what remains, if not from his pen, came, surely, by every principle of art, from his brain.

The whole has found a worthy resting-place in the magnificent sanctuary of sciences and arts where it now remains. Charles VI., not only a connoisseur and patron, but himself a master in that art, of which this work is the most exquisite production, looks down upon it from the centre of this temple of the muses, which himself erected. There it shines for all time as the highest example of its kind, an object of admiration to artists, and of study to such disciples of the art as do not hold the quickly fleeting praises of a vain and capricious public to be a compensation for the approval of the few and the honorable appreciation of a grateful posterity!

[From the American Museum, published by M. Cary at Philadelphia, January, 1788.]

On Musical Pretenders.

TO THE EDITOR.

"Timotheus, with his breathing flute or sounding lyre, Could swell the soul to rage or kindle soft desire."

SIR—I was led the other day by a friend to a concert of music, in expectation of being enraptured, as he was pleased to call it, by the performance of many excellent masters. I am indeed a lover of music, but unhappily no connoisseur; I imagined I should be entertained with some of the works of Corelli, Handel, Geminiani, or the like; but alas, sir, after a good old overture, which I thought tolerably well performed, when my expectations were raised very high, up starts Signor Sombodini (a name Italianized, which I do not remember) to play a solo on the violoncello, which used to be known by the name of a bass-fiddle not half a century ago. He had indeed one part of Timotheus's skill; he did not a little enrage many besides me by producing some of his own composition, which, after Handel's, was nearly similar to a low farce after a fine tragedy; his performance, which a fat gentleman, who sat next to me, told me I should call his execution, was very good; but I never knew, till some of the connoisseurs informed me, that music was only intended for vile scrapers to make minced meat of, to show—what? why, truly, their execution! I had almost said, would they were all executed, connoisseurs and all. In the name of wonder, have we not solos of Corelli, Geminiani, and many other great masters, that every fiddler must be perking his own wretched compositions in our face? A gentleman was observing, that on all bass instruments the movements ought to be slow and solemn, and that they never were intended for jigs, &c., to which a personage of a very formal aspect made answer, in a kind of German English: "Sir, you know very little about the matter. That might be the case in Corelli's time, but now we have learned better things. In his time it was thought wonderful if a performer on the violin could reach E in alt, (I think that was the expression) but now we make nothing of going up close to the bridge." I did not doubt but the person must be a very great performer, who knew so much better than Corelli, and being told that he was immediately to give a specimen, I was all expectation, when behold! Mynheer mounted the rostrum, or what else you please to call it; and indeed, he did get up to the bridge, as he had promised, but (would you believe it?) he could not find the way down again, till during a great applause, raised by some of his admirers, he wisely threw himself down headlong; and upon my word I wished he had broken his neck—I mean musically, not mischievously—for he only intended to show his own execution.

I always understood, till lately, that music, I mean composition, was a very difficult affair; but was greatly surprised to find that every spark that has just learned the gamut on the fiddle or German flute, composes his own solos, trios, &c., &c., with the greatest facility, and, I do not doubt, can get up to the bridge much better than Corelli ever could, and come down again, like Mynheer, in a masterly manner.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

TIMOTHY PHRAM.

Philadelphia, May 6, 1787.

LIFE MUSIC.

(From the Monthly Religious Magazine.)

A band of Minstrels, separated
Far from their childhood's sunny land,
Before a vast assemblage, waited
The waving of the master's hand,
To bring forth harmony entrancing,
From strings diverse, with magic skill:
Meanwhile the fingers, o'er them glancing,
Evolved discordant notes at will.

For every hand was idly trying
The strength and tone of many a string;
And one breathed forth a mournful sighing,
And one a sharp, sonorous ring:
Anon a sweeter strain ascended,—
A clear and perfect chord, alone;
Then harsher notes again were blended
In strange and inharmonious tone.

And thus was wafted unto me
This thought of Life's mysterious things,—
How undeveloped harmony
Lies hidden in the mystic strings.
Perchance sweet notes sometimes arise,
Distinct, 'midst a discordant whole;
For, in each instrument, there lies
The music of a perfect soul;—

But for the Master's sign delaying,—
The key-note known to none but he,—
When each, his own part thenceforth playing,
Shall wake celestial melody.
Then, Soul! thy magic lyre inwreathing
With heavenly graces, wait thou still,—
The strain of sweet submission breathing
To the beloved Master's will,—

Until the prelude here is ended,—
The counter-notes of hope and strife,—
And thou, by angel-bands attended,
Shalt enter on the higher life:
Mystery and discord there subsiding,
Infinite harmony shall rise,
And, in thy Father's house abiding,
"Praise" be the chorus of the skies. H. W.

"The Greatest Singer in the World."

(From the London Musical World, June 14.)

The first of the three "Farewell Concerts" has been given. The next will take place shortly, and a few days onward the last. Those who are not fortunate enough to hear JENNY LIND on Monday, June 30th, 1856, will never enjoy the chance again—at least in England. On that day the greatest singer in the world will take leave forever of that public which has best understood, and most munificently rewarded her.

The greatest singer in the world!—Yes—the greatest singer in the world is JENNY LIND. We say so after mature consideration, based upon an experience of twelve years. A strict analysis of her qualifications, mental and physical, would probably lead to the disclosure of more faults and more beauties than could be detected in any other great artist. But we are not going to attempt any such thing. It is too late.

The voice of Jenny Lind is defective. None can deny that fact; and yet it is by far the richest and loveliest of sopranos. All the middle and lower notes are veiled; and these registers evince rather stubbornness than flexibility. But, as the singer warms into exertion, struggles with impediments, and vanquishes them, the voice issues forth like a conqueror in arms—or pierces brightly through the veil as the sun through a cloud. Jenny Lind's efforts to master her rebellious organ, remind us of a simile applied by Halifax to the search after hidden scientific truths, in which he compares the sensation created in the seeker to what must be felt by a man in the act of wrestling with a beautiful woman. One thing is certain. Jenny Lind cannot force her voice so as to render any of its tones harsh, or otherwise disagreeable. The more she demands of it the more it yields—as though its wealth was inexhaustible.* Thus, while she sings, the pleasure of the listener always increases—until towards the end of a long concert or opera, when the veil is thrown aside, and the voice becomes wholly free, it may be likened to broad noon-day on the hills; the mists have vanished, and the sun rides bare and fierce, with not a vapor to impede him. Grant, then, that the voice of Jenny Lind is defective. We maintain that the exquisite gratification, derived on the one hand by herself, in battling against its defects, and on the other unconsciously communicated to her audience, belongs to that catalogue of indefinable idiosyncracies which make up the sum total of a charm possessed by no other singer in existence.

But let us not stop, at the moment of parting, to dwell upon "points," or pry into secrets that are after all to be classed among the inscrutable ways through which nature so frequently manifests herself. Jenny Lind is nobly, though eccentrically endowed; but the causes of the spell she exercises, physically, on her hearers, escape definition. As an artist, with many faults, she combines a larger number of excellencies than any of her contemporaries. She has had greater difficulties to surmount than the majority; but with indomitable perseverance, and a soul emphatically musical, she has risen from the ordeal, triumphant.

Our object just now, however, is not to entertain a discussion about the acquired talent or natural gifts of Jenny Lind, but to impress upon the consideration of the intelligent among our readers (the majority of course) that if they wish to hear the greatest singer in the world once again, it must be now or never. We are well aware that the cant, with a certain restrained and narrow-minded class, has been to regard Jenny Lind as a delusion and her artistic and social life as a sham; but never was there a greater delusion or a greater sham than this very cant of the restrained and narrow-minded class. Nine-tenths of us know better. We are able to recognize the legitimacy of the Lind influence in the consistency of its duration, and the unanswerable logic of its origin. We who are musicians enough to appreciate the transcendent musical excellence of the songstress—who remember the words of Mendelssohn,† the foremost authority of the last thirty years—and prefer judging for ourselves to letting others judge for us, can afford to smile at the sophism of coteries. Truth is great and will prevail. Jenny Lind is an example of it. A rare genius, consummate artist, and noble heart, through the agency of a series of fortuitous circumstances, has been enabled to perform its mission fully—a mission from above—a mission to delight by the exhibition of a beautiful art, and console by the administration of that sympathy which human beings owe to each other.

* Mario has also something of this quality.

† "The greatest singer I know, in every style, is Jenny Lind."

In what has Jenny Lind failed that, in regard of the riches with which God endowed her, she was bound to do? In nothing. We can recall no single instance of a person remarkably endowed, and high in station, deriving more honor from her endowments, yet living more unostentatiously in her station. Jenny Lind might have been a millionaire, but she despised it. She preferred to do a million good deeds rather than hoard a million in gold. Some will cry out, "This was all for notoriety—for a name." Very well. Be ye, scoffers, as anxious to obtain a good name as Jenny Lind; and, perhaps, one day you may be found worthy to touch the hem of her garment. For our own parts we can in no wise be persuaded to regard her as an ordinary creature, but believe her to be truly inspired—and that belief is strengthened by the simplicity of her manners and the utter guilelessness of her heart. Had she lived in the early ages of the Christian era, she would have been canonized, St. Jenny, by the whole world, as she is already, at this period, and devoutly, by a few. That she is determined to take leave of us soon is matter for regret; but depend upon it she has good reason for the conclusion at which she arrives—and that when she says "good bye," she means it.

Johanna Wagner.

(From the London News, June 16.)

The curiosity of the musical public as to the far-famed Johanna Wagner has at length been gratified. She made her debut in England on Saturday evening in the character of Romeo, in the Capuletti ed i Montecchi of Bellini.

Mlle. Wagner is younger than might have been supposed from the length of time that her name has been known to the world. That is owing to the precocity of her genius and the early age at which she appeared before the public. She is now in her twenty-fifth year, having been born in 1831. She is a native of Hanover. Her father, an eminent tenor singer, was well qualified to give her a good vocal education; but she was an actress before she became a singer; and to this day her greatest strength lies in the dramatic branch of her art. By the time she was fifteen, she had distinguished herself in many important parts in tragedy and serious comedy, but in the meantime her musical education was not neglected. Her voice being a contralto, her first part in opera was the Page in the Huguenots; and her success in this and some other parts gradually brought her entirely upon the lyrical stage. Ten years ago she was at Paris pursuing her studies under Manuel Garcia, the celebrated instructor now resident among us, who has contributed to form many of the most distinguished singers of the day, Jenny Lind included. After her return to Germany she took, alternately with Madame Schröder Devrient, the principal parts in serious opera; and now, holding a life-engagement at the Royal Opera of Berlin, she is the acknowledged chief of the German musical drama, unapproached by any one save the Dresden prima donna, Jenny Ney, whose great powers have never been properly brought before the English public.

Johanna Wagner's voice is properly a contralto, but, like Malibran, Viardot, Alboni, and other celebrated singers, she has extended it far beyond its natural compass, and performs many parts which are entirely soprano. In a merely musical point of view this would be a disadvantage, for a voice cannot be thus artificially stretched beyond its natural pitch without some injury to its quality; but some voices are so extensive by nature, that the process is comparatively harmless; and more—over, if a contralto singer were to keep within the limits of her voice, her dramatic range would be sadly circumscribed, and as an actress she would lose the brightest triumphs of her genius. The music of Romeo, in which Mlle. Wagner has now been heard, is entirely suited to her organ; it remains to be learned how she sings such parts as Valentine or Norma.

Bellini's opera, I Capuletti ed i Montecchi, is one of several Italian pieces on the same subject. There is old Zingarelli's Romeo e Giulietta; there is Vaccai's opera with the same title; and there is this of Bellini. It is one of his early and immature works, not comparable for a moment to the riper fruits of his genius, Norma, the Sonnambula, or the Puritani. It bears, however, a strong family likeness of the stripling to the full grown man. The melodies have the same simplicity and sweetness, with Bellini's characteristic tinge of melancholy; but they seem to be, as it were, in embryo—the themes are left in their rudimental state without the expansion and development which, in Norma, and the Puritani, we find given to motivi of a similar kind. The consequence is that the airs sound trite and familiar, like things we have heard before; and their expression is so vague that their dramatic character rests entirely with the singer. Hence this opera has owed its success (such as it has been) to its subject and not to its music, which has been deemed so weak that it has generally been patched up with music by other composers. The most common practice has been to throw aside the last act and take Vaccai's instead; nay, sometimes a sort of pasticcio has been concocted out of the three operas of Bellini, Vaccai, and Zingarelli. Mlle. Wagner, however, is right in taking Bellini's music only, and in giving it entire. However weak it may be, it has a consistency of style, and unity of design, which can never be found in a piece of patchwork. As to the subject, it is of course the story of Romeo and Juliet; but whether taken from Shakspeare or from the old Italian tale to which Shakspeare had recourse, seems doubtful. Signor Romani, the Italian dramatist, may be supposed to have read Shakspeare; but his opera might have been written though our English Romeo and Juliet had never existed. The story is told in all its original meagreness. The lovers are scions of hostile houses; Giulietta's family wish to force her into marriage with Tebaldo, a kinsman. To save her from this sacrifice, Lorenzo, the family physician, gives her a potion to produce apparent death, intending to communicate the device to Romeo, in order that he may rescue her from the tomb. Romeo, uninformed of this contrivance, hears of Giulietta's death; he breaks open her tomb in the night, and, after weeping over her cold remains, takes poison. Giulietta awakes, and their reunion is a moment of rapture, followed by despair and agony. Romeo expires, and Giulietta falls dead upon his body.

Johanna Wagner appeared near the beginning of the piece, in the scene where Romeo, presenting himself to the Capulets as an envoy from the Montecchi, proposes that the houses shall bury in oblivion their ancient feud, and cement the union by the nuptials of Romeo and Giulietta, a proposal which is disdainfully rejected. Mlle. Wagner's entrance was very striking. Her tall, graceful figure, frank countenance, and chivalrous air, made an instant impression. She was received with long-continued applause, and it was some time before she could open her mouth. A brief dialogue in recitative showed her beautiful declamation, and introduced the air, "Si Romeo t'uccise un figlio," a plain simple melody, into which she threw the utmost earnestness of expression, displaying the richness of her deep contralto notes. The subsequent air, "La tremenda ultrice spada," in which Romeo retorts the haughty defiance with which he is met, was delivered with immense fire and vocal power, a high B natural being uttered in a tone which rang through the theatre and produced a burst of admiration, and the fair singer, after leaving the stage, was recalled with acclamations. In the following scene between the lovers, where Romeo, introduced to his mistress's apartment by the friendly doctor, tries in vain to persuade her to fly with him, there is a pretty duet, "Miglior patria," into which Mlle. Wagner threw the most impassioned tenderness, well responded to by Mlle. Jenny Baur, who throughout the whole piece was a pleasing and interesting Giulietta.

In the second act there is little that is remarkable, or that displays very strikingly the powers of the performers. The finale, however, is worthy of notice. The scene in which the lovers are surprised by old Capulet and his followers, and forcibly separated, is worked into a concerted piece, written with considerable energy and dramatic effect. This, indeed, is the best music in the opera.

There is a powerful scene in the third act between Romeo and Tebaldo. Tebaldo assails his rival with threats and invectives; and Romeo, after restraining himself for a while, is at length exasperated and retorts with equal violence. The burst of passion with which Romeo exclaimed—

Vieni; io ti sprezzo, e sfido
Teco i seguaci tuoi, electrified the audience. In the midst of their wrath the sound of melancholy music is heard, and Giulietta's funeral procession passes over the stage. They thus, for the first time, learn that she is dead, and their fury is changed to woe. This is a fine dramatic situation, though not in Shakspeare. Nothing could be more beautiful than Mlle. Wagner's acting and singing in this scene. The exclamation, "Ella è morta!" seemed the cry of a broken heart.

But the strength of the piece is concentrated in the fourth act. The feeble music is quite inadequate to the situation, but the strength lies in the situation itself, and in the powers of the principal performer. The scene is the cemetery of the Capulets. Romeo comes to visit the tomb of his beloved; but instead of coming in secrecy and silence, he absurdly comes at the head of a crowd of followers, who begin by singing a loud, unmeaning chorus, and then break open the tomb, leaving him alone with the dead. From this time to the end Mlle. Wagner's acting was beautiful beyond description, and its pathos was resistless. In the air, "Deh, tu bell' anima," insipid as the melody is, every tone, every accent, seemed steeped in tears. How we longed for Zingarelli's beautiful air, which Pasta used to sing so divinely. Giulietta, awaking, faintly utters, "Romeo, Romeo!" He listens without surprise, thinking that her voice calls him to join her in the tomb; but when he sees her rise, the cry, "Cielo! chi vegg' io?" is a thing never to be forgotten. There was not a person in the house, we firmly believe, who was not heartstruck by the sound.

Mlle. Wagner's whole performance has inspired us with unbounded admiration of her powers as a tragedian. Were she to act Shakspeare's own Romeo, with all its rich and beautiful details, instead of the meagre outline of the Italian librettomaker—were she to give us the romantic love at first sight, the passionate fervor of the moonlight wooing under the balcony, the scene with the apothecary, and the thousand touches of truth and nature which our poet has thrown in, what a picture could she not give of the enamored Italian boy—what an effect could she not impart to the saddest tale of true love that ever was told! Were she to "throw music to the dogs," and be, in her own tongue, the Romeo of Shakspeare, she would be, in her own country, such a Romeo as the English stage has never possessed. There is some music which may exalt and intensify the language of passion; but if Mlle. Wagner reaches the heart and stirs the inmost affections, it is in spite of, and not by the help of, the unmeaning sing-song of Bellini.

That Mlle. Wagner is a great singer is as certain as that she is a great actress, but we doubt if she is equally faultless. On this head, however, we do not as yet feel quite prepared to speak. Her contralto voice we think is the most powerful we have ever heard. It is almost masculine, sometimes, in its strength, and when she makes a close on some profound key-note, she aggravates it till it becomes almost harsh; but she does this, we suppose, because, like her attire and her manner, it is the assumption of a masculine part. In her mode of vocalizing we desiderate something of the smoothness and finish of the Italian school. But she is a German singer; and to be fairly judged, must be heard in the music of Mozart, of Weber, of Beethoven, and of Meyerbeer.

GRETRY'S "RICHARD CŒUR DE LION."—The Paris correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune writes, under date of May 30th: The Opera Comique has given us the masterpiece of its theatre, Grétry's Richard Cœur de Lion, arranged by poor Adolphe Adam. You know that this opera (which was first produced in 1784, in the presence of Marie Antoinette and her court,) suffered a good deal from political passion during the revolution, and the career of Napoleon, and the earlier years of Louis Philippe's reign. The famous air, O, Richard! O, mon Roi! seemed to parties a touching lament for the exiled Bourbons, and the governments of the day forbade it the stage. The "book" is by no other than Sedaine, who took it from a forgotten novel, then in the height of sale and success, and which he first offered to Monsigny, with whom he had just obtained the triumph which crowned "Le Deserteur." Monsigny rejected it, and suggested Grétry as likely to do something with it. Grétry took it with delight, and working on it day and night, completed it in three months. I should note that the names of all the actors who appeared in the piece at its first performance are forgotten, except that of the person who created the part of Laurette—the celebrated Dugazon.

When political passions had abated something of their fury, and the throne of Louis Philippe appeared to be consolidated, M. Crosnier, then the manager of the Opera Comique, determined to bring out Grétry's masterpiece. At the first rehearsal it became evident that the piece could not obtain success with a public accustomed to the affluence of the orchestration Rossini and M. Auber throw into their scores. M. Girard, the leader of the orchestra, knew that Adolphe Adam had arranged the piece to suit modern science, and he suggested that this score should be adopted. The success of the rehearsals created an excitement, and Louis Philippe commanded that the piece should first be played at Fontainebleau, where the court were then staying. The piece succeeded even beyond anticipation, especially after the famous duo of the second act, Une fièvre brûlante, to which Adam had added a tremolo, which is indeed the pivot of the work, as is evident from the fact that Grétry employs this thema no less than nine times in the course of the opera. Grétry tells us in his memoirs that he hunted for this thema from 11 o'clock at night until 4 in the morning. "I recollect," says he, "I rung to order me some fire. 'I don't wonder at your being cold,' said the servant, 'you have been sitting so long doing nothing.'" He had been "doing nothing" but compose an immortal work! The success of the work at the Opera Comique is very great; the first night's receipts were given to Mme. Adam.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 12, 1856.

THE GREAT ORGAN ONCE MORE.—The controversy, of which we commenced copying what seemed essential, has yielded several more newspaper articles, but no addition to the argument (that we could see) on either side. And as we do not wish to multiply words unless we can at the same time multiply thoughts and materials for judgment, we copy no more now. But we are happy to present the following communication from one of our own organists, whose initials will be recognized, and whose opinion carries weight. It proves that one, at least, of the authorities so confidently cited by "Moderato" as in favor of domestic manufacture in the matter of an organ for the Music Hall, is wholly of the other way of thinking. Our correspondent's criticism of the largest organs already made by American builders, so fair and kindly in its spirit, is much to the point. We may remark also, since the work of Hopkins has been so much appealed to as an authority upon this subject, that the writer of the following during several years residence in England, enjoyed the intimate acquaintance of Hopkins, and may be supposed to represent his views upon the general subject.

An old friend of music in our city sends us a plea in behalf of an entire departure from the old ways in the construction of an organ for the Music Hall. He suggests the adoption of the no temperament, or mathematically perfect tune principle of the so-called "Euharmonic Organ" of Messrs. Alley & Poole, of which a small, but certainly in many respects most satisfactory specimen has stood for some years in the church in Indiana Place. As a scientific demonstration of the principles of harmony and of the musical scale, we have from the first thought it absolutely perfect and one of the most interesting inventions of modern times. What is not yet demonstrated to the satisfaction of musicians is its availability for complicated music, which abounds in rapid modulation and in ambiguous chords, which it costs more than a moment's thought to tell whether to refer to one key or another (each key having its distinctive gamut of pipes, commanded by a pedal, in this organ.) But we should surely much delight to have this beautiful experiment (or triumph, shall we call it?) occupy a portion of the proposed great organ work, say constitute a chapel embraced under the wing of the great cathedral, separable in its action from the rest. But it was not our purpose to discuss this question now, and we will not withhold the good word of our correspondent any longer.

MR. EDITOR,—During the past month, a great deal has been written and said concerning the large Organ, which it is proposed to have built for our Music Hall; and as usual in matters of this kind, great diversity of opinion has been displayed among our Organ-builders, Organists and others, as to the relative merits and excellence of European and American builders. But we are all doubtless agreed upon one point, which is, that we desire to procure, from the best, and most reliable source, an organ that shall be in all respects the most complete and perfect, that human skill can devise or that money will buy; and if there is the least doubt or question as to the ability of our own builders to construct an instrument, which we desire shall rival the most famous European specimens, ought we not without a moment's hesitation to entrust the contract to some one of the most renowned European builders, whose reputation is known and established, and where the chances of failure are next to impossible?

We know that the most prominent among the modern Organ builders of Europe have already produced many grand specimens of their art, proving conclusively that they possess a much greater degree of experience and knowledge on the subject, than we have had either time or opportunity to acquire. The famous Organs constructed by Hill and Willis of London, Walcker and Müller of Germany, and Ducroquet and Cavallé of Paris, prove this beyond all question; and we also know that these builders have had opportunity to hear and examine the world-renowned productions of those older and (for the time) more celebrated artists, such as Snetzler, Father Smith, Silbermann, Hildebrand and Müller,

Sen. Surely one cannot claim such advantages as these for our builders; therefore how is it possible for us to suppose that we can equal, much less surpass them? That our own builders, such men as the Hooks and Simmons & Fisher, can build large and effective Organs, will not be questioned by those competent to judge in such matters, and we may say further, that in some respects their work is decidedly superior to that of many of the first class organ builders in Europe; but, in many of the very important features belonging to a very large organ they have had literally no experience; and therefore if the contract should be entrusted to one of them, whatever his skill might accomplish would, after all, be but the result of a first experiment, and possibly, might end in a partial failure. Clearly then our most prudent course is to run no risks from first experiment, or from possible failure; but on the contrary, we should seek in this undertaking, for all the experience, skill and knowledge that the old world can give us; and by adopting this course we shall without question, procure for our Music Hall an Organ that shall know no rival among modern instruments, and be recognized by competent judges as the only real standard of highest excellence in this art, that we have ever possessed in this country.

There are doubtless many persons among us who have sufficient confidence in our own builders to believe, that they are fully capable of constructing in a faithful and able manner such an Organ as we require for our Music Hall; that is, a perfect instrument, of the largest class and capacity, and which would in all respects compare favorably with the most famous European instruments. But before we express any opinion upon the matter let us see what our success has been in the manufacture of these first class instruments. Two of our largest organs (in regard to compass and power) are those in Trinity Church, New York, and in the Tremont Temple, Boston; the former built by Erben, and the latter by the Hooks. Taken as a whole, these instruments may be considered as highly successful specimens of American workmanship; yet they have their defects, and are by no means perfect instruments of their class; neither would they compare favorably with Organs of the same size in Europe.

The Organ in Trinity Church, New York, owes its great efficiency, and many if not all of its most striking features, chiefly to the skill and knowledge of Dr. Hodges, the accomplished and learned musician who designed it, and prepared the specification, but who is not in any way responsible for the faults we are about to mention. This instrument, notwithstanding its extreme effectiveness while under the masterly management of Dr. Hodges, must still be considered (at least in some respects) as the unsuccessful result of a first experiment; and this partial failure must be ascribed solely to the lack of the requisite knowledge and experience, absolutely necessary for the faithful and proper construction of so large an organ. We will now instance two of the prominent defects in this instrument, in evidence of what we call a partial failure. Neither of the two open diapasons on the great manual (both of 16 ft. compass) has sufficient body and volume of tone for so large an organ, and therefore they cannot furnish a proper degree of foundation for the chorus stops belonging to that manual. Again the scales and voicing in these two registers are so nearly alike, that whether drawn singly or together, the increase or diminution of sound is hardly perceptible, and when used in connection with the mixtures and reeds, their presence is scarcely recognized at all. The Pedal organ shows another serious defect which we must notice. It contains a 32 feet open diapason, of a large scale and of good quality of tone from the FFFF upwards; but the four or five lower notes in the scale, which may be considered the most important in the whole range, (where we have a 16 ft. Manual) are nearly silent, and have never, we believe, produced anything approaching to their proper tone, even when coupled with their octaves; and this defect must again be ascribed simply to a want of knowledge as to the right method of producing the true tone from pipes of this large calibre. Whenever the full organ is used, the light, thin quality of the two diapasons in the Great Manual is most apparent; we hear the deep and pervading tone of the pedal pipes at one end of the organ, and the shrill and screaming quality of the mixtures at the other, but no lusty and strong doubles or unisons to fill up the gap; consequently the result is, a top and bottom effect, highly unsatisfactory to the ear, and which must be considered as a serious and radical defect in the construction of this instrument.

The large organ in the Tremont Temple, built by the Hooks, is without doubt the most successful experiment of the kind ever attempted in this country. The mechanical portion of the instrument is not only constructed with marked ability, but in some respects is greatly superior to the best work of the European builders. It has also other good qualities which belong to a first-class organ; yet we cannot say with truth that it compares favorably, in many important features, with instruments of the same size and general character abroad. We will now mention two of its prominent defects. All the speaking stops on the four manuals are voiced on too light a wind for an organ designed to fill a hall of such capacity as the Tremont Temple; and moreover, it is quite apparent that the pipes are not voiced up to the extent of their scales. The diapasons, especially those belonging to the great manual, are of too light a volume and too reedy in their character for so large an organ, and they are sensibly deficient in that round, bold and lusty character which distinguishes this stop in the best English and German instruments. Another defect in this organ is the want of sufficient wind. There are but three bellows, one supplying the Great, Choir, and Swell Organs, one the Pedal organ, and the smallest of the three the Solo Organ. A fourth bellows of the same dimensions and capacity as the two largest, (12 feet by 6) is absolutely required, to give the proper force and steadiness of tone expected from an organ of such pretension and capacity.

Let us see what Hopkins says on this subject: "The bellows should be made of such dimensions that they will easily yield, and continue to give an abundant supply of wind, when all the manuals are coupled together, with every stop drawn, and the fullest chords are played on the manuals and pedal. The first thing that Sebastian Bach used to do when requested to examine an organ was, to draw out all the stops and play on the full organ. He used to say he must first know whether the instrument had good lungs." If we apply Hopkins' test to the organ in Tremont Temple, or to that in St. Paul's Church, we shall find more or less unsteadiness of tone perceivable at the very moment the bellows feeders commence and complete their work, besides considerable noise in the blowing action, both of which are serious defects, and ought to have been avoided in organs of such pretensions.

We now desire to call especial attention to an organ which Messrs. Simmons & Fisher are building for a church in Charleston, South Carolina; and we do this simply for the purpose of comparing the capacity of wind possessed by this instrument with that of its gigantic neighbor in the Tremont Temple.

The Charleston organ has two Manuals, the Great and Swell, the former of 8 ft. compass, the latter of 4 feet. The Pedal organ extends two octaves from C C C, and contains open Diapason 16 ft., Dulcinea 16 ft., and Trombone 8 ft. There are about twenty-five speaking stops, and the wind is supplied from two bellows, each 10½ ft. by 5½, furnishing a surface of wind of 115 feet. The organ in the Tre-

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

1. Overture to the 'Barber of Seville,'.....Rossini.
Instruments:—Nine Pianos, (3 for solo performers, 4 for 4 hands, and 2 for 6 hands); Organ; Two Harps; Two Flutes; Contrabasso; Horns, from the Athenæum Juvenile Brass Band.
2. Song: Harp. Miss — (of seven years.)
3. March in Pizarro.—Twelve Pianos, (one for four hands); Three Harps; Flutes, Horns, &c.
4. Song: Piano. 'Where, as Dewy Twilight,' C. Hine.
5. Hattie Quickstep.....Markstein.
Ten Pianos; Two Harps; Contrabasso, Flutes.
6. Fairy Dell: Chorus.—Six Guitars; Flutes.—Basso and Tenor voices.
7. Song: Harp. 'Blanche Alpin,'.....S. Glover.
8. Canary Warbling Waltz.—Twelve Pianos.
9. Vocal Duet: Organ and Harp. 'La cloche du soir.'
10. Gentil Houzard.—Ten Pianos; Organ; Four Harps; Flutes, &c.

PART II.

1. Song: Harp. 'Come to the Forest,'.....Maeder.
2. 'Les Cloches du Monastere.'—Twelve Pianos, and Organ.
3. Vocal Duet: Piano. 'Holy Mother,'....Wallace.
4. Parisienne: Four Harps,.....H. Herz.
5. Song: Harp. 'Giusto Cielo,' from 'Eliza Claudio.'
6. Phantom Chorus, from 'La Sonnambula.'—By all the members of the Singing School.
7. Song: Piano. 'On the banks of Guadalquivir,' from Linda di Chamounix,.....Donizetti.
8. Second Concert Polka: Four Pianos,....Wallace.
9. Song: Piano. 'M' amarai tu.'
10. Song: Harp. 'I'm a merry Zingara.'
11. The Hundredth Psalm,.....Wallace.
Ten Pianos; Organ; Two Harps; Contrabasso.
12. Parting Chorus. Music from 'Zampa,' Words by a Pupil.—Organ; Harps; Pianos; and the Amateur and Band instruments. Sung by the whole Music School.

There! That beats Fourth of July fireworks. What a vast breadth of brilliancy is covered by each "piece"! and what a wholesale blaze of rockets went up for finale: Zampa chorus, sung by the whole school, with full organ, all the harps and the pianos, all the brass of amateurs and band—why, the whole continent must have rocked to the vibration of that "Parting"; but for its perfect harmony, no doubt, the Union would have been in danger. And then the bold and dazzling experiments in the science of musical combination. Think of that novel instrumentation of Rossini's overture: did all the fair young solo pianists, and all the four and the six-handers, and the organ, play distinct and real parts, or were they only many to the eye, with a confusing sameness to the ear? Think of twelve piano-fortes "warbling" together that "Canary waltz"! and of "Old Hundred" sung by the whole congregation of ten pianos, organ, harps, et cetera! But, seriously this is a sorry way of inspiring the souls of the rising generation with ideas of music;—this making musical culture to consist in mere display, all tending to a sort of dazzling military parade of masses; as if quantity and not quality were everything. Such a show may have seemed a great thing to the assembled unmusical friends and parents; but what musical person would not rather hear a single pupil, upon one piano, play one decent piece correctly and with feeling, than be exposed to such broadsides of ill-assorted sounds? We have abridged the programme by the omission of the names of the performers, some of which are truly patriotic and euphonious, as Miss "Virginia Tennessee" So-and-so.

GARCIA'S "COMPLETE SCHOOL OF SINGING," the first half of which has just been published by Oliver Ditson, is probably the best work that exists upon the subject. We shall have more to say about it hereafter.

Musical Chat-Chat.

Messrs. WILLIAM MASON and BERGMANN, with their Quartet party from New York, recently gave a classical chamber concert in the town of Farmington, Connecticut. Who shall account for taste in audiences? What in most cities of much musical pretension would have been voted dull by the majority, was here, on the first hearing of such music (we presume), received with a unanimous enthusiasm. Beethoven and Mozart were admired, parts of a quartet (or quintet?) by Schubert encored, and the performers pelted with bouquets; so saith our informant.

The New York Academy of Music remains closed. The stockholders have arrived at no conclusion as to the disposition of the property. Nothing more is heard of the promenade concerts promised there by Maretzek, and it does not seem likely that the splendid theatre will be opened this summer.... A series of four Organ Concerts has recently been given at the National Hall in Philadelphia, to exhibit the powers of a grand organ built by HENRY KNAUFF for a church in Savannah. It has 52 stops (some of which are of 16 ft. tone), and contains 2403 pipes; it has three manuals and pedal. The programmes on these occasions were of a mixed character, consisting partly of classical organ music proper, such as fugues by Bach, voluntaries by Rink, &c., choruses from Handel, Haydn, Beethoven; Sonatas by Mendelssohn; and partly of show pieces, fantasies, overtures, variations, and impromptus, to display imitative skill and fancy stops. The prime mover among the organist, we understand, was Mr. A. G. EMERICK who had the assistance of brother organists, as Messrs. THUNDER, CROSS, NEWLAND, WOOD, BECKEL, KNAUFF, WARREN, JANKE, JARVIS, LOUD, and others. The concerts drew large audiences and gave great satisfaction. Why will not our many Boston organists, who possess among them so much talent and so much acquaintance with good music, give us a series of organ concerts—say in the different halls and churches, where there are good organs?

The Flower Queen (Chicago, Ill.) prints the following epistle, received by a dealer in musical instruments:

Deer Sir I see From your advertisement that you have Musical Instruments For Sale, I want To No Wether you wood Take a Parson To Learn to Play on Brass music and I will Take a Horn of you I want to Learn to play on Brass Music Bad if you can take me Let me No soon, and I will pay you in advance if you wish it see if you can get me a Birt of any Description as I wont be on so much Expence Paying Board all the Time I am there I have No Perticular Horn in Vew Write seon and Let me No your terms and give a fool account aBout all I requested you to Doo For me Direct to C. R. L. C. Respectfully
J—— H. T——.

This is an instance of the influence of brass bands upon youthful aspirations. No doubt the enterprising fellow did, like hundreds of others, learn to "play brass music bad."

In Manchester, N. H., a series of four Orchestral Concerts are announced, to be given under the direction of Mr. G. W. STRATTON, a valued teacher and conductor in that place, as well as composer and arranger for the orchestra. He promises to present in them "some of the overtures and other works of Mozart, Beethoven, Rossini, Donizetti, Bellini, and other celebrated composers, with a variety of marches, waltzes, polkas, selections from operas, &c., with a full orchestra, which will number twenty or more of the best performers, with Mr. WALTER DIGNAM as leader." Good for New Hampshire!

The Gazette learns that JOHN P. GROVES, the young Boston violinist, who is now in Europe completing his musical education, has advanced even beyond the warmest expectation of his friends. He is located at Brussels, and is under the instruction of Leonard, who is much interested in him. He is pro-mont Temple has fifty speaking stops, independent of the Solo Organ, and only 144 square feet surface of wind, furnished by two bellows 12 feet by 6, showing that while there are double the number of speaking stops in this organ, with four 16 and one 32 feet in the Pedals, drawing on these bellows, there is only twenty-nine feet more surface of wind than we have in the Charleston Organ. Need we say more to prove that we are yet experimenting in some of the details of organ building, which at the present time, if not for centuries, have been understood by the artists of Europe? And when our builders assert that they can manufacture an organ of the great compass and capacity required for a room like our Music Hall, and which shall be in all respects equal to the most finished productions of the European builders, we must tell them (and the opinion is founded on the knowledge and experience gained from an eight years' residence in Europe) that they are not only mistaken, but that they greatly overestimate their own abilities in even thinking so. In all Art we are, as a nation, yet in our swaddling clothes; we must crawl before we attempt to run; we must pass through the ordeal of labor and hard study before we can hope to gain the knowledge and experience of the old world. Where are our Michael Angelos and Raphaels, our Handels and Beethovens, our Silbermanns and Müllers? We answer, in the egg, and time alone can warm them into life and being. Therefore, until such native-born artists as these really exist among us, let us be content to look up with reverence and respect to those whom the civilized world has pronounced eminently great and fully worthy of our study and imitation; let us try to moderate our "go-ahead" and "can't be beat" sentiments, and in showing a teachable spirit and a willingness to learn of those whose opportunities for acquiring knowledge and experience have been greater than our own, we shall not only gain great present advantage, but by the continued cultivation of such a spirit and disposition, we shall ensure our future welfare and success in whatever we undertake, whether as sculptors, poets, musicians, or organ builders. S. P. T.

Another Monster Programme.

In music, as in cotton, sugar, and tobacco, our own South-west appears to be the greatest growing country in the world. Nowhere do we hear of such prodigious crops of amateur musicians as are yearly raised in the large female institutes and colleges which so abound in those states. In their exhibitions everything is done upon the scale of ten or twelve pianos at a time, with any quantity of flying artillery in the shape of harps, guitars, &c. Immense must be the market opened in this way for the innumerable pieces of "new and fashionable" music published, and the cheap and rickety pianos manufactured to let here in the Eastern cities. And what is the return? What the fruits in real musical culture and refinement? We shudder to think of it, when we peruse their programmes. We have given our readers one or two specimens before. Below we print another, the programme of a concert which took place a few weeks since at the Columbia Athenæum, in Tennessee. Well may the amazed German, from the land of Bach and Beethoven, who sends it to us as a curiosity for our readers, ask: "Did you ever see a greater Barnum-ism in your life?" and "Do you think the taste for music can be cultivated by such a noise?" Surely the combinations beat the most remarkable that ever Jullien or Berlioz conceived of.

nounced the best violinist in the Conservatoire at Brussels, and has received a silver cup from several friends for his admirable performance as first violin in a quartet of Beethoven.

It is said that a fine German Opera company will commence a season at Niblo's, in New York, early in September; they will perform both German, Italian and French operas.... WILLIAM VINCENT WALLACE, the composer, is reported to have become entirely blind through intense application, and to have been obliged to abandon his profession and place himself under the hands of the best optical surgeons in London. He was engaged on two new operas, to be produced during the coming opera season.

An old number of the London Musical World (for June 13, 1839,) contains the following ludicrous libel upon musical barbarians on this side of the ocean; its idiom is too Cockneyish to have come from Yankeeedom:

A LITERAL ORDER.—The following is a verbatim copy of an order just transmitted from one of the first music sellers in Boston, the Athens of the United States, to a publishing house in town. The original is in our possession. Sic vos non vobis!

"Please sir to send by the bearer a musick book with lins & spaces and no music to it, for whe wright hour hown."

M. Hector Berlioz criticizes the want of musical taste at the present day in the following just terms: "Has a man a strong voice, although he has not the least idea how the voice should be directed, and is ignorant of the elementary notions of the art of singing: if he screams violently, the 'sonorousness' of his voice is applauded. Has a woman no virtue except a voice of extraordinary compass; when she gives, right or wrong, a sol or a grave fa more like a death rattle than a musical sound, or a sharp fa as agreeable as a fish's scream when an iron-heeled boot crushes its tail, it is enough to 'bring down the house.' Such people are the curse of music; they demoralize the public."

Of the young Countess PICCOLOMINI, to whose debut in London we referred last week, the London Post says:—

In regard to her voice it is an exquisite organ—a pure soprano sfogito—clear, penetrating, and yet extremely sweet. It has, moreover, the delicious freshness and bloom of youth—so fair, and, alas! so fading—while its every tone and inflexion seem to flow from the spontaneous impulse of feeling. Her taste is pure, and her style is natural and simple; but (as we 'are nothing if not critical') we must add that she still has something to acquire in the mechanism of her art. She does not yet possess that perfect execution—that clear, articulate enunciation, of which Alboni, under the same roof, has been giving us such exquisite specimens. She has not yet gained the aplomb which enables that most accomplished singer to strike every note of the most complex passage with the certainty and firmness of the finest violin—a defect which is especially shown by her habit of measuring a large interval by means of a slide. She is very young, has been brought up as an amateur, and, moreover, the present Italian school does not subject its disciples to the severe artistic training of an earlier day; so that the only wonder is that her method of vocalization is so excellent as we find it to be."

Advertisements.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIO,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

☞ Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S COLLECTIONS OF GLEES,
MADRIGALS, PART-SONGS, &c.

Novello's Glee-Hive.

A Collection of Popular GLEES and MADRIGALS, in Vocal Score, with ad. lib. Accompaniment for Piano-forte. Complete in 8 vols. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt lettering. Price $2 each volume.

These volumes contain eighty-three of the best Glee and Madrigals by standard ancient and modern English composers. Among them will be found some of the finest Glee of Atwood, Calcott, the Earl of Mornington, Spofforth, Stevens, Webbe, &c. Each Glee and Madrigal is printed separately, at prices varying from 4 to 12 cents each.

Novello's Part-Song Book.

In One Volume, handsomely bound in cloth, with illuminated lettering.

This work consists of new Glee and Part-Songs, by the best modern composers—among others, Bishop, Benedict, Macfarren, Rimbauld, Wesley, &c.—with reprints of some of the best Madrigals by ancient composers, and Part-Songs by eminent German composers, set to English poetry. Each Glee and Part-Song printed separately, at from 4 cents to 13 cents each. Vocal parts to the whole work, 25 cents each part; Vocal parts to separate Glee, &c., 8 cents per set.

Orpheus:

A Collection of Glee and Vocal Quartettes, by the most admired German Composers, with English Poetry.

This collection is principally for male voices. Twenty nine books, each containing about six Glee, in separate Vocal parts, with separate Piano-forte accompaniment, have been published, and the issue is continued—the new books being received by J. A. Novello immediately on their publication in London.—Price 88 cents each book.

The Musical Times, AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR, PUBLISHED (IN LONDON) ON THE FIRST OF EVERY MONTH.

Containing ANTHEMS, CHORALS, and HYMNS, or GLEES, MADRIGALS, and ELEGIES, for One, Two, Three, Four, or more Voices. Price 8 cents each.

A Monthly Journal, containing original articles by EDWARD HOLMES, Author of the "Life of Mozart," &c.; Short notices of Singing-Classes, Concerts, &c.; Advertisements of new and important Musical Works; and, in addition, three or four pages of Music. The alternate numbers contain Music with secular or sacred words. Price 3 cents each, or post-free, 4 cents. Nos. 1 to 48, (Vols I. and II.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 49 to 96, (Vols. III. and IV.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 97 to 144, (Vols. V. and VI.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75. Either Vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, may be had separately, in paper covers, 75 cents each. Annual subscription to the Musical Times, 50 cents, post-paid.

J. A. NOVELLO,
No. 839 Broadway, New York,
And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Garcia's Complete School of Singing.

JUST PUBLISHED:—A Complete School of Singing, in which the Art is clearly developed in a series of Instructions and appropriate Examples, to which are added Exercises, written and composed by MANUEL GARCIA.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

Apr 29

tf

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THIS beautiful Art novel, by MME. GEORGE SAND, just completed in the Journal of Music, for which it was expressly translated, has been reprinted in a neat pamphlet, and may be had at this office, and at the periodical and book-torers. Price 15 cents. Copies sent by mail post-paid, for 18 cts.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
☞ PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

Mlle GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE
—GIVES—
INSTRUCTION on the PIANO-FORTE,
And may be addressed at her residence, 55 Hancock St.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. F. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

G. ANDRÉ & CO'S
Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

☞ A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. ☞ Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (12 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 224.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 19, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 16.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I. "
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
MILLER & BRACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O. "

The Six and Twentieth Birthday of the Organist's Fur Cap.

(Translated from the German for this Journal.)

We had a glorious feast. The brave old court organist was just then in his happiest humor, for he was celebrating his silver wedding with his office. Around the long, stately table sat children and children's children; also the court preacher, the forest commissioner, the grocer cousin from Z—, the kapellmeister with his lady, and myself, and at the head of all the venerable mother of the house, by the side of the jovial host.

"And now," said the court organist, when we had discussed the roast meats, and were cutting into the cakes adorned with flowers, and the precious Burgundy began to illuminate our brains, "now, dear Margaret, bring me Bastian."

The children of the good old man, who well knew what was coming—for they had heard the history before—grew silent all at once, and even we older ones ceased our loud laughing as the housewife came in with a large oil portrait in a golden frame, and placed it solemnly behind the father, so that we all could see it.

"That is Bastian," said the court organist.

"Yes, that is Bastian," cried the little ones, who had known him.

"How do you think he looks, my very worthy friend?" inquired our host of me.

I—in truth, I had never seen a more villainous face. Upon the half-bald head were curled a few sparse, white tufts of hair; small blinking eyes were deep-set under white, bushy eyebrows; a long, deep scar divided the left cheek almost into two halves, and a Judas chin projected far beneath the mouth, which was distorted by a devilish grin. The face appeared to be at least seventy years old, and with malicious look to meet your eye from whatever side you viewed it.

I was silent, for I knew not what I ought to say.

The others, too, were silent.

"I perceive," continued the organist, "I see well, my dear friends, what you think and feel at the sight of this picture. Hear, now, what a man this Bastian was, and what an influence he has had upon my destiny. It is just five and twenty years to-day since I was installed as court organist; and now, if my dear guests will permit me, and will not let it interfere with their eating and drinking, I will relate the commencement of the last act of my life. Indeed I must; it is a holy duty."

"O, we beg you will!" we all exclaimed, and the court organist began:

"It was a cold, dreary December night, on which, six and twenty years ago, Buchenrode, where I was cantor, was burnt down. The whole village lay in peaceful sleep. All at once, about midnight, rang out the terrible cry of 'Fire! fire!' God in heaven! I and my Margaret had scarcely time to spring out of bed and into our clothes, to throw a small cloak over the little Gottlieb, and to wrap up the baby in some bed blankets; for already had the fire broken out in the house of our next neighbor. As to saving money and money's worth and furniture, it was not to be thought of. The frightfullest storm raged, and baulked all attempts to put the fire out. Like rockets and fire-balls flew the bundles of straw, and soon all Buchenrode was one sea of flames.

"Trembling we stood behind the burning village in our field, and heard the crashing in of roofs, the bellowing of the unfortunate burning cattle, and the howling and shrieking of our friends. Then—the flame had just caught my roof and front chamber—then, O my God!—then it occurred to me—I tore myself from my wife and child and plunged into my dwelling. More than my life I felt that I now must save—my three hundred organ preludes, which I had labored ten years in composing. The scream of terror from my wife died away behind me, and through smoke and heat I made my way.

"Holding the book high in my hand, but half stifled and excoiated, I returned and exclaimed to Margaret: 'Thank God, wife, I have got the organ preludes!' Ah, it was all that I had rescued from destruction; and as the sun rose, the beautiful large church village, the school and the church, all lay in ashes and in ruins.

"For ten years had I here been happy in the quiet circle of a modest, useful labor, and now at once was I, with my family, breadless, a beggar and an outcast; for of the rebuilding of the village and the church in a short time there was no hope, and quite as little of support from our lord, the gracious count. He had been rioting for long years in Paris. And yet my courage was not gone. 'Quiet yourself, Margaret,' said I to my weeping wife. 'God still preserves the lives of ourselves and our poor little innocents. Compose yourself; have we not friends and relations in the Residence? They will not leave us in the lurch. And have I not my three hundred organ preludes? O, Margaret, you will see how the publishers will snatch at them, and how glad they will be to get them of me for a round sum! So leave off your lamenting, and come away from this place of terror.'

"I took by the hand the four-year-old Gottlieb—the Secretary there of the High Court of Justice; Margaret carried the suckling, screaming in the most unseemly manner, the stubborn little creature!—it is the honorable Forest Commissioner's lady there; and so we went along barefoot through the street towards the Residence—I, indeed, bare-headed, for I had lost my hat in rescuing my organ preludes.

"When we had reached the hill, where the three lindens stood, and looked now for the last time on the spot where our ill-fated village had been, and as the morning sun tinged the still rising clouds of smoke, the mother in a mournful tone said: 'Now we have nothing left except ourselves, our love, and our heavenly Father, who will not forsake us.' 'Margaret,' I answered, and in a cheerful voice began to sing the beautiful hymn: Befiehl du deine Wege, (Commit thou all thy ways, &c.)

"I had, to be sure, but five gulden in my pocket. But did not our cousin, the rich leather-dealer, live in the suburbs of the Residence, which was only four miles off? And was there not inside, in the Seilergasse (rope-maker's street) the noble and respected Counsellor of Justice, whom I once entertained, with wife and child, for three days long in Buchenrode, when his carriage was upset and the old aunt sprained her hip? Did he not call me a thousand times his charming, darling friend, and take the most solemn oath that on the first opportunity he would richly remunerate me for the labor of love? Were there not in that happy city three book and music-publishing establishments? Could I then possibly fail? Were we not most certainly provided for in one way or another? And was there not before all also in the Residence our very best of friends—our dear Lord God?

"In truth, never had a burnt out family, who had lost their all, and who were almost helpless from fatigue and cold, greeted the towers of a city with more joyful feelings than did we the towers of the Residence in the light of the sinking sun.

"Half dead, we stood before the door of the stately house of our cousin, the leather-dealer. Chattering with cold, I pulled the bell, which rang loudly through the vaulted building and set the dogs to barking, so that the frightened Gottlieb hid his face in his mother's gown.

"Who is there?" inquired the cousin from the window of the middle story.

"It is we," was my answer—"Andrew from Buchenrode, with my wife and children. Open right away, Herr cousin, for you won't get rid of us again so soon."

"What?" exclaimed the cousin. "What do you want, and why come you here with all your baggage?"

"Why?" was my answer, "because we were burnt out last night, and have lost all. So don't stop to make many compliments, brave cousin! Unlock the door, and let the good aunt bring a pot of warm beer, for we are hungry and frozen to death."

"Eh!" croaked the cousin from aloft; "look at the ragged pack! Get you to the tavern if you are hungry! You don't come in here! Our relationship is not such a near one! It is only that your wife's father was my father's brother. Go to the Red Ball, where I will send you something in the morning."

"Cousin!" I cried, "cousin! I am Andrew of Buchenrode; do you hear? Andrew am I."

"Go, and be hanged to you!" replied the cousin, and shut down the window.

"And there we stood in the grim cold, with the night coming on. My children trembled and wept. But I said: 'Fie, Margaret! the Herr cousin is not worth your tears;' and so we went over to the Red Ball, since it was too late that evening to fall upon the neck of the eminent Herr Counsellor.

"But now we were seated in the warm room, and the hostess brought the comforting warm beersoup. This and the glad prospect of the following day made us soon forget our sweet cousin and our suffering, and went so cheerily to the right spot, that I committed an excess, and ordered, in addition to the bread and butter, a supply of cheese and a foaming pitcher of beer. Ah, thought I, the Counsellor and the music-publisher will pay for all.

"With real comfort we rank down upon the hard straw and slept, collectively and severally, as sound as rats and as dreamlessly until the coming day, the eventful, the decisive. It was the seventeenth of December, just six and twenty years ago this day.

"Early, at nine in the morning, as early as we could call with propriety upon the noble gentleman, my poor caravan set itself in motion, after we had taken leave of the roguish host, who extorted two gulden out of me for the single night, and so we reached the Seilergasse.

"Here it was quite different from what it had been with the leather-dealer. The Herr Counsellor admitted us at once into the house, and came himself down stairs with his morning pipe. I related briefly our misfortune, who I was, and hoped that the charming, darling friend would instantly present himself, and by advice and deed make a quick end to our trouble. But the Herr Counsellor knew us no longer, and troubled himself no further about the fatal history of the carriage and the dislocated lip of the loose-toothed aunt. Jog his memory as I would, it was of no use—he knew us not. But our misfortune touched him, and he pressed a half-florin piece into my hand, while he courteously pushed us to the street door, but I flung the half florin through the opening of the door before his feet, and stood again with my weeping wife and shivering children helpless in the open street.

"Margaret," said I, "do you go back again with the children for the present to the Red Ball. God willing, I will soon bring help, and that right to the purpose. We will beg no more. The deuce take the leather-dealer and the justice! Let us now take the better part! That is the sure way. Now bring out your money bags, ye brave music-dealers! The one of you that gives the most, has them." I meant the organ preludes, and so I marched on in high spirits, still, to be sure, bare-headed, into the bookstore that stood open before me.

"Here crept out from behind a table a little man in steel-bowed spectacles, and staring at me, asked me who I was and what I wanted. I soon saw that I had the bookseller himself before me, for the little man was excessively short and crusty. I also said, very shortly, that I was the Cantor Andreas of Buchenrode, a pupil of the great Bach, and that I brought him three hundred organ preludes, composed by me, to publish, if the Herr bookseller was disposed to pay me something handsome for them, besides twenty free copies.

"But the little man did not deign to bestow a single look upon the book, and with the words: 'That is not a current article,' and 'I can make use of such things,' he showed me the door and crawled grumbling again behind the table.

"As if touched by lightning, I stood now again bewildered in the street. I had never expected that! Three hundred organ preludes after Sebastian Bach no current article! My brave ten years' labor a thing of which no use could be made! O God! shivering and shaking overtook me, and I glided utterly without hope into the two remaining bookstores, where, with a few variations, my luck was not a hair's breadth better. Everywhere I was repulsed, and no one would so much as look at my work.

"O, dreadful fate! My last, sure, joyful hope was gone! What should I say to the anxiously waiting wife in the Red Ball? Must not such a Job's message strike her to the ground? Was I not myself stricken down?

"There I held the laborious work of ten long years in my trembling hands, and there was nobody who had offered me a sixpence for it. What should I set about next? What was there left for me and my poor hungry little innocents? In tears I glided past the stately houses, all without help for me, across the market-place, where all things possible for life's enjoyment were displayed and heaped up to superfluity, and nothing, nothing of all that could drop down for me, and so on to the wretched tavern, where I was to step before my Margaret with the mournful news. Verily, my mood was more dreadful than at the moment when I stood behind my burning house.

"Then—O God!—then there came into my throat, I know not how, the sixth verse of the beautiful hymn, and just as I was passing the house of the Counsellor—I could not resist it—I sang with a loud voice:

Hope on, poor soul, forever
Hope on, and never fear!
God's mercy will deliver
From all thy troubles here.
To Him thy life surrender,
And only wait His time;
Full soon in heavenly splendor
The sun of joy shall shine.

"The passers-by had every reason to suppose me crazy; but I was marvellously consoled, and greeted Margaret, who came from the Red Ball to meet me, with the joyful cry of: 'Victory, dear wife! We are received and welcomed by the dear God as his children, and found worthy of a severe trial; for whom the Lord loveth, him he chasteneth. With the booksellers it came to nothing. They hold the works of art and genius for mere commodities, and feel, like the butchers, only of the fat parts for their shambles; the deuce take them! But now we will not stay an hour longer in this accursed hole. Up and take the little ones; now we will go to Z——, to the grocer. To be sure, he too is our cousin, but he is poor; therefore he will be human, he will feel for others' need, and surely will not forsake us.'"

"Andrew!" exclaimed here the honest grocer, and reached out his hand across the table to the narrator, "Andrew, you knew my heart. Truly I would not have forsaken thee, if thou and thine had come to me, although I myself at that time wore the belt of want about my loins. But go on with thy story."

"My wife," continued the court organist, "when she heard how every project failed, could not refrain from weeping. There really was nothing further left to us except the way to Z——, which lies seven miles from here. I was quite blue in the face from cold, and the icy wind blew on my hair.

"Andreas," said the mother, "it does not signify, you must have a cap; you will freeze so." 'Indeed I do freeze,' was my answer; 'but where is a cap to come from? We have now not more than three gulden left, and if I give them for the cap, how shall we get to Z——?'"

"Make yourself easy about that," said Margaret. "Fortunately I still find the silver thimble in my pocket, and a handkerchief which we do not need; this will keep us along till then; but you must by all means have the cap."

"So be it," I replied, "in God's name," and we went together into the house of Kilian Brustfleck, the furrier. It was, as I have said, the seventeenth of December, about half past ten in the forenoon, and that was the way by which fate—ah, why do I say fate?—that was the way by which God led me into my good fortune.

"The master furrier had right handsome caps, but they were too fine and too dear for me. 'Here is yet one more in the maker's hands,' said he, 'a real nice fur cap, which I can let the Herr Cantor have for three gulden; but then the Herr Cantor will have to wait half an hour until the journeyman is ready with it.'

"I found that quite convenient. My family could warm themselves in the meantime at the warm stove, and I could tell the worthy master the history of my sufferings and misfortunes, to which he listened with a heartfelt sympathy, and made not a few severe remarks upon the mean cousins and booksellers. Indeed, he was so touched by my misfortune that he promised to let me have the cap a half gulden cheaper.

"What!" croaked out some one from a corner, whom I had not yet observed in the room. 'Master Kilian, are you mad? That beautiful cap—it is worth more among brothers. I tell you what, let me have the cap; I will give you four gulden for it.'

"Terror, as if the evil one had suddenly appeared, paralyzed my tongue. The monster, who knew my misery, for he had overheard all, a little old man in a brown coat, crept nearer, took one pinch of snuff after another, stepped up to my poor children, and spoke with a sneering laugh, while he pinched Gottlieb in the cheeks: 'He, he, he, you young brat, why do you not die? But you will freeze perhaps before the day is over; he, he, he!'

"Sir!" indignantly exclaimed my wife, 'are you a man? are you a Christian? Can you take the cap from my poor husband?'

"Why not?" laughed the man. 'I need it myself, and will give four gulden.'

"Sir, by no means!" now exclaimed the honest furrier. 'I have promised the cantor this cap, and he must have it.'

"Well, do as you like," replied the man in brown, 'but do not let it go under four gulden; that I tell you, and I will have it. Does master Kilian understand?'

"Yes," he replied, surprised, 'I understand; and since the Herr Cantor can play the organ so well, he may in the meantime, while the cap is being sewed up, while away the time there at the clavier.'

"In the chamber there stood to be sure a not bad instrument, on which the master's children practised, and I did not have to be asked twice, but sat down, opened my organ preludes, and played valiantly, at first in a grim and moody vein, but gradually softened by the holy power of harmony, which worked like balsam on my bleeding heart. At last I figured my favorite choral: Commit thou all thy ways, &c., and I rejoiced to see that even the brown devil, fascinated by the tones, like Rameau's spider, had crept to my side. But when I had ended, the monster again croaked out with a sneering laugh:

"He, he, he! the Herr Cantor will draw no dog from the oven so. Money is the word! The cap is now ready. Down with the four gulden, Herr Cantor, else the cap is mine.'

"O heavens! I had not, to save my soul, a farthing more than the three gulden. My own and my wife's entreaties with the master, that he would keep his word as at first given, were fruitless. 'Even if I would,' said Kilian, shrugging his shoulders, 'I could not; and four gulden must be paid, or else the cap belongs of right to the old gentleman.' The latter laughed again insultingly, and suggested that, under the circumstances, it were much better I should go back to the Red Ball, and there wait till the weather should grow milder. But, indignant at this villainy, neither I nor Margaret were willing to waste another word, and I cried: 'Away! away hence from this Sodom! away to Z——, to cousin Benjamin!' Margaret spread out the handkerchief, and I laid the three gulden upon it, and suggested that the whole together was now amply worth four gulden; but the old brown coat pushed back the handkerchief and offered to lend me a gulden if I would pledge my organ preludes.

"What should I do? Bitter as it was to me to know my work in such hands and to be a debtor of that man, yet I had to bite into the sour apple, for the master himself, to whom I would have preferred to pledge the manuscript for the one gulden, declined it at a wink from the man in brown, and so the latter paid the gulden, took my dear book, and went off with a mocking laugh.

"Who is the fiend?' I asked the master.

"That is Bastian, Herr Cantor," was the reply. 'But what he does may be quite right. But if he has compelled me to take a gulden more from the Herr Cantor than I would, he has not prevented me from having made for you good people a nice warm cup of coffee, and it must soon come in, and a couple of fresh wheaten rolls besides.'

"Readily and gladly did the kindly housewife obey this benevolent order, and soon the invigorating beverage was steaming, and, with the white rolls refreshing us poor hungry, half-starved creatures.

"Deeply touched and grateful, we took leave of the honest master. Were we not warm and full, and did not my head stick in the most admirable of fur caps?

"But—just God!—scarcely had we wandered through two streets of the town on the way to Z——, when two policemen with the brown-coat came towards us. 'There they are,' said the latter, pointing to us; 'bring them along with me.' 'What?' exclaimed I; 'what do you want of us? We are honest people.' 'Honest people?' said the old man, grinning. 'That remains to be proved.'

"All my protestations, all my wife's tears were no help; we were carried off, and now and then I saw our devil sneer and laugh, while the beadles muttered many indistinct things about vagabonds and strollers.

"So on, till we came before the city. Here they opened a wicket gate and led us into a house that stood all by itself. 'In!' cried the old man, and we stepped into a small chamber, opening upon another chamber. 'Sir,' said I, earnestly to the old man, 'I suppose you are the head beadle here, and really the Prince could not have found a better. But tell me, what offence have I and mine committed? Has not the cup of misery already been poured out upon us sufficiently? Must we also languish in a prison?'

"Compose yourself, Herr Cantor," replied Bastian, after the others had withdrawn, 'and please to tell us briefly whether you are disposed to stay here or actually to travel on to Z——?'

"To Z——, will I," I exclaimed with a bitter smile—'to Z——, and shake the dust of this ungodly city from my feet.'

"Well, then," replied the old man, 'then I cannot help you; the Herr Cantor is under arrest.' So saying, he withdrew, and I could hear him lock the door.

"Then my dear wife fell, weeping aloud, into my arms, and I myself was comfortless. A beggar, an outcast, sick, and now a prisoner. That was too much!

(Conclusion next week.)

(From the Providence Journal.)

"Power" Music.

My Dear Mr. Editor.—Shall I congratulate you upon the indescribable pleasures of having heard the steam organ, that triumph of our race and time? I believe you are not deaf, so I think I will; but at any rate you may congratulate me, since I have heard it, and, like Daniel Webster, "I still live." What an age it is! What a forth-stretching, seven-league-booted people this is, among which we move and listen! As I stood on that beautiful Cove promenade—itsself, by the way, made out of nothing, though certainly not for nothing—and heard the first notes of the approaching Worcester train, I must own to having been, for an instant, lost in the enormity of my feelings. I came by notification, and prepared at all points for surprise, but—could it be possible! Yes, there was a locomotive, and it was a rather staid old foggy, too, one of those most machinery of all machines, a thing that has always been to me the personification of humdrum toil, a creature tied down to a single track in life, and never indulging in any pastime beyond a snort and a puff; there was that worthy old drudge, actually careering towards me, with a jolly sort of look, decked with evergreens, all its breaching kicked off, and bran new holiday housing on, Hailing Columbia, that happy land, with all its might; bidding old Dan Tucker clear the track, with much jocularly; showing us how the weazel pops, and finally, when abreast of us, bursting spasmodically into a triumphant Yankee Doodle.

As I remarked, I was at first lost in my feelings, but surprise soon toned itself down into meditation. Well, thought I, old fellow, what a blessing it is you are so patriotic, if you must be so noisy; and then I began to think how nice it would be to use him in the coming fight, and enlist him for Kansas; and to wonder whether we couldn't somehow get him, like the Howadji, to take the stump for "our Jessie" and sing a little prose steam politics. The idea seemed to me both a good one, and a feasible; but I was a little too quick, for while the thought was swelling within me, the old fellow gave a huge snort, and sputtered the Marseilles Hymn all over us, following the compliment with Rory O'More. Now this, I own, "gave me pause." It was very fine, I confess, but was it just the thing for a sober Rhode Islander, to take those "furren" articles, when "Old Bristol" was on the market, or perhaps "New Shoreham," and both could probably stand any required pressure. Looking at it merely in the light of an example to all the young iron colts in the Cove engine houses, I thought it of doubtful expediency, and so I hinted to the Attorney General, whom I met, and who met my anxiety, "you may suppose, with a hearty sympathy. Well, it might be a Massachusetts engine, after all, and so I followed it into the depot to examine. I didn't find out, because so many were before me, but such delicious sensations as I experienced I think I shall never feel again, for as soon as I was in the building the delightful creature began once more. Again I heard how the weazel pops, and a curious pop it seemed, not unlike what I suppose to be that of a ginger beer bottle in Brobdingnag, but I dare say very accurate, for never having caught one, either asleep or awake, I am not well acquainted with his habits. Then I was invited to "wait for the wagon" and would have done so cheerfully, had the hour been earlier, but it was nearly my dinner time, and somehow, the music was of so strengthening a nature that it gave me all the sensations of a fine appetite; that sort of vibratory goneness, Mr. Editor, which you may have never known, but I could refer you to many who have; a peculiar internal condition, as if a ratification meeting were being held inside of one, and more were for bolting than for ratifying. It was delightful, and as soon as I perceived the state of the case, I at once started to make use of the happiness so unexpectedly provided.

All the way home I heard the plucky old fellow roaring out tune after tune, and I must say I was overjoyed, in ecstasy, until as I approached my house, it occurred to me that I might have been all the time mistaken, and what I had supposed was pure musical spirits, might be after all drink. Yes there it was, the murder was out. He had been taking a little "so'thing hot," and seasoned though he were, it had evidently got into his head. The idea was a painful one I need not say, and altered my whole opinion of the creature in a second, from fatigue and cold, greeted the towers of a city with more joyful feelings than did we the towers of the Residence in the light of the sinking sun.

"Half dead, we stood before the door of the stately house of our cousin, the leather-dealer. Chattering with cold, I pulled the bell, which rang loudly through the vaulted building and set the dogs to barking, so that the frightened Gottlieb hid his face in his mother's gown.

"Who is there?" inquired the cousin from the window of the middle story.

"It is we," was my answer—"Andrew from Buchenrode, with my wife and children. Open right away, Herr cousin, for you won't get rid of us again so soon."

"What?" exclaimed the cousin. "What do you want, and why come you here with all your baggage?"

"Why?" was my answer, "because we were burnt out last night, and have lost all. So don't stop to make many compliments, brave cousin! Unlock the door, and let the good aunt bring a pot of warm beer, for we are hungry and frozen to death."

"Eh!" croaked the cousin from aloft; "look at the ragged pack! Get you to the tavern if you are hungry! You don't come in here! Our relationship is not such a near one! It is only that your wife's father was my father's brother. Go to the Red Ball, where I will send you something in the morning."

"Cousin!" I cried, "cousin! I am Andrew of Buchenrode; do you hear? Andrew am I."

"Go, and be hanged to you!" replied the cousin, and shut down the window.

"And there we stood in the grim cold, with the night coming on. My children trembled and wept. But I said: 'Fie, Margaret! the Herr cousin is not worth your tears;' and so we went over to the Red Ball, since it was too late that we saw several groups of the eminent society and astonishment depicted upon their countenances, and while listening and looking at the wonder they unconsciously found themselves whirling in the graceful gyrations of the waltz, or singing as an accompaniment, the old familiar words set to the old national tunes which were sung by our great-great-grand-sires.

At Providence the people seemed to turn out en masse, as at the exhibition of fire-works or some remarkable pageant, and occupied all the vacant room contiguous to the route through which the organ could be seen. Never since the opening of the road has there been such a universal manifestation of wonder and admiration by the people along the line as was exhibited on this occasion. At all the large machine shops in the north part of the city the operatives came out by hundreds, and swung their hats and cheered us as we passed. Even the cattle and horses in the pastures seemed quite exultant at the sound of Yankee Doodle, and with heads and tails erect pranced along with a great deal of majesty so long as we were in sight of them.

The effect of this music upon the ear of those at a distance was most astonishing. On my return I saw one lady, who was sitting in her house upon a high hill about two miles from the road, when the sound of the music first fell upon her ear. She arose, went to her bureau and took out her purse to throw a piece of money to what she supposed to be a hand organist, playing under her window, but not seeing him, she went out doors and quite round the house, and wherever she stopped the music seemed to be on the opposite side of the house from where she stood; but she could not discover whether it was in the air or in

Herr Counsellor knew us no longer, and troubled himself no further about the fatal history of the carriage and the dislocated lip of the loose-toothed aunt. Jog his memory as I would, it was of no use—he knew us not. But our misfortune touched him, and he pressed a half-florin piece into my hand, while he courteously pushed us to the street door, but I flung the half florin through the opening of the door before his feet, and stood again with my weeping wife and shivering children helpless in the open street.

"Margaret," said I, "do you go back again with the children for the present to the Red Ball. God willing, I will soon bring help, and that right to the purpose. We will beg no more. The deuce take the leather-dealer and the justice! Let us now take the better part! That is the sure way. Now bring out your money bags, ye brave music-dealers! The one of you that gives the most, has them." I meant the organ preludes, and so I marched on in high spirits, still, to be sure, bare-headed, into the bookstore that stood open before me.

"Here crept out from behind a table a little man in steel-bowed spectacles, and staring at me, asked me who I was and what I wanted. I soon saw that I had the bookseller himself before me, for the little man was excessively short and crusty. I also said, very shortly, that I was the Cantor Andreas of Buchenrode, a pupil of the great Bach, and that I brought him three hundred organ preludes, composed by me, to publish, if the Herr bookseller was disposed to pay me something handsome for them, besides twenty free copies.

"But the little man did not deign to bestow a single look upon the book, and with a striking 'That is not a current article' contains a parquet, use of such things,' he said, and third tiers, and crawled grumblingly to be seats for about three thousand. Every one will have perfect freedom. As if talent and will not be cramped or unbewildered, as in all the other establishments of the kind in the country.

The whole building is to be heated by steam from boilers placed in a vault south of it, and there will be several miles of iron pipes to convey the heat to every part of the vast structure. Of gas pipes there will be nearly two miles, and water will be conducted through the edifice on an equally liberal scale. The dome of the auditorium is of an entirely novel construction. The frame work is of wrought iron and the whole ceiling is of wire-work interlaced, on which is to be placed the plaster that is to receive the fresco painting. Lightness and additional security in case of fire are obtained by this novel and elegant mode of constructing the roof. Around a large circular opening in the centre of the dome, will be globes and hundreds of gas burners, which will shed a flood of light upon the whole interior, without interfering with the eye-sight of spectators. At the same time, this mode of lighting will much assist the ventilation, which is further provided for by openings in the ceilings and floors in various parts of the house. The walls are of enormous thickness, and the wood-work of the galleries and the roof is the most massive and substantial that we have ever seen in any building.

In the front part of the house, looking on Locust street, is a superb saloon, to be used for promenades, or for concerts, lectures or balls, which will seat some eight hundred people comfortably. This saloon is to be decorated in the highest style of art. There is a most liberal supply of retiring rooms, cloak rooms and refreshment rooms, and nothing that can contribute to the comfort and convenience of the public seems to have been neglected. The stairways throughout the building are spacious and easy of ascent, and house of the Counsellor—I could not resist it—I sang with a loud voice:

Hope on, poor soul, forever!
Hope on, and never fear!
God's mercy will deliver
From all thy troubles here.
To Him thy life surrender,
And only wait His time;
Full soon in heavenly splendor
The sun of joy shall shine.

"The passers-by had every reason to suppose me crazy; but I was marvellously consoled, greeted Margaret, who came from the Red Ball to meet me, with the joyful cry of: 'Victory, dear wife! We are received and welcome to the dear God as his children, and found relief from a severe trial; for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth. With the booksellers it is nothing. They hold the works of art and for mere commodities, and feel, like the tinsmith, only of the fat parts for their shame. The deuce take them! But now we will not be an hour longer in this accursed hole. Up with the little ones; now we will go to Ziegler's grocer. To be sure, he too is our cousin, but he is poor; therefore he will be humane and feel for others' need, and surely will help us."

"Andrew!" exclaimed here the bookseller, and reached out his hand across the street. Does narrator, "Andrew, you knew my wife! I would not have forsaken thee, if I had come to me, although I myself wore the belt of want about my loins with thy story."

"My wife," said the bookseller, "when she was a school of Art to be sure a not refining the taste of the popular children them away from less profitable and amusements."

Franz Schubert's Symphony in C Major.

BY ROBERT SCHUMANN.

[Translated for the London Musical World.]

The musician who visits Vienna for the first time may perhaps be able to amuse himself for a while with the festive bustle in the streets, and have, most likely, remained standing in astonishment before the Stephansthurm, but he will soon be reminded that, not far off, there is a churchyard more important to him than all the other sights of which the city can boast, and where two of the greatest men who ever exercised his art, repose at a few paces' distance from each other. Many a young musician has no doubt, like myself, after the first few days spent in noise and bustle, wandered forth to the Währinger churchyard, to lay his offering of flowers upon the two graves, even though it were only a wild rose-bush, such as I found planted on the grave of Beethoven. Franz Schubert's resting-place was unadorned. A fervent wish of my life was fulfilled, and I contemplated for a long time the two sacred graves, almost envying him—a certain Count O'Donnell, if I am not mistaken—who lies between the two. To look a great man in the face or to grasp his hand is perhaps one of those things which everybody most desires. It had not fallen to my lot to greet, while living, the two artists whom I revered most of all those of modern times; and, therefore, after having visited their graves, I would have given anything to have had near me some one closely related to either of them, especially one of their brothers, I thought. It struck me, on my way home, that Schubert's brother Ferdinand, whom the composer, as I knew, greatly esteemed, was still living, I quickly sought him out, and from the bust near Schubert's grave, found he resembled his brother; he was smaller, but strongly built, with honesty and music stamped on his face. He knew me by my veneration for his brother—a veneration I had often publicly expressed—and told and showed me many things, of which, with his permission, a great deal was inserted, some time ago, under the title Reliquien in the Zeitschrift. At last he allowed me to see some of the treasures of Franz Schubert's compositions still in his possession. The riches thus heaped up made me shudder with pleasure. Where was I to begin—where end? Among other things, he pointed out the scores of several symphonies, many of which have never been heard at all, having, in fact, been thought too difficult and bombastic, and laid on one side. A person must know Vienna and the peculiar circumstances attending its concerts, as well as the difficulties there are in assembling the means for more than ordinarily great performances, in order to understand how, in the place where Schubert lived and worked, only his songs, and few or none of his greater instrumental works are ever heard. Who can say how long the symphony, of which we are now speaking, would have lain in dust and darkness, had I not soon come to an understanding with Ferdinand Schubert that he should send it to the directors of the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig, or to the artist who conducts them, and whose sharp glance not even modestly budding beauty, much less beauty so apparent and brilliant, can escape. Thus it came to pass that the business was effected. The symphony was forwarded to Leipzig; it was heard and understood; it was heard again, and joyously, almost universally, admired. The active firm of Breitkopf and Härtel purchased the copyright of the work, and so it now lies before us in parts, and perhaps will soon lie in score, just as, for the profit and pleasure of mankind, we desired.

I say distinctly, whoever does not know this symphony, knows yet but very little of Schubert. This may, after what Schubert has already presented to Art, appear almost incredible praise. It has so often been said, to the annoyance of composers: "Abstain from ideas of symphonies after Beethoven"; and it is partly true that, with the exception of some few rare orchestral works of importance, which, however, are more particularly interesting as a means of judging of the gradual development of the talent of those who composed them, and have not exercised a decisive influence upon the masses, or the progress of other similar works, most of the rest are only flat reflections of Beethoven's style, for we make no account of those lame and wearisome manufacturers of symphonies, who possessed the power of imitating tolerably well the powder and perukes of Haydn and Mozart, without the head suitable to them. Berlioz belongs to France, and is only mentioned now and then as an interesting foreigner and madcap. What I had thought and hoped, that Schubert—who, steady in his forms, and full of fancy and variety, had already exhibited himself in so many other kinds of composition—would also attack the symphony from his point of view, and would hit the place, whence and through which the masses were to be reached, has most triumphantly come to pass. Most certainly he never thought of endeavoring to continue Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, but, as an industrious artist, created uninterruptedly from out his own mind, one symphony after another; and that the world is now made acquainted with his seventh, without having viewed his gradual development, and the symphonies preceding the one in question, is perhaps the only thing which could cause any regret at its publication, and occasion the work to be misunderstood. Perhaps the bolt will soon be withdrawn from the others; the smallest among them will always possess its importance in relation to Franz Schubert; in fact, the Viennese symphony-copyists need not seek so very far the laurel needed by them, since it lies heaped up sevenfold in Ferdinand Schubert's study, in one of the suburbs of the city. This would be a wreath worth presenting. But it is often thus: when people in Vienna speak, for instance, of ———, they never end in their praise of their Franz Schubert; when they are among themselves, however, neither the one nor the other is reckoned of much importance by them. But, however, this may be, let us now revel in the spiritual abundance which gushes out of this precious work. It is true this same Vienna, with its Stephansturm, its beautiful women, its public magnificence, and, gilded by the Donau with innumerable bands, stretching into the blooming plain, which gradually rises to a higher and higher mountain range—this Vienna, with all its remembrances of the greatest German masters, must be a fruitful soil for the fancy of the musician. Frequently, when contemplating it from the lofty mountains, I have thought how Beethoven's eye must many a time have wandered fitfully towards the distant range of Alps; how Mozart must often have followed dreamily the course of the Donau, which everywhere appears to vanish in bush and forest; and how Father Haydn must also have often looked at the Stephansturm, shaking his head the while at such a giddy height.

[To be continued.]

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 19, 1856.

Psalms and Hymns.

One cause, we doubt not, of the endless manufacture and multiplication of new psalm tunes, with which this country is particularly cursed, is to be found in the equally indefinite multitude of feeble, prosy, pretty, sentimental, doctrinal, didactic, metrical hymns. Every poetaster has felt called upon to write such. Every ordination or dedication calls out the village poet. Whoever can weave rhymes for the corner of a newspaper, especially if there be some slight dash of the devotee, some Sunday church or class-leadership connection about him, fancies himself inspired to add his feeble contributions to the songs of Zion. It is needless to affirm that nine tenths of the metrical hymns contained in most of the voluminous hymn books which have been in use in our time, are destitute of all soul of melody, all principle of music, and such as had better be left out, and a mere humming or an instrumental performance substituted, if we would secure the real beauty and devotional aid of any good music which might be mechanically adapted to them. They are simply not lyrical; there is no fire of genius or of true feeling raised to poetic fervor in them. They are but cold, prosaic, imitative thoughts and utterances, painfully bent and twisted into rhyme. It is quite natural that uninspired and coldly working musical mechanics, considering the multitude of these tame verses to be sung, should find sphere for themselves (a mighty profitable one too—"thrift, thrift, Horatio,") in a corresponding multiplication of new psalm tunes by the book full, hundreds and hundreds at a time, year after year yielding a larger and a larger crop.

But our business just now is with the hymns, with the words rather than the music. Probably the great source of the thousands of poor, prosy hymns, through whose wishy-washy medium the lyrical element in all our worship is diluted, has been the practice of metrical translations of the Psalms of David. The hymns have been made on the principle of variations upon good old traditional material, or of working up those old "thoughts that live and words that burn," and which have come down as inspired, into endless modern varieties of verse and metre. The Psalms in themselves, as we have them in our English Bibles, are incomparably grand and sweet and deep and musical, without any metre. There can be no improvement on the words as such. To bend them to the hum-drum music of a common psalm-tune, they must be versified into hum-drum; whereas a far more glorious music may be, often has been, written to them, only in a larger form, than psalm tunes (witness the many fine motets, Te Deums, services, by master composers, the admirable "Psalms" by Mendelssohn, &c.); or there is music in the simple chanting or reciting of them as they stand. A recent article upon "Hymnology" in the Church of England Quarterly Review,* sets this matter right, from its own Church point of view; and there is much in its argument, especially the following, from which all denominations of worshippers might profit.

The causes of this degeneracy are as obvious as the fact itself: and first of all there stands out, as the chief obstacle in the way, the practice which is so unfortunately prevalent of making a great portion of the hymnal to consist of a metrical Psalter. Why this should be done we are quite at a loss to conceive: it appears to us to be utterly unreasonable to do so. It is unreasonable if we argue à priori, because if the Psalms are chanted (as they ought to be) or even said, in one part of the service, there can be no grounds for serving them up metrically in another: the necessity for a metrical version—which must from the nature of the case be unliteral—is entirely set aside by the fact that we have a really good prose translation, magnificent when simply read, and doubly so when adapted, as it may be, to the most stirring music in existence. It has been well said; "The sorrow and the triumphs which shook the strings of the royal harp are breathed in such strains of poetry as speak with divine eloquence in the unfettered rhythm of our version; but the sublimity is dwarfed by the exactments of metre and the music faintly and falsely echoed by the jingle of rhyme."

But we argue à posteriori, that it is unreasonable to encumber our hymnals with a metrical Psalter, because no one has ever yet succeeded in transferring the Hebrew poetry into English metre without losing either the beauty, or power, or both, of the original. Time after time has the attempt been made, and each time, almost utterly in vain: successive ages have in turn endeavored to improve on the failures of their predecessors and have all signally split upon this impassable rock. Were the translation ever so good, we have already shown that we should not require it, since if it equalled it could not surpass the sublime pathos and strength of the two prose versions which we possess. But as it is, the whole aggregate of metrical versions, from that of Sternhold to that of Keble ("The Oxford Psalter," 1839), can hardly produce a dozen hymns which are fit for Christian worship, the vast majority being utterly powerless to fill the soul with holy joy, or raise it on wings of ecstasy to heaven.

To use the words of Dr. Warton in his "History of Poetry"—"The most sublime imageries of the Divine Majesty, the most exalted effusions of thanksgiving, are, in metrical psalms, lowered by a coldness of conception, weakened by frigid interpolations, and disfigured by a poverty of phraseology. To the disgrace of sacred music, sacred poetry, and our service these psalms still continue to be sung. In the mean time it should be remembered they were never admitted into our church by lawful authority."

We would therefore retain the Psalms in our Liturgy in their own exquisite simplicity, rejecting as futile all the attempts which have been made to cramp their strength or pervert their meaning by metre and rhyme. A few of the versions, however, cannot be left to perish with the rest, they must still have a place in Christian worship as hymns: but the main idea of a metrical Psalter must, we think, be utterly rejected as the chief stumbling-block in the way of improved hymnals.

* Copied into Littell's Living Age, July 19.

The writer proceeds to remark upon a second cause of the degeneracy of our hymnal, namely, the incompetency of our would-be sacred poets, and then points out the superiority of those old hymns which sprang "out of the burden of the soul" in periods of real faith and inspiration, particularly the old Latin hymns and the German hymns of the Reformation, so full of simple, unaffected piety and childlike gratitude and love to God, composed by Gerhardt, Angelus, Luther, &c. We commend the article to every one.

Now here is our point. Suppose that out of the thousands of hymns, good, bad and indifferent, (the great majority, however, very commonplace and cold, or else ingenious and affected in their beauty and their show of gushing fervor—many of them, too, mere doggerel rhymings of what is better, and even more musical unrhymed, unmetred) we should select a hundred or two of the best and truest; those that sprang from true poetic and religious exaltation and creative energy of soul; those that are really fit for music, which contain a simple, complete, rounded whole or member of a whole of thought as well as rhythm in each line; those which have not too many thoughts, or too far-fetched, but which are simple, perfect utterances (like genuine tunes themselves) each of its mood of praise, or gratitude, or heavenly aspiration; suppose that we do this, would not these hundred or two hymns exert more of the quickening virtue of true sacred poetry upon our souls, than this eternal ringing of mechanical changes and sophistications upon a few simple, natural types?

And then again, suppose we do the same thing with the psalm tunes. Suppose that out of the innumerable "Collections," we cull just the hundred or two old universal favorites, which experience has proved to be of the right stuff and to have the soul of the matter in them; the really inspired tunes to go with the inspired hymns—not that we would proscribe all novelty—would not the singing of hymns in churches, whether by choirs or congregations, be a more edifying service than it is generally now?

But Music can do more for worship and for religious culture than is confined in this very humble sphere. So it can. So it has done, in Catholic and in Protestant churches. But it has been chiefly done in larger and more artistic forms of composition; in the Mass, (or its several movements, the Gloria, the Benedictus, &c.) in the Motet, such as a Bach, a Mozart wrote, in the extended "Psalms" of a Marcello, or the still more extended compositions of Mendelssohn under the same name, and so on. Is it not better, letting the basis of public musical worship remain very simple and familiar, that the musical talent should expend itself in the production or performance of larger compositions, in trained choirs? Let the psalmody part be the people's part, deriving a virtue from its very simplicity and familiarity; and then for the rest let Music exercise her full, free sway in enriching the religious service with the nobler forms of Art, so that it all be genuine and good. There is nothing which we should so much like to see, nothing which would so greatly benefit church music, as a book which should contain even no more than a hundred of the best hymns, severally mated to a hundred of the best tunes or chorals. We read now of new psalm books, selling at the rate of fifty or a hundred and fifty copies each. But the first prize should be his who should best solve this far simpler, yet more difficult problem, of embodying the pure gold of the sacred melodies and verses in a small collection of about a hundred pieces, worthy to be known and used and loved of all.

We cannot stop to make such qualifications and explanations as we might and would, of what may seem a somewhat moody and eccentric proposition. We are not for shutting the gates against any real flood-ways of inspiration. We are aware that our age and place are not the first in the world's history, in which there has been a prodigious activity in the production of hymns and psalm tunes. Luther's time, we know, was most prolific in such fruits. But those were times of real, deeply pervading piety and faith; then the soul of the people was, as it were, rhythmically inspired. The Germans are richer in their national treasures of that sort than we are. But we are now considering what is best for the dull times in which we are cast. It cannot be said that we in this day are a people of peculiar musical genius in a creative way, or of a peculiar simplicity and heart-felt depth of faith, such as has quickened arts in other times. At all events the outpouring of the spirit among our people has not been in the form of immortal flowers of melody, of musical creation. If we make psalm-tunes faster than the old reformers, it is by virtue of that external enterprise which marks our age, and not of that inward exaltation and rejoicing consciousness of God which filled men in the days of Luther. If we cannot originate the true thing, we had better borrow what has still proved true.

Brass! Brass!

In these dog-days the only music is of one sort, and that not the most refreshing. "The heavens are as brass above us," and the airs are all as brass about our ears. Whatever arguments, of taste, economy, necessity, there may be for bands all of brass on ordinary occasions, it does seem to us that there are some cases which would more than justify an exception. For instance, we can never cease to feel a sense of incongruity, in moving in procession on Commencement day, through the calm Academic shades of Harvard, to the hoarse, martial sound of brass, smothered by drums and cymbals. It would seem that then and there at least some gentler, more refined and at the same time richer commingling of sonorous ingredients should assist us to keep step to the music of our Alma Mater. We look back with regret to better times (in this regard at least,) when we were undergraduates, and when the old Brigade Band, not yet reformed to Gallo-Sax-on fashions, discoursed rich music from its well-blended, well-seasoned harmony of clarinets and bassoons and French horns, and more martial brass, not yet emasculated to unmeaning, uncharacteristic smoothness by the modern valves, &c., but still ringing with the true shivering trumpet crash.

What with our various college anniversaries, our civic, patriotic, literary society festivals, our now established institution of music in the open air, on summer evenings, at the public cost, and what with our numerous occasions for a band not strictly military, there surely should be business enough to support one complete band organized on the old principle of instruments of various qualities and individualities of tone; such a band as has been once or twice furnished (by special exertion) for some military parade.

At all events a college Commencement would be a good time for commencing this reform. There is, composed of Harvard's music-loving graduates, a society called the "Harvard Musical Association," whose very aim is to further the cause of musical culture in college, and among educated men. Why should not Alma Mater call on them to take charge of the music at the annual home-gathering of her children? Let taste be consulted, and not allow the whole thing to go on by mere routine.

Classical Music in Farmington, Ct.

STOCKBRIDGE, JULY 15, 1856.

MR. DWIGHT:—Dear Sir,—In taking up your paper of last week I saw a notice of a concert given in Farmington, Ct., by Messrs. MASON and BERGMANN, in which was the remark, "that there is no accounting for taste," &c. I am happy to know that it can be accounted for. You are probably aware of the fact, that Prof. EDWARD B. OLIVER, with whom you are doubtless acquainted, and of whose Text-book and compositions you have given such favorable notices, recently taught there for five years, and whose pupil it was my pleasure to be at that time. In justice to him and his arduous labors while there, I feel bound to state the following facts. When he first left Boston for that place on account of his health, he found the people, and also the school, that consisted of but very few pupils at that time, but which increased five-fold before he left, were, as usual in country places, entirely ignorant of the more elevated class of music, and had never heard of the names of world-renowned composers; indeed, nothing of music was heard but negro melodies, polkas, and like trash. By several years of extraordinary perseverance, he succeeded in banishing such from society, and the place being small, the good influence was felt throughout the village. As the pupils advanced, soirées were given semi-monthly, at which many persons were present and had opportunity to hear the works of Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Hummel and Bach, performed by the pupils. Also, select articles upon Music, and many excellent ones from your own Journal, were read aloud, and no pains were spared to correct and elevate the standard of taste in the community. Thus, by these means and efforts, have the people become prepared to appreciate the works of those illustrious authors. And I cannot but feel that justice ought to be done to one who labored so assiduously and against such odds. I write to you in preference to other journals, as I know you are well aware of the difficulty of planting a love for classical music where there is so much ignorance and prejudice existing. That Prof. Oliver, who is now in Pittsfield, engaged in the same good work, where he has established a Musical Institute, may be equally successful in that place, is the hearty and sincere wish of

A FORMER PUPIL.

Musical Chit-Chat.

A letter has been received in New York from the renowned pianist, THALBERG, announcing it as positively his intention to come to this country in the autumn. Now that he has tried South America, he will perhaps find it easier to cross the ocean a second time.

HENRY HILL, for many years esteemed the best of English tenor players, and whose name has so continually occurred in our reports of London chamber concerts, is dead. He was but little more than forty. He enjoyed the friendship of the best artists, English and foreign, was very popular among all musicians, and a sine qua non, says the Musical World, at all performances at the Royal Italian Opera, the Philharmonic, the Sacred Harmonic, the Musical Union, and the provincial festivals.... Covent Garden Theatre is to be rebuilt, arrangements having been made between Mr. Gye and the Duke of Bedford, who reclaimed the land and ruins of the old theatre.

The Mendelssohn Union, an energetic choral society in New York, of which Mr. GEORGE S. PARKER is president, and Mr. MORGAN, the organist, we believe, conductor, gave the fourth soirée of their second season on the 1st inst. They performed the "Athalie" and the "Walpurgis Night" by Mendelssohn, and Mr. Eisfeld's "Voice from the Lake." Willis says: "The beautiful music of Athalie was given in a manner creditable to any society whatever. The choruses were prompt, true to pitch, time and shading. The sopranos might perhaps have been a little stronger to balance the other parts, and an orchestra instead of a pianoforte in the accompaniment would have been an improvement of course—but this was not included in the plan. The male chorus was the best we have ever heard in this city: the tenors seemed also to be excellent voices, although singing from the chest a good deal they somewhat overpowered the other voices." The same society announce Costa's new oratorio, "Eli," for the next season. The New Assembly Rooms, where this soirée was held, are said to be now the best place for music in New York.... The commencement exercises of the Episcopal Theological Seminary, in New York, were made unusually interesting this year by the first use of the plain chant in the services. The Rev. John Henry Hopkins, editor of the Church Journal, who has enthusiastically taken up the subject, presided at the organ, while below the students sang antiphonally the selected psalms. Mr. Willis says the number of voices was too small, "but still there were enough to show how manly, and dignified and devotional a music it is, and how practicable for the purpose included."

If some of the best things are those which are absolutely common,—sun and air, for instance,—how many good things are spoiled by the curse of commonness! We heard a hand-organ yesterday playing the Prayer from the Freischütz, and on approaching found that the instrument had an "attachment," to-wit a monkey!—to whose capers the slow tune vainly endeavored to keep time.

The Musical Review says: "It is settled that we are to have German Opera in America, on an appropriate basis in New-York. German opera rendered not by a real artist in one rôle, with the others filled by chorus-singers; not with a repertoire consisting of Martha and Der Freischütz alone; but with a full, complete, and capable troupe, and with a repertoire as varied as at home. CARL BERGMANN is engaged as conductor, and his name alone is assurance of something worth listening to. NIBLO'S GARDEN, the most popular place of amusement in New-York, has been leased for a term of months, commencing in September; and there have already arrived in the country, in addition to Mad. VON BERKELE and sister, whom the New-York public have heard, Messrs. PICKANESER (tenor) and WEINLICH, (basso,) artists of excellent voices and talent, and capable of a thorough artistic rendering of the rôles which will be entrusted to them. Besides these, a mezzo-soprano and baritone are shortly expected, completing the troupe; the orchestra and chorus are already gathered and in preparation. The repertoire of operas to be offered are Kreutzer's Nachlager von Granada, Boieldieu's Weisse Dame, Lortzing's Undine, Die beiden Schützen and Czar und Zimmermann, Halevy's Judin, Flotow's Stradella, and Martha, Meyerbeer's Robert der Teufel, Hugenotten and Nordstern, Wagner's Lohengrin and Tannhäuser, Beethoven's Fidelio, Weber's Oberon, and Der Freischütz, Weigl's Schweizerfamilie, Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor, and Mozart's Figaro's Hochzeit."

Mr. PHILIP ROHR announces his intention of starting soon a monthly German musical paper in Philadelphia, to be called the Deutschen Musik-Zeitung für die Vereinigten Staaten, (German Musical Journal for the U. S.) It will be in the German language, edited by Mr. P. M. WOLSIEFFER; price $1.50 per annum. Success to it!... MAX MARET-

ZEK has taken a three years' lease of the N. Y. Academy of Music, at $22,000 per annum, and goes immediately to Europe to engage opera singers.... Our friend CARL BERGMANN was presented a few weeks since with a silver goblet by the "Liederkrantz" of Hartford, Ct., during the German Musical Festival, which he conducted there.... The "German Trio," (Messrs. GARTNER, HAUSE and JUNG-NICKEL, of this city,) gave two concerts in Burlington, Vt., which were quite successful, during the first week of July.... Among the other rumors is one that JOANNA WAGNER will come to America, after the expiration of her present engagement with Mr. Lumley, which will be next Fall.... LAGRANGE and GOTTSCHALK are concertizing in Canada;—PARODI and STRAKOSCH are expected soon in New York on their return from a lengthened tour in the West and South;—the PYNE and HARRISON troupe ditto.

The Musical Review sneers at the London Musical World's opinion that JENNY LIND is the greatest singer in the world. It is not quite clear, however, whether the sneer is meant entirely for the critic, or partly also for the singer. The London correspondent in the same number of the Review declares that her singing of the scena from the Freischütz was "a pretentious, cold, affected and imitated business; a kind of bird-organ exhibition, sung with great care to hide the inroads which time has made upon a voice naturally not of the best kind." Believe that who can.

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. (From the Times, June 27.)—In many respects one of the best performances we have witnessed of the Barbiere di Siviglia took place last night, when that masterpiece of opera buffa was presented for the first time this season at the Royal Italian Opera, and with a remarkably efficient cast.

As we have very recently had to speak in terms of disparagement of Signor RONCONI—whose Don Giovanni is certainly open to animadversion—we have the greater pleasure in bearing testimony—though not for the first time by many—to the unsurpassable excellence of his Figaro. Never was Ronconi's supremacy in this part more triumphantly demonstrated. From Largo al factotum to the end of the opera his humor, wit, and invention seemed inexhaustible. New points out of number were presented—all without exception racy, natural, and spontaneous. To describe the characteristics of Ronconi's barber at the present time, however, would be superfluous. The operatic world is sufficiently familiar with this famous impersonation; and we have only dwelt upon it thus far in order to impress our readers with an idea of the signal revenge which the gifted and versatile artist achieved after his recent quasi failure in a part of a very different nature.

Why MARIO should ever allow any one else, in the theatre to which he is attached, to essay the portraiture of Count Almaviva is a puzzle. There was never on the stage a more complete and striking representation than his of the hero of Beaumarchais and Rossini. In the hands of Mario the Count is essentially a gentleman—a gentleman at once so gay, insouciant, brilliant, and refined, that we may seek in vain for a parallel. The singing, too, is quite as great as the acting. That no living tenor can execute the florid music of Rossini with the same facility as Mario is notorious. His vocalization in this respect is as finished as that of Alboni herself—the most faultless of Rossinian singers. The series of rapid passages in the quick movement of the duet with Figaro—All' idea di quel metallo—are delivered throughout in an exquisitely sustained mezzo voce, and with surprising fluency and evenness of tone. Not a note is shirked, not a shade of indecision to be detected in the intonation—all is pure, genuine, and artistic singing. It is a pity that so little of this kind of music is now produced. Were it otherwise, we might have a few more such artists as Mario—since it cannot be denied that composers are in a great measure responsible both for the merits and defects of their performers. Where Rossini and his predecessors may be said to have created singers, Verdi and his disciples must be equally allowed to have generated a race of screamers.

Madame BOSIO's Rosina has improved so sensibly from year to year that it now ranks among her most perfect achievements. True, she adorns the cavatina, Una voce poco fa, in so profuse and elaborate a style that not much of the simple beauty of the original is left, but her ornaments and flourishes are accomplished with such wonderful brilliancy that the first impulse is rather to applaud the skill of the vocalist than to question the taste which admits a system of such unlimited embellishment. The same applies to Madame Bosio's share of the duet with Figaro—Dunque io son—in which the consummate neatness of her execution disarms criticism altogether. In the lesson scene last night she introduced the well-known polka varié, from Alary's Tre Nozze—or rather a new version of it, since the original, as composed for Madame Sontag, was written, too low for the high soprano voice of Bosio. We did not greatly admire the first edition of this musical jeu d'esprit—nor do we find the present one, which far exceeds the other in difficulties, much more to our taste. It served, however, to exhibit the vocal powers of its fair and talented exponent in a highly advantageous light, and was encored enthusiastically.

Herr FORMES again produced a marked effect by his very original conception of the personage of Don Basilio and by his spirited declamation of the famous La calomnia. Signor TAGLIAFICO's Don Bartolo was a careful and meritorious performance; but the character is not exactly in his line. Mlle. CORTI was Berta, and Signor SOLDI Fiorello. The overture was capitally played; and, indeed, the band and chorus, under Mr. COSTA, were more than usually excellent. The opera was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience, who recalled Madame Bosio, Mario, and Ronconi after each act, and the two latter after their admirably effective performance in the duet "All' idea," to which allusion has been made.

On the 16th Don Giovanni was played with RONCONI as the Don, BOSIO as Zerlina, Mme. DEVRIES as Donna Anna, Mlle. MARAI as Elvira, GARDONI as Ottavio, FORMES as Leporello, &c. The Times says:

Mme. Bosio's Zerlina is charming in all respects—charming as an unaffected and truthful delineation of the half innocent, half coquettish peasant girl, who, while she really loves Masetto, is by no means averse to the admiration of the courtly cavalier—and still more charming on account of the exquisite purity with which the music is given. Batti, batti, and Vedrai carino, were both encored last night, and, which is more worth stating, were both sung to perfection. Mademoiselle Marai, too, is a most interesting and at the same time clever and intelligent Elvira. Her music—which is among the most arduous and difficult in the opera—was executed with the taste and correctness of a true artist. The part of Donna Anna was undertaken by a débutante—Mme. Rosa Devries, who comes to us with a considerable reputation from the United States. Madame Devries is no novice on the stage, although she has few pretensions (at least, if we may judge from last night's performance) to the title of a tragic actress. Her Donna Anna was a somewhat quiet and apathetic revelation. She executed the music, however—both concerted and solo—with all the facility, point, and emphasis of one to whom it has long been familiar. The grand scene and aria, Or sai chi l'indegno, where Donna Anna narrates to Ottavio the outrage by Don Juan, was an extremely clever though by no means a great performance. The trio of the masques, in the first finale, was still better. Here the upper tones of Mme. Devries' voice—a clear-toned legitimate soprano—were heard to much advantage, and, as the singing of Mlle. Marai and Signor Gardoni, was equally good, the result was a unanimous encore. On the whole the impression produced by the new comer was decidedly favorable. Nevertheless, with Grisi and Jenny Ney in the company, it was odd that a Donna Anna should have been sought for out of the theatre.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. At the fifth concert the orchestra played Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Beethoven's No. 4, and the overture to Oberon. Miss ARABELLA GODDARD played Bennett's piano-forte Concerto in C minor, (to the great delight of the Musical World), and SIVORI performed Paganini's Violin Concerto in B minor. Miss DOLBY sang an Aria by Mozart: Alcandro, lo confesso, and Haydn's "Spirit Song"; Mr. WEISS sang an air from Mozart's Figaro.

NEW PHILHARMONIC. The following was the programme of the fifth and last concert:

PART I.

Overture (Ruy Blas).....Mendelssohn
Scena (Der Freischütz), Mme. Goldschmidt...Weber
Chorus, "Hail, holy light;" duet, "Brightest Seraph," Miss Sherrington and Miss F. Huddart; solo and chorus, "Farewell, ye happy fields," Herr Rokitsky and chorus: song, "For spirits when they please," Miss Sherrington, (Paradise Lost).....Wylde
Concerto in D minor, Mrs. J. Robinson, Mendelssohn
Aria, "Squallida veste," Mme. Goldschmidt, Rossini
Overture (Oberon).....Weber

PART II.

Symphony Pastoral.....Beethoven
Recueil de Mazourkas (arranged by Otto Goldschmidt), Mad. Goldschmidt.....Chopin Overture (Masaniello).....Auber
Conductor—Dr. Wylde.

The Musical World says:

As Mme. Goldschmidt has before sung all the pieces included in the above programme, it is enough to say that she never sang them more transcendently. The scene from Der Freyschütz was glorious; the bravura from Il Turco dazzling and splendid, and the mazourkas of Chopin, admirably accompanied by Herr Goldschmidt, were exquisitely quaint and touching. As the last faint note died away into silence, Mme. Goldschmidt produced such a marvellous sotto voce that we could not help recalling the beautiful simile in Shelley's Sensitive Plant:

"A music so delicate, soft and intense,
It was felt like an odor within the sense."

Mrs. J. Robinson, who brilliantly represents the sister isle as pianiste de la première force, performed the difficult concerto of Mendelssohn with remarkable energy and fire. Her reading of the andante was charming—gracefully feminine, and yet quite unaffected. She was applauded with enthusiasm.

CLARA SCHUMANN'S RECITALS. The Musical World (June 2) says:

On Tuesday afternoon Mme. Schumann again "recited" some piano-forte music to her friends and admirers, who assembled at the Hanover Square Rooms in larger numbers than before. Mme. Schumann played the following pieces on the present occasion:

Variations in E flat on a theme from the Eroica Symphony,.....Beethoven
Two Diversions (Op. 17); Suite de Pieces (No. 1, Op. 24),.....Sterndale Bennett Variations on a theme (Aus den bunten Blättern) of Robert Schumann,.....Clara Schumann
Sarabande and Gavotte (in the style of Bach), and Clavierstück in A major,
Johannes Brahms and Scarlatti
Carneval (Scenes Mignonnes, Op. 9), Rob't Schumann

MME. GOLDSCHMIDT'S CONCERTS.—The 'Creation' was given last night at Exeter Hall. We have little to say of the performance, beyond expressing the extreme delight which we received from it, for it was precisely similar to the performance of this oratorio in the early part of the season. After all, it is in sacred music that the greatness of Jenny Lind's genius is most strikingly displayed. In the 'Messiah' she is as pre-eminently sublime as, in the 'Creation' she is incomparably beautiful. She never sang more divinely than she did last night. The delicacy and grace with which she warbled 'With verdure clad,' her splendid voice and brilliant execution in 'On mighty wings,' and her exquisite tenderness in the duet, 'Graceful Consort,' excited the audience to enthusiasm. The other solo parts were admirably sung by Mr. Lockey and Mr. Weiss; and Haydn's great master-piece was probably never more magnificently performed. Every part of the hall was densely crowded. We have only one thing to add—and we do it with sincere sorrow—that only once more will the notes of the Nightingale of nightingales be heard in England. —Times, June 26.

MEETING OF THE CHARITY CHILDREN.—The hundred and fifty-sixth anniversary meeting of the Charity Children, belonging to the various free schools of the metropolis, took place on Thursday afternoon, as usual, in St. Paul's Cathedral, in presence of a vast multitude of people. There was no change in the musical parts of the ceremony, with which alone we have to do. The children, as usual, sang the hundredth, the hundred and fourth, and the hundred and thirteenth psalms; joined the members of the United Chorus in the "Gloria Patri" to the Psalms, and also in certain parts of Handel's Coronation Anthem, Zadoc, the Priest, and the "Hallelujah" Chorus. The Chant to the "Venite" was Jones's eternal in D. The "Te Deum and Jubilate" were Boyce's eternal in A. The children acquitted themselves well and so did the choir. Mr. Bates beat time, as usual, from his rostrum, and the whole of the musical proceedings were superintended, as on a former occasion, by Mr. Goss, the zealous and intelligent organist of the Cathedral, assisted by Mr. G. Cooper, the talented sub-organist, both of whom exhibited their accustomed ability and care. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of Lincoln. A larger sum was collected at the doors than has been known for years.

Advertisements.

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S COLLECTIONS OF GLEES,
MADRIGALS, PART-SONGS, &c.

Novello's Glee-Hive.

A Collection of Popular GLEES and MADRIGALS, in Vocal Score, with ad. lib. Accompaniment for Piano-forte. Complete in 8 vols. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt lettering. Price $2 each volume.

These volumes contain eighty-three of the best GLEES and Madrigals by standard ancient and modern English composers. Among them will be found some of the finest GLEES of Attwood, Calcott, the Earl of Mornington, Spofforth, Stevens, Webbe, &c. Each Glee and Madrigal is printed separately, at prices varying from 4 to 12 cents each.

Novello's Part-Song Book.

In One Volume, handsomely bound in cloth, with illuminated lettering.

This work consists of new GLEES and Part-Songs, by the best modern composers—among others, Bishop, Benedict, Macfarren, Rimbauld, Wesley, &c.—with reprints of some of the best Madrigals by ancient composers, and Part-Songs by eminent German composers, set to English poetry. Each Glee and Part-Song printed separately, at from 4 cents to 18 cents each. Vocal parts to the whole work, 25 cents each part; Vocal parts to separate GLEES, &c., 8 cents per set.

Orpheus:

A Collection of Glee and Vocal Quartettes, by the most admired German Composers, with English Poetry.

This collection is principally for male voices. Twenty nine books, each containing about six GLEES, in separate Vocal parts, with separate Piano-forte accompaniment, have been published, and the issue is continued—the new books being received by J. A. Novello immediately on their publication in London.—Price 88 cents each book.

The Musical Times, AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR,

PUBLISHED (IN LONDON) ON THE FIRST OF EVERY MONTH.

Containing ANTHEMS, CHORALS, and HYMNS, or GLEES, MADRIGALS, and ELEGIES, for One, Two, Three, Four, or more Voices. Price 8 cents each.

A Monthly Journal, containing original articles by EDWARD HOLMES, Author of the "Life of Mozart," &c.; Short notices of Singing-Classes, Concerts, &c.; Advertisements of new and important Musical Works; and, in addition, three or four pages of Music. The alternate numbers contain Music with secular or sacred words. Price 3 cents each, or post-free, 4 cents. Nos. 1 to 48, (Vols. I. and II.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 49 to 96, (Vols. III. and IV.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 97 to 144, (Vols. V. and VI.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75. Either Vols. I. 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, may be had separately, in paper covers, 75 cents each. Annual subscription to the Musical Times, 50 cents, post-paid.

J. A. NOVELLO,

No. 389 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Garcia's Complete School of Singing.

JUST PUBLISHED:—A Complete School of Singing, in which the Art is clearly developed in a series of Instructions and appropriate Examples, to which are added Exercises, written and composed by MANUEL GARCIA.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 232 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $80 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

Apr 29

tf

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THIS beautiful Art novel, by Mme. GEORGE SAND, just completed in the Journal of Music, for which it was expressly translated, has been reprinted in a neat pamphlet, and may be had at this office, and at the periodical and book-stores. Price 15 cents. Copies sent by mail post-paid, for 18 cents.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

H. W. S' PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hauser may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 232 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S

Depot of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

"He, he, he!" laughed the old man, snuffing in the most unseemly manner, and said: "Well, then, the Herr Cantor is now free from the arrest and can go where he pleases. But if the same perhaps is not disposed to introduce himself to the cousin in his native town, or to the Herr Counsellor, or to have his skin drawn over his ears at the Red Ball, and if the Herr Cantor and his family can be better pleased here in the jail, he may remain with pleasure until something further turns up—"

"O thou noble, thou good Bastian! O thou poor misunderstood one!" here we all exclaimed, interrupting the worthy court organist. "Give us the portrait here, dear grandfather," exclaimed the grandchildren, stretching out their little arms to it. "Give us the picture!" cried we all; and the old Bastian, amid blessings and kisses, was passed around the table and back to his place crowned with flowers.

"Children and friends," said the court organist, in a deeply moved and earnest voice, "you are quite right. The noble friend has long been no more among the living; but the dead too shall live! Our Bastian shall live in heaven!"

"Hoch! hoch! hoch!" we cried, and drained the full glasses together.

"But now," resumed the court organist, "now hear what further took place. My lessons with the princesses were attended with the best success. In the way of eating and drinking and all physical necessities, nothing was wanting to me and mine. Margaret sewed and knitted. Bastian's noble and instructive society made short the evenings for us, when I had usually to play my best to the good old man, and regularly every Saturday I received my bright ducats.

"Friends, that was a life as it were in heaven. But one day, while I was with the princesses, and was boldly improvising on the fine piano, there stood behind us suddenly the Prince! I thought the shock would embarrass me. But the Prince clapped me on the shoulders and said: 'Bravo, Herr Cantor! you must some day play the organ in St. James's Church.'

"Ah, that had long been my most earnest wish. Often on a Sunday had I stood modestly near the keyboard, upon which the seventy-two years old court organist reigned supreme with master power over the superb work, and carefully had I observed the treatment and the registers. But I had never yet had courage to ask permission of the morose court organist to play a hymn. I knew that Bastian had given him my organ preludes, yet never had the old man, who was severely pained by gout and rheumatism, deigned to honor me with one friendly look.

"For a fortnight had his hands been palsied so that he could not play, and school-boy players bungled at that majestic organ of the first church of the Residence.

"Then all at once the court organist sent me word that I might come and play the organ the next Sunday. Heavens! how happy I felt! I could scarcely wait for the dear Sunday. It was a feast day. The people poured in, and I knew, too, that all the court were in the church.

"O, with what feelings I sat down upon the organist's bench! With what feelings I beheld in front against the railing of the choir the whole princely chapel, with the chapel director at their head!

"But awe and terror seized me when the stern old master, the court organist, stepped up to my side, his lame right hand bound up in a cushion, and Bastian stood on my left.

"At first I held a long, deep tone in the pedal, and then I grasped the full chords of the whole coupled organ. Like a storm then I moved up and down the chromatic scale through all the octaves, and pushed the waves to the highest pitch of awe and terror. Then a sudden silence; then I let the kettle drums roll, all alone, and without any accompaniment. Now again the full chords roared, and now again drums solo.

"At last it all united in a double subject, filling the whole vast church with a mighty mass of tones, and announcing the praise and greatness of the Most High with thunder and with angel voices, and so introducing the choral: Allein Gott in der Höh' sey Ehr' (To God alone be honor, &c.,) which I now played strong and plain, without any tinsel ornament or burlesque frippery in the beginning or middle.

"Now came the music. The chapel director laid the general bass before me. It was a grand, gorgeous psalm of Handel, which was performed with all the pomp of modern instrumentation by an extremely clever orchestra.

"I played my part with precision and discretion. But when I came to develop my great power in the last long and very brilliant organ solo, and for this purpose had drawn out altogether strange stops, and wove ingeniously into it the theme of the first movement, I remarked that the court organist, who had been creeping about in a surly manner, suddenly went off. The music was over, and now came the principal hymn. O God! it was my favorite one: Befiehl du deine Wege. The director had told me beforehand that it was the custom here to have this hymn preceded by a very long, elaborate prelude, in which the organist had a chance to show himself, and that I might occupy a quarter of an hour or more with it.

"I did not have to be informed twice, but drew out all the trumpet and trombone basses, and began, the instant that the priest at the altar had pronounced the last word of the gospel, with a majestic adagio. Hereupon, with my left foot on the pedal, I introduced a powerful fugue, which I worked through all the parts with all the artistic subtleties which I had learned from my great teacher, and brought it to a successful close.

"Suddenly I changed the registers. Soft, but murmurous tones, like ocean waves, streamed through the vast cathedral, and the soul, shrinking and trembling, seized with pain and doubt, seemed as if it would sink into the depths of the foaming ocean; then high in the sun-lit clouds resounded the consoling angel voice: Befiehl du deine Wege. It was in fact the Vox Humana, which I had drawn, and with which upon the upper manual I carried on the melody with the left hand, while the right hand and the pedal made the figural harmony.

"And so I closed the prelude, introducing in a surprising manner, just at the last phrase of the melody, the chime of bells.

"Not a breath stirred in the immeasurable building. Bastian had long been smiling in his sneering way and taking snuff with great energy; when, just as I was about to commence the hymn itself, God in heaven! out shot the court organist from behind the organ, and rushing towards me, cried with a thundering voice:

"Down from the seat! He, turning to a pupil—he plays the hymn!"

"As if struck by lightning, I left the seat. I thought I had done all very well, and yet I had to submit to be driven from a seat, of which I was not worthy, and to hear a blockhead of a school-boy make a mess of the noble choral.

"Like a poor sinner I crept to a stool which stood by the organ, and sat down shivering and shaking. No one spoke with me. Bastian leaned obstinately still against the railing, and the others all avoided me, passed far before me, looking at me shyly.

"I was scarcely able to sit through the sermon. Of what was preached, I did not know a word. There was nothing present to me but the feeling of my misfortune and the most disheartened brooding upon what I had done wrong, and how I could have been so stupid as to have really thought my playing good. As to any further organ-playing, it was no longer to be thought of. Crushed and humbled, I slipped home, where with tears in my eyes, I told my Margaret how horribly I had disgraced myself that day, and that now probably our splendor here would soon come to an end.

"I had no appetite at dinner. I had no consolation, for Bastian had not yet come home.

"Well, about three o'clock—no, what now took place, my dear friends, it is utterly impossible to describe. At about three the chapel director, the court organist and Bastian came into my room. Now, thought I, now it is coming—now they will shake thee, and probably drive thee away! The pain gave me strength and presence of mind, and boldly I called out to them as they entered:

"O, do not trouble yourselves, my masters! I know very well that I have done my task miserably, and that I am now to be hauled over the coals. But if you should take my life away, I could not do it better; indeed, I know not how it were possible; and at all events, I play more discreetly than your blundering choir boys."

"A terrible burst of laughter from all three interrupted me, and the chapel director turned me clear round and exclaimed:

"Cantor, are you then actually mad, or is it only your way? You have to-day, without knowing it yourself, passed your trial in the very bravest manner. Cantor, you are now court organist at St. James!"

"How? What do you say? Trial? Brave? Court organist?" I stammered, and sank down on a chair.

"Yea, verily," replied Bastian, and unfolded the Prince's patent.

"But the letters danced before my eyes; I could not make out a word; and Margaret stood speechless with mouth open.

"I must beseech you now for God's sake," sobbed I, "my kind masters, do me the favor to give me a few right sound boxes on the ear to wake me up. For really this is some hoaxing nonsense of a dream."

"Eh! what dream?" said the chapel director. "Hear how it all came about, and then you may box your own ears for being so bewildered. Long since had Bastian proposed you to our gracious master as the substitute for our worthy but sick court organist; and since the latter had long wished to seek rest and retirement, but was unwilling to resign his post to any but a skilful master; and since the court organist had tried your organ preludes and praised them highly to the Prince, it all depended upon ascertaining whether you were practically competent to the work.'

" 'Therefore,' the old court organist took up the story, 'therefore I did not let you play immediately, in order that you might first of all become familiar with the instrument and with the registers. And therefore was your trial appointed for to-day without your knowledge, lest your fingers should be lamed by fear.'

" 'And therefore,' resumed the director, 'therefore I brought out to-day the great, difficult Handelian Psalm, which is a real doctor's test for an organist. What effect you have produced by your playing, you may best judge from what took place here with our worthy court organist. Scarcely were you down from the organist's bench, when he caught hold of me with his left hand and urged me to go home with him and assist at an execution. I knew not what he meant, but I went with him. We were scarcely inside of his house when he cried out with a hideous voice: 'Wife, an axe here!' 'An axe?' asked the good woman, terrified—'an axe, Matthew? What do you want of it? What ails you?' 'An axe, I say! I wish to hew off these useless members. Wife, I tell you, you never in your life heard organ-playing! My performance—old-fashioned, insipid stuff compared to Andreas! And just for that reason I will never touch another key, and do as it stands written in the Bible: If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee! Why, did not the fellow actually make child's play of me? Did not your old man sit behind the organ with the bellows-blower, weeping like a fool, when the malicious spirit on the seat in front there figured the choral with the Vox Humana? O wife! if I had let him also play the hymn, who knows what sort of excesses he would have committed? Perhaps I should have had to fall upon his neck before the whole chapel and utterly disgrace myself! So I let Habakkuk play, and gained time, after a few false fifths and octaves, to compose myself the best I could. But on reflection, were I to hack my fingers off and cast them from me, would that help the brave Andreas at all? So, Herr Kapelldirector, come right away now to the castle. The church is out, and the affair must be settled.' 'You are right, old friend,' answered I, and off we went to the Prince, with whom, when we were introduced, we already found Bastian. The Prince was extremely well pleased with your playing, and caused to be made out for you upon the spot the patent as substitute court organist at St. James's, with all the income and emoluments, at the same time pensioning our old friend here with his usual full salary.'

"I assure you, my dear friends, the scales fell from my eyes at this relation of the chapel director. I was really and truly court organist. Like a crazy man I danced about the room, and embraced now Bastian, now the chapel director, now Margaret, now the court organist, and now the stove. Wine was brought, and in the whole Residence there were no happier mortals than we. We were as joyful as we are to-day.

"But all those good men are missed to-day. Before a year had passed, we buried the venerable court organist, and Bastian contrived it admirably again that I should be formally installed in my office on the seventeenth of December, just a year from the day that I had made acquaintance with him at the house of master Kilian. You should have heard me then—how I made the old organ work together! For now I was sure of bread, and everywhere respected and honored. Verily, I played the organ like a lion!

"Two years afterwards the noble Prince went to his fathers, and the good Bastian soon followed him, constant, as ever, in death. The chapel director too went home, but left us in his place his gallant son.

"The leather-dealer died, the Counsellor died; but we, friends, we still live, and mean, if it please God, to enjoy life now right heartily. To be sure, I am just now an amiable youth of five and sixty years. Is it not so, Margaret? And our Prince, our gracious Grand Duke, will, should I chance——"

Two servants in a rich court livery here interrupted the cheerful old man. They bore into the room a heavy basket, and one of them handed to the court organist a billet from the Grand Duke, which the old man opened with a trembling hand, and, while all rose reverently, read aloud as follows:

"My dear Court Organist:

I am not unaware of what a happy day you have experienced. Therefore I send you here a basket of my good Sillery, and wish we both may have the happiness to celebrate the fiftieth jubilee of your office, when you shall receive speaking evidences of the good will of

Your affectionate, &c."

And now burst forth without restraint the cry:

"Long live his royal highness, our Grand Duke, the honored father of our land! Hoch! hoch! hoch!"

The champagne corks flew, and for the infinite jubilation no one could hear his own voice. Tongues stammered, but so much the more eloquently spake the sparkling eyes.

The good-hearted court preacher glowed like a Whitsuntide rose, and could do nothing else but laugh and wonder. The kapellmeister had his arm around the old grocer's neck, and both wept for love and kindness.

Then suddenly the court organist rapped on a glass with his knife and cried:

"Silence! silence, my friends! There is still some one wanting in the company, and he must now come forth. Margaret, the faithful fur cap is still living."

"In with him!" we all cried; "in with the fur cap!"

Then the mother of the house, much affected, brought the cap upon a salver, and set it down upon the middle of the table. All at once we grew sober and still, and I rose and solemnly began:

"Six and twenty years ago this day, O fur cap, wast thou born! Thou art indeed one of the least out of Kilian Brustfleck's furriery; but thou wast the instrument of the heavenly Father, who through thee led his unfortunate and wavering children to good fortune; and how far behind thee stand thy whilom brothers and sisters, the fairy, sable, fox-skin and lamb-skin caps, which have long been buried in the kingdom of the past, and no one thinks of them, although they once esteemed themselves thy betters. Small and insignificant thou mightest appear, but from small causes great results do often flow. Is the life of the respected man, whose head thou wast destined to keep warm, a matter of no prime and national importance? Then at least what was brought about through thee was wonderful and full of blessing. Therefore, long live, O fur cap! In the safe screen far be from thee the corrupting moth and gnawing mouse; far be the sporting mastiff and the fondling cat; and may grandchildren and great-grandchildren at the sight of thee with gratitude and love remember him who was the first to wear thee!"

"Amen!" exclaimed the whole company. "Vivat! long live the fur cap! Live all the caps in the whole world! Live the Grand Duke! Live Bastian! Long live the brave host and the mother! Long live the organ! Long live everything!" we all shrieked in mad jubilee, and drank and laughed, and sang and were happy until, long after midnight, everybody danced, sprang, slipped or tumbled to Be—thelehem.

Hints for the Formation of a Musical Library.

FROM THE FRENCH OF M. FETIS.

It is with a musical library, as with every scientific or literary collection, the best must be that which is most adapted to the taste and wants of the possessor. It would therefore be not only difficult but unreasonable to attempt to decide positively upon the elements that ought to enter into its composition. The library of a learned musician will differ very essentially from that of a composer, and a singer's from that of an instrumental performer; in a word, every one collects such works as are best calculated to augment his knowledge or satisfy his inclination. This is no more than reasonable; for at the same time that it is impossible to possess everything that is valuable, it is not only useless, but something worse, to gather round us piles of books and music which we shall never have the leisure to examine or study. Successively to direct the attention to a multitude of objects, can give only superficial knowledge, instead of imparting solid instruction. Before collecting a musical library, it is therefore necessary to examine the use for which it is designed. This point once settled, the only question will be regarding such a selection as is best calculated to attain the end proposed. The object of this article is to offer some few hints towards making such a selection, of whatever nature it be.

I observed that it is not possible to possess everything valuable; this is self-evident, for not only would it be necessary to employ enormous sums in the acquisition of all that has been written on or respecting music, but it must also be recollected that there is a host of works of extreme rarity, of which chance alone could put us in possession. The most complete musical library ever collected was that of Padre Martini, which contained the works of nearly seventeen thousand writers and composers, and yet, even at the period in which it was formed, it was very incomplete, and would be still more so at the present day.* Next to this library, the most numerous ever formed by an individual, comes that of the court of Vienna, which is maintained with great care, and has been successively enriched several amateurs of music. The Bibliothèque du Roi, at Paris, possesses a fine collection of works, both theoretical and practical; this collection dates from the gift made by Sebastian de Brossard to Louis XIV. of his musical library, which has been augmented by several successive additions. It is particularly estimable for the number of ancient works which it contains. After this comes the library of the Ecole Royale de Musique, which is numerous, but chiefly remarkable on account of its collection of dramatic music. A well-known amateur, Mr. Poelchau, of Berlin, and the Abbate Santini, of Rome, are possessed of musical libraries which pass for the best in Europe; in effect, they are rich in works in every department of the art, but are not less incomplete than those I have named, it being impossible to amass everything.

* Of this library it ought to be known that it consisted not only of works, &c., on music, in all its various branches, but also of every book wherein the subject was merely incidentally mentioned. A single page concerning music in a volume was a sufficient inducement for the learned Abbate to place it in his collection.

It is necessarily to public establishments that we are led to look for a complete assemblage of all that is known relative to music; but, however active the zeal of the librarian, he is sure to meet with obstacles that paralyze his efforts. Money, too, which is so profusely lavished on objects useless, nay, worse than useless, is always wanting for the acquisition of what is necessary. For instance, the library of the Ecole Royale de Musique, rich as it is in scores of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, possesses little or nothing of the fifteenth and sixteenth. The sacred music of the German school is almost entirely unknown there; nothing is found but fragments of the works of Bach, Handel, and the other great men who enriched the domain of music from 1700 to 1750. Of compositions for the organ there are absolutely none, and it is nearly the same as to what regards the theory and history of the art. Under the reign of Napoleon, all these deficiencies had been stated, and a memoir presented on the subject, and funds to the amount of six hundred thousand francs were on the point of being granted, as well for completing the building as for making the necessary acquisitions, when the restoration took place. The Ecole Royale then passed from the jurisdiction of the Minister of the Interior into that of the Minister de la maison du Roi, and the imperial ordinance was never carried into execution. By a very simple means, the library of the Ecole Royale de Musique might be rendered one of the most complete in Europe, and that is, by adding to it the collection of ancient music in the Bibliothèque du Roi, thus consolidating the two collections, and making one complete library from two incomplete portions. But, unfortunately, these two establishments belong to different administrations, and it is not likely that so desirable an arrangement will ever take place.

The formation of a great public library of music, in order to fulfil its object, which is that of furnishing means of instruction in all the departments of the art to those who frequent it, ought to be directed according to the following principles:

In the first place, two great divisions should be made; the one of musical literature, the other of practical music, of which the following is a sketch.

The first division should be distributed into classes.

I. GENERAL LITERATURE OF MUSIC.

Subdivisions.

1. Origin and invention of music.
2. Beauty and utility of this art.
3. Of its nature and uses.
4. Of its effects on the moral affections.
5. Of its effects on the physical constitution of man and animals.

II. HISTORY OF MUSIC.

Subdivisions.

1. General history of music of all nations and of every age.
2. Particular history, which may consist of three divisions: 1. Ancient music; Music of the middle ages; 3. Modern music.

The history of Ancient Music embraces that of the Egyptians, Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans; and each of these divisions includes whatever has been written on the musical systems of these people, their notation or semiography, their rhythm, musical instruments, &c. This class is very extensive.

The history of the music of the Middle Ages may be divided into the eastern and the western; the eastern comprehending whatever has been written relative to the music of the Greek, Ethiopian, and Armenian churches; the western embracing the history of the Gregorian and Ambrosian chant, and whatever has been written on figured song, notation, formation of systems, invention of harmony and counterpoint, popular songs, music of the troubadours and minstrels, instruments, &c.

The history of Modern Music may be divided into general and particular, and consists of all that has been written on the successive progress and revolutions of the art, not only in different parts of Europe, but throughout the world generally. The catalogue of this single division would form more than twenty octavo pages. To this must be added the particular histories of church music, of dramatic music, of the biography of composers, both for the voice and for instruments, singers, and instrument makers of every kind, as well as of bibliography or literal history, dictionaries, &c. These latter divisions comprise more than twelve hundred articles.

The second great division of musical literature includes all that relates to the theory and practice of music, and may be divided as follows:

I. The Mathematical and physical part, subdivided into three relations; the first including all that relates to acoustics or the science of sounds, to the organ of hearing, to the voice and echoes; the second, comprehending the calculation of proportions, and the temperament and tuning of instruments; the third, treatises for the construction of instruments. This part comprehends more than six hundred articles.

II. The rudiments of music, divided into four sections: 1st, notation, solmization and rhythm; 2d, solfa-ing; 3d, plain song and figured song; 4th, the methods of performing on different instruments. More than three thousand articles are comprised in this part.

III. The theory and practice of Harmony and Composition, divided into four sections: 1st, systems of harmony; 2d, treatises of intervals and chords, and methods of accompaniment; 3d, counterpoint and fugue; 4th, composition in general, which is composed of treatises on melody, on poetical and musical rhythm, on the employment of instruments and voices, on orchestral effects, and on the poetry of music. In this part are contained nearly two thousand articles.

IV. Musical Criticism and Literature, containing, 1st, treatises on expression, style, and taste; 2nd, considerations on the amelioration of the musical art, and improvements in its methods and different parts; 3d, polemic writings, pamphlets, and satires; 4th, musical journals.

Such should be the materials of the literary part of a grand public library of music.

I now come to the practical part, that is, to compositions of every kind. This part will consist of two divisions; the one comprising vocal, and the other instrumental music.

This division of vocal music will be subdivided into three great sections: 1st, Church Music; 2d, Musical Theatre; 3d, Chamber Music.

Church Music must again be divided into several classes; the first will embrace all the motets and masses, from the origin of composition in several parts, till about the middle of the sixteenth century, in order to enable us to regard under one point of view all such music as had the mechanical combination of sounds, more or less perfect, for its principle; for the works which remain to us of these times offer little or nothing else, till the period of the reformation of the art by Palestrina.

The second class, of masses and motets, comprehends all that was composed from the time of Palestrina to that of Carissimi, the inventor of the modern style, and of church music with accompaniments.

The third class includes masses, vespers, motets. The Deums, &c., from the time of Carissimi till 1780, at which time wind instruments were introduced into church music accompaniments, and when commenced what may be termed musical coloring and the expressive style. This class will comprehend all that has been written to the present day. Church music might also be divided into schools, in order the better to show its historical progression. In fine, a particular section should be set apart for all that regards the reformed religion, such as psalms and canticles in several parts, and in the languages of different countries, German masses, Te Deums, and services in German, English, Dutch, &c.

Intermediary between church music and that of the theatre stands the Oratorio; it is allied to the one by its object, and to the other by its dramatic expression, and may therefore be properly assigned to a separate class.

Theatrical Music, strictly speaking, contains but one class—that of the opera; yet it will be proper to divide it according to different epochs and schools. The first epoch of the Italian school comprises the first essays and the first works, from Giulio Caccini to Alessandro Scarlatti, the real inventor of the expressive and dramatic style. The second epoch extends from the time of this composer to that of Pergolesi. The third commences with Maio and Jomelli, the inventors of musical coloring or instrumental effects. The fourth comprises all the works in which the accompaniment ceases to be a secondary part, and claims a rank with the vocal; that is, all that has been written from 1790 till the present day.

Of German Dramatic Music, the first epoch commences with Keiser, and finishes with Benda; the second commences with this master and extends to the time of Mozart; the third extends from the works of this great man to those of Weigl. A fourth epoch, which may properly be denominated that of philosophical music, begins with Carl Maria von Weber.

The French School will also be divided into several epochs; the first commences with Lulli and extends to Rameau; the second comprehends all that has been written from the time of this master to that of Gluck; the third and fourth are formed by Méhul, Cherubini, and their successors. For the comic opera, one class will comprise the works of Duni, Philidor, Monsigny, Gretry, and their imitators, and the second will extend from 1790 to our time.

Chamber Music will be divided into the madrigal, the canzonet, airs in several parts, the cantata, detached airs, the romance, and national melodies of every country on the globe.

Instrumental Music will be subdivided into concert music and chamber music, and each of these subdivisions will class according to different schools.

Concert Music includes, 1st, all the ancient pieces, known by the French under the name of Suites, and by the Germans under that of Partien; in other words, all small pieces in several parts, for the viol, lute, harpsichord, &c., of which kind is the whole of the music of the seventeenth century; 2nd, symphonies for full orchestra; 3d, concertos, symphonies, concerted pieces, &c.

Chamber Music is of two kinds: the first comprising works for several instruments, such as duos, trios, quatuors, quintets, sextuors, septuors, &c.; the second, all pieces for a single instrument, either alone or accompanied, viz., the solo, sonata, capriccio, fantasia, varied airs, preludes, fugues, &c. A subdivision will necessarily be made for each instrument, while the organ will form a distinct class.

Military Music will form a third division of instrumental music.

A library formed according to the rules of classification, and as complete in all its parts as possible, would be worthy of such an establishment as the Ecole Royale de Musique, and would be productive of great utility in a nation which owes its success in the musical art to the superiority of its system of education. Let us hope that the government will one day be sensible of the advantages of such an assemblage of musical knowledge, and make the necessary sacrifices to supply the numerous deficiencies which are found in the existing one.

I spoke in the beginning of this article of musical libraries formed according to the peculiar taste or studies of the individual; it will at once be understood that a library of this kind can form but a section, as it were, of the great collection of which I have been speaking. A scholar, for instance, desirous of pursuing his researches upon some branch of acoustics, would collect works belonging to the physical and mathematical section of musical literature; a professor of harmony and counterpoint, those appertaining to the theoretical part of his art; an organist, those treating of his instrument; and so of the rest. The historian of music, and the biographer of musicians and writers on music, are alone required to possess a universal knowledge of the art.

But it may be asked, what are the books and what the compositions to be selected in forming a musical library, and by what means can a knowledge of their titles and general contents be obtained? I answer, that this is not the place to enter into these details, for a mere catalogue of the materials for forming a great musical library would of itself fill several large volumes. The treatises of musical literature by Forkel and Lichtenthal, Gerber's Dictionary of Musicians, and some other authors, are the sources whence this information may be obtained. Unfortunately, these works are more or less incomplete, more or less faulty and erroneous. I am led to hope that the "Historical Dictionary of Musicians," which I have composed, and the tables with which it is furnished, will leave nothing to be desired in this regard.

Franz Schubert's Symphony in C Major.

BY ROBERT SCHUMANN.

[Translated for the London Musical World.]

[Concluded.]

Let the reader bring together and envelope in a slight catholic cloud of incense, the pictures of the Donau, the Stephansturm, and the distant Alpine range, and he will have a picture of Vienna itself, and, when once the charming landscape stands living before him, chords will be touched which otherwise would never have resounded within his breast. On hearing Schubert's symphony, and the clear, blooming, and romantic life it contains, the city rises up before me more plainly than ever, and it becomes once more perfectly evident to me how it is that such works can be produced in exactly such a place. I will not endeavor to give the symphony a folio; the different periods of age vary too much in their tastes, and the youth of eighteen often perceives in a piece of music an event affecting the entire world, where a man sees only an occurrence relating to a single country, while the musician has thought neither of the one nor the other, but simply gave his best music, the music he had in his heart. But that the external world, to-day brilliant and to-morrow gloomy, often penetrates the mind of the poet and musician, is a fact the reader must believe, as well as that more than simply beautiful song, more than mere grief and joy, such as music has already expressed in a hundred different ways, lies concealed in this symphony; nay, to grant it leads us to a region where we cannot remember ever to have been, we have only to hear such a symphony. We find in it, besides masterly technical musical skill of composition, life in every vein, the most delicate gradation of coloring, significance everywhere, and the sharpest expression of individual points, while, finally, diffused over the whole is the romantic hue we have previously met in Franz Schubert. And then the heavenly length of the symphony, like a thick novel in four volumes of Jean Paul, for instance, who also can never end, and that for the best reason, in order to let the reader afterwards create for himself. How does this feeling of riches everywhere refresh us, while, with others, we have always to fear the end, and are so frequently grieved at being deceived. It would be impossible to imagine whence Schubert obtained such playful, brilliant, and masterly power of treating an orchestra, did we not know that this symphony was preceded by six others, and that he wrote it in the most mature vigor of manhood.* It must, at all events, be accounted an extraordinary instance of talent, that a man who, during his lifetime, heard so few of his instrumental works performed, should have been capable of training so peculiarly each instrument, as well as the combined mass of the orchestra, so that they often sound like separate human voices and a chorus. This similarity with the human voice I have never met with, in so surprising and deceptive a degree, in the works of any other composer, except Beethoven's; it is exactly the reverse of Meyerbeer's treatment of the singing-voice. The perfect independence of the symphony, as far as Beethoven is concerned, affords another proof of its manly origin. Let the reader here remark how correctly and wisely Schubert's genius is displayed. Conscious of his more modest capabilities, he avoids any imitation of the grotesque forms and bold relations with which we meet in Beethoven's later compositions; he gives us a work of the most graceful form, and yet interwoven in a novel manner, never departing too far from the middle point, and always returning to it. Such must be the opinion of every one who has frequently studied the symphony. In the commencement, it is true, its brilliant character, novelty of instrumentation, breadth of form, charming alternation of the life of the feelings, and the completely new world into which we are transported, must embarrass many a person, as the first glance at something unusual always does; but even then there still remains the agreeable feeling which we experience, for instance, after a tale of fairy-land or magic; we are quite convinced that the composer was master of his story, and that the connection of one part with another will in time, become clear to us. This sentiment of security is produced at the outset, by the gorgeously romantic introduction, although everything then appears enveloped in mystery. Completely new, too, is the transition from this to the Allegro; the tempo seems not to be altered, and we are landed, we know not how. To analyze the separate movements would gratify neither ourselves nor any one else; it would be necessary to transcribe the entire symphony to give an idea of the novel character pervading it. I cannot, however, part without a word for the second movement, which appeals to us with such touching tones. There occurs in it a passage—where a horn summons us as from the distance—which appears to me to have come from some other sphere. Every one listens in silence as if a heavenly spirit were stealing through the orchestra.

The symphony produced among us an effect produced by no work since those of Beethoven. Artists and amateurs united in its praise; and from the master, who had the work studied so carefully that the result was most magnificent, I heard some observations which I would fain have been able to convey to Schubert, as they would, probably, have caused him the greatest pleasure. It will be years, perhaps, before the symphony is firmly established in Germany, but there is no danger that it will be forgotten or neglected; it bears in itself the germ of eternal youth.

My visit to the churchyard, which reminded me of a relation of the deceased composer, rewarded me doubly; my first reward, I received on the day in question. I found upon Beethoven's grave—a steel pen, which I have religiously preserved. Only on festive occasions, like the present, do I use it; may what has flowed from it prove interesting to my readers.

Johanna Wagner in London.

Having presented the favorable view of this lady's singing and acting, from the News, we give now what we find upon the other side. The independent critic of the Leader (July 5) says:

The memorable and somewhat disrespectful letter of Wagner père, in which that gentleman expressed his belief that the English were no judges of music, and only good for money, finds a melancholy comment in the fact that the enthusiastic admirers of JENNY LIND are the cold and astonished sufferers under JOHANNA WAGNER.

No one, it is true, would believe, from the tone of our most powerful organs of public criticism (with one signal and important exception), that Mlle. Wagner had not created an extraordinary sensation in London. But it is not our fault that the criticism of almost all our contemporaries has degenerated into a dilution of vapid and unnecessary eulogy of all new singers, good, bad, or indifferent, who have found their way into the paradise of puffery. It is our humble but earnest duty to speak what we conceive to be the truth. We are, therefore, bound to record the fact that Mlle. Johanna Wagner has narrowly escaped a total fiasco in this country. Whether the effect would have been the reverse had she made her first appearance in German opera, we are not enabled to conjecture; we think it would have been impossible to have selected a more unfavorable introduction than I Capuletti ed I Montecchi. This feeble and trashy opera, with its meagre and effeminate pasticcio of worn-out reminiscences of tunes strung on to the silliest travesty of a beautiful story, is as dull and worthless a performance as any audience can desire.

The weakness of the opera is rendered monstrous by its Teutonic interpreters. Three Germans to sing Bellini! Mlle. Wagner looks like Minerva in her armor, with her tall and lithesome figure, and the grace and ease of her bounding steps; but the incessant attitude-striking, after the manner not of sculpture, but of those prints of penny warriors so dear to children (1d. plain, 2d. colored), fatigues the admiring and diverts the doubtful critic. There has been so much nonsense talked about the statuesque, that it is time to remind some dramatic artists that poses are a poor substitute for feeling and intelligence. We conscientiously avow that we fail to detect a breath of feeling or a gleam of emotion in that Pallas face from the first scene to the last. Only in the last act is there anything approaching an abandonment to the situation, and even there the sacred fire is not, and the passion is a careful trick. As to the singing, Mlle. Wagner cannot be said to have a voice at all: she has a rough sketch, so to speak, of three voices, all equally harsh, imperfect, and unpleasing. Occasionally, it is true, there is a breadth of "phrasing" not without a certain grandeur; but delicacy, refinement, finish, are all absent, and every now and then we are shocked and exasperated by sounds that are neither speech nor song. It is difficult to expect that Mlle. Wagner will correct these deficiencies; she has too high and too assured a reputation in Germany to take lessons any more. Let us hope, at least, that she may improve her visit to London by hearing Mme. Jenny Lind and Mme. Viardot!

We hear it said that Mlle. Wagner cannot be fairly judged by those who have not heard and seen her as Valentine in the Huguenots, or Fides in the Prophète; and of her Orfeo we have never heard but one, and that the highest, opinion. Nevertheless, we are too well satisfied that her dramatic reputation in England will not have been increased by her appearance. Omne ignotum pro magnifico.

Mme. Goldschmidt's Last Concert in London.

(From the Times, July 1.)

JENNY LIND took her leave of the English public last night, in Exeter-hall, where a veritable multitude had assembled to greet her. The excitement of this occasion can only be compared in intensity and unanimity to that which was created on the night of her début at Her Majesty's Theatre—May 4, 1847. The universal sentiment last night was one of pleasure mixed with pain—for, if ever public performer may be said to have reigned in the heart of a nation, Jenny Lind has reigned in the heart of England, throughout the length and breadth of which her name is familiar as a household word. The causes of this unprecedented popularity need not here be dwelt upon; enough that, although Jenny Lind is one of the greatest of artists, it is not to her art alone that she is indebted for her celebrity; and, on the other hand, while there is every reason to believe her one of the most single-minded and benevolent of her sex, it is not merely her personal character that has raised her to the place she enjoys in the world's esteem. Others have probably sung as well—perhaps (we doubt it) better, but no one, at least in our time, has sung like her; others may have been as kind and charitable, but none have publicly exercised the qualities of charity and kindness in a precisely similar manner. Jenny Lind, is, in fact, an original; in the fullest acceptance of the term. The grace which is hers belongs to herself exclusively. Even her voice, beyond the fact of its being a soprano, possesses nothing in common with any other voice we have heard; and though she has lived in a century remarkable for great singers, she has maintained a place apart from them all.

* Written on the score are the words: "March, 1828." Schubert died in the November following.

Not to become rhapsodical, however, the "Farewell Concert" of Jenny Lind last night is likely to be remembered for a long time to come by the audience and herself, since the demonstration that accompanied it was worthy of both, and flattering to both. As it was undoubtedly the last concert, and as everything connected with the event must possess a certain kind of interest, we subjoin the programme:—

PART I.
Overture: 'Clemenza di Tito,'.....Mozart.
Hymn for Soprano, Chorus and Organ—Mme. Goldschmidt,.....Mendelssohn.
Concerto Dramatic: Violin, Herr Ernst,.....Spohr.
Sacred Cantata: the 130th Psalm—Solos, Mme. Goldschmidt & Mr. Lockey,....Otto Goldschmidt.

PART II.
Overture: 'The Ruler of the Spirits,'.....Weber.
Aria: 'Non paventar,'—Mme. Goldschmidt, Mozart.
Concerto for Piano-forte, with Orchestra, Otto Goldschmidt.
Scena and Aria: 'Ah, non giunge,'—Mme. Goldschmidt,.....Bellini.
Fantasia: Violoncello—Sig. Piatti,.....Piaatti.
Swedish Melody: 'The Echo,'—Mme. Goldschmidt.
Conductor.....Mr. Benedict.

From the above it will be seen that we should be spared the duty of criticism, even if it were possible, under the circumstances, to be critical. Every piece in the programme (including the psalm and concerto of Herr OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT) had been already heard this season. We shall therefore confine ourselves to recording that the regret at parting with such a singer was made all the more poignant by the splendor of her performances, which left the fixed impression that Jenny Lind was about to retire into private life in the very meridian of her powers. When she first came on to sing in Mendelssohn's hymn she was welcomed by a shout of applause from all parts of the hall, the orchestra included. As the concert progressed the enthusiasm of the audience got warmer and warmer, until, after the extremely arduous and trying song of the Queen of Night (from Die Zauberflöte), which taxes the highest notes of the voice so terribly, it became exacting and Jenny Lind was compelled to repeat the Allegro—one performance alone of which is enough to shake the physical force of the strongest and most expert vocalist. The second time however, was even better than the first. The great finale from La Sonnambula presented threefold difficulties after such an effort; but these were overcome with ease, and the cantabile singing in the recitative and largo, "Ah non credea" was unsurpassable for pathos, delicacy, and refinement, disclosing all the old beauties so often described—and especially that incomparable sotto voce shake at the conclusion—in colors more than ever attractive. This truly exquisite performance—listened to throughout by the whole of the vast audience in breathless silence—was followed by such a burst of applause as seldom meets the gratified ears of an artist. The audience were enraptured, and the singer was enraptured too—at least, if we may draw conclusions from the gush of song which followed in the rondo, "Ah non giunge"—only to be likened in its beauty and impulsiveness to those "profuse strains of unpremeditated art" which the poet attributes to the skylark. The audience responded by cheer after cheer, and Jenny Lind was compelled to return to the orchestra; but, having yet another task to perform, she wisely declined to repeat the rondo. The last piece was the well-known "Echo Song," in which, as usual, the songstress accompanied herself at the piano. There was something suggestive in this Swedish melody, which, after the reiterated "echos," as everybody knows, terminates pianissimo—like the music of some sweet voice heard from a long distance. Jenny Lind seemed to bestow more than ordinary pains upon this illusion, and lingered upon the few concluding notes, as if with a feeling that they were the very last to which she was ever to give utterance in presence of the English public. If such were really the case nothing could be more natural, since where so large a sympathy has been shown it is impossible to believe that it has not in some measure been reciprocated. Jenny Lind has given us good cause to think that she does not belong to the common race of artists, and that ingratitude does not belong to her nature. Let us, then, believe that the regret felt at parting was not all on one side, and that the slight tremulousness which imparted an additional charm to those soft and just audible tones at the end of the "Echo Song" came from the heart of the singer, and meant something more than a simple expedient resorted to for the purpose of effect. Of one thing we are certain—the last notes of Jenny Lind will not very soon be forgotten by those who were fortunate enough to hear them. They represented the final greeting of one who has rather been idolized than courted as an ordinary public favorite, and were listened to with an interest little short of painful. To portray the scene that ensued is not easy. The audience rose as one, applauding, cheering, and waving hats and handkerchiefs, with an enthusiasm that defies description. The object of this extraordinary ovation—in which the ladies were quite as earnest as the gentlemen—was at length so moved by it that she caught the infection from her admirers, and waved her own handkerchief, first to the audience, and then to the orchestra, with a heartiness that left little doubt of her emotion. When she had gone she was called back again, and the scene repeated.

The end was thus worthy of the beginning. Jenny Lind won the favor of the English public from the first, and retained it undiminished to the last, which recent events have proved; and, as we take it for granted that few can be indifferent to what immediately concerns the welfare of one who—not merely by rare gifts, but by good works—has attained such distinction, we are glad of this opportunity to assure our readers that Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt retires from public life to devote herself to a home which is now, and has been since she was first married, one of unclouded happiness.

Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt.

(From the London Press.)

It may be heretical—it may be paradoxical—but, even with the deafening cheering of last Monday night at Exeter-hall still ringing in our ears, we must pronounce the Swedish Nightingale to be a puzzle, both in her career as a vocalist and in her policy as an artiste. As a lyric actress there is no other instance on record of a fame acquired by such an extraordinarily limited range of characters; and, as a concert singer, her range of music seems equally to have been confined to the narrowest limits. Jenny Lind was first heard in England in 1847. She achieved assuredly the greatest success ever known, and yet her dramatic reputation is based on Alice in Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable, Amina in Bellini's Sonnambula, and Maria in Donizetti's Figlia del Reggimento. To state that these respective performances were perfection is an exaggeration. But her Norma was a signal failure. Her Susanna in Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, always excepting that wondrous piece of vocalization, the "Deh vieni," was singularly repulsive. Her Adina in the Elisir was a terrible termagant, and her Lucia the most unloving one ever witnessed. Strange it is, but in one of her finest assumptions, in Spontini's Vestale, she never appeared in this country. Taking her oratorio repertoire, we have those magnificent displays in the Messiah, the Creation, and in the Elijah, which will give Lind's name much greater glory than her stage successes. Her collection of music for the concert programmes exhibited little variety. Her eternal "Echo" song, the "Ah non giunge," the "Non paventar," the scena from Beatrice, &c., with ever and anon "John Anderson," a stray ballad of Balfe or Benedict, whoever was conductor for the time being, and some weak work of Herr Otto Goldschmidt, and the catalogue is soon gone through. Setting aside a miserable quibble that has been raised of the probability of Lind's return to sing for others, but not for her own account, assuming that this is a bonâ fide farewell, and not a Grisi juggle, the truth may now be told of Mme. Goldschmidt's final appearance. It has been given out that her chief reason for the campaign of this year in England was to enable her caro sposo to take his position, as she believes, as a second Mendelssohn. If this be true, it was an amiable but an unfortunate delusion, for, whether as pianist or composer, a more marked mediocrity never claimed public patronage than Herr Goldschmidt. In this respect Mme. Schumann, the unrivalled pianiste, has made as great a mistake as Mme. Goldschmidt. Polite toleration and fair hearings have been granted to the productions of Dr. Schumann and Otto Goldschmidt, and that is all. It is yet too early to enter into all the causes of Jenny Lind's popularity. Many judges think that it was mainly owing to her system of singing for charities, like that so successfully adopted by the celebrated Mme. Catalani. This supposition will not stand good, however; if Lind and Catalani had not been great singers, with artistic specialities to distinguish them from the throng, their charitable policy would have availed but little. It is much more reasonable to ascribe the vast triumphs of the Italian and the Swede to their ingenuity in isolation. Catalani would never sing, if she could avoid it, with first-rate artistes. "Moi et mes quatre poupées," her well-known axiom for an Italian opera, has been imitated by Lind. Until towards the close of her career this year, Viardot was the only rival star permitted to approach Mme. Goldschmidt, whose ambition was so overwhelming as to originate Meyerbeer's quaint observation as to its uncompromising character. She has realized an enormous fortune, and yet it is, we believe, a fact, that for money she herself cares but little. To be regarded as the artiste, the singer, here was the impetus to her intensity in the execution of the duties she took on herself.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 26, 1856.

JENNY LIND AND HER LONDON CRITICS.—

Human nature in its varieties seems to be, about equally distributed in all countries. Everywhere, where genius and highest excellence are recognized and felt, you will see just about the same proportion of deniers and protesters, who declare they can see nothing in it, that the great artist's, poet's, hero's success is all a mystery, and probably a humbug. Everywhere just so many persons, who will believe anything, resort to any silly or malicious explanation, rather than accept acknowledged excellence as genuine. When JENNY LIND sang here she carried the masses with her, as she does everywhere; she awakened that kind of enthusiasm which is a blessing in itself, in that it lifts the common mind above its every-day, dull, hacknied, unbelieving habit, and proves again to us that the ideal is as essential to our life as anything we eat or drink or wear; that in the ideal human souls most nearly touch and feel each other, and the divine relationship and destiny. This remarkable artist, possessed of the highest qualities, and in the fullest measure known to our day, which make up the great singer, appealed alike to high and low, to popular instinct and to cultivated taste. The general voice acknowledged her. Yet the chorus of praise was always disturbed by some croaking, ill-omened sounds. There were not wanting those who could not or would not believe the thing was genuine, who muttered humbug, trickery, cold and soulless throat imitation of instruments, &c., who indulged, and to this day at every mention of the singer's name indulge, in petty sneers about "ventriloquism." It seems to be an impossibility for some natures, even with the help of considerable experience and technical knowledge in the externals of an art, to credit or conceive of excellence in spheres which transcend their own. What their scales cannot weigh is naught. What is morally, spiritually superior, what is truly imaginative and not conventional, offends and irritates them because (in all simplicity, not meaning it, but necessarily) it somewhat excludes them and their small ways of seeing, hearing, and of judging. When a musical critic "of long standing" habitually abuses Jenny Lind, you know at once the tone and temper of the man.

In England LIND stood always first, where every great singer in her best days was so well known. Never more so than now. This last farewell visit of Madame GOLDSCHMIDT has been a series of the heartiest ovations. We have copied some of the most important notices of the London press. That of her last concert, which we copy from the Times to-day, is one in tone with nearly all of them. Yet there are crows among these birds also. On the principle of Audi alteram partem, we have copied the testimony of an unbeliever from the London Press. It is in the same sceptical tone, only not so vulgar, as some of the criticisms which have appeared here. The amount of it is, the writer cannot conceive how it can be, that a singer can take so much deeper and wider hold upon the public than all others. Grisi, Sontag, Persiani, &c., are great singers, but they have not done it. Therefore it must be an illusion. The worthy public fancies it has received vastly more than has been actually given. Note what the writer says about her limited repertoire; as if the few rôles she sang in her brief career on the stage, and the oft-returning names of pieces (widely different, it must be owned, in character and style) in the programmes of her crowded concerts, were all or even a tithe of the musical range of Jenny Lind! See what Mr. Benedict has said about it:

It would not be easy, in our time, to meet any cantatrice whomsoever, who could play and sing to you from memory, from the first note to the last, the Armida of Gluck, the Chateau de Montenero of Dalayrac, the Vestale of Spontini, the Deux Journées of Cherubini, the operas of Mozart, Weber and Meyerbeer, the oratorios of Handel and Haydn, all the melodies of Mendelssohn, of Franz Schubert, of Schumann, the Mazurkas and Etudes of Chopin, without counting a very extensive dramatic repertoire, comprising the scores of Rossini, Donizetti, Bellini, Verdi.

It would perhaps be yet more difficult to name an artiste, who could appreciate and comprehend these great schools, become penetrated with their genius, preserve their local colors, and appropriate to herself their styles. It would be almost impossible to find a musicienne, who could at sight decipher the most difficult pieces, retain melodies of an irregular and unusual rhythm, and repeat them, after several days, as if she had created them herself. Mlle. Lind unites these precious qualities.

The insinuation about jealousy of other artists is mean enough; and equally so the alleged discovery of the motive of the singer's recent visit to England—to wit, to bring out her husband as a composer and another Mendelssohn! But it is easy to see that this stern dictum about the "marked mediocrity" of OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT is to be taken with not a few grains of allowance; for it accuses Mme. CLARA SCHUMANN of the same mistake in playing the piano compositions of her husband. Now ROBERT SCHUMANN's compositions, English prejudices to the contrary, are known to have the merit of originality, rare musicianship and beauty—many of them at least—although they may be open on some sides to criticism.

If Jenny Lind would only visit us now, would it not be like the coming of the rain in Mendelssohn's "Elijah"? Our musical experience is wider than when she came before. We have heard more models to compare her with, and should appreciate her excellence more fully than we could before.

A Note from Mr. Crawford, the Sculptor.

NEWPORT, R. I., JULY 22, 1856.

To the Editor of Dwight's Journal of Music.

May I ask the favor of your giving publicity to the following explanation in reference to a misunderstanding, which I supposed some months since had been sufficiently cleared up by your remarks in an article upon the inauguration of the Statue of Beethoven.

I arrived here a few days since from Rome, and hasten to express my surprise at there having been any question regarding the right of proprietorship exercised by Mr. C. C. PERKINS in presenting the bronze statue of Beethoven to the Music Hall of your city. I find that attempts have been made to claim for me a portion of whatever thanks the public owe to Mr. Perkins for the liberality of his donation, by suggesting that he merely paid the expense required for the model of the statue and its execution in bronze; while I gave my time and thought to the creation of it, as an acknowledgment of the obligations I may be under for the appreciation your townsmen have conferred upon me.

I desire that it may be distinctly understood, in justice to Mr. Perkins, that such a representation is without any foundation whatever.

I shall only observe in reply to it, that when Mr. Perkins expressed to me his intention of ordering the bronze statue in question, I immediately requested that he would allow me to dedicate my time in the production of the model, as an indication of my esteem, and of my regard for the friendship with which he has honored me during many years. I need scarcely say that my friend insisted upon declining as strenuously as I insisted upon his accepting such a souvenir; and that finally he was induced to accede to my wishes. I have only to add that I shall always consider the statue to be in every sense of the word the property of Mr. Perkins, and that I have no more right to question his disposition of it than I should have to claim any portion of the praise due to him for a donation without example, I believe, in the city of Boston. Hoping that this subject, which I regret to find is still a vexed one, may be set at rest forever by the explanation I have given, I remain very respectfully yours,

THOS. CRAWFORD.

Beethoven's Sonatas.—A Card.

The subscribers to the new German stereotype edition of Beethoven's Piano-forte Sonatas, are respectfully informed that a case of them has arrived, and that they are ready for delivery at the office of this Journal, 21 School St. The undersigned regrets exceedingly the long delay which has attended their passage to this country, arising from their having been forwarded by a sailing vessel. A. W. TRAYER.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The Commencement festivities at Cambridge last week were enriched by a new element. In the evening the "Orpheus" Club, of about twenty singers, mostly Germans, from this city, encamped in the College yard, and remained till midnight, singing German and Latin songs, and drinking lager beer, with accompaniments of crackers and cheese. The students of course fraternized with a hearty welcome, and thus one of the pleasantest features of German student life was as it were engrafted on the American. President Walker's levee, it is said, was somewhat deserted in favor of this musical encampment.... The Evening Gazette's London correspondent, "La Spia," in speaking of Charles Kean's production of "The Winter's Tale," at the Princess's Theatre, recalls a well-known figure to Bostonians. He says: "One of the most pleasing things in the performance was the familiar, jolly, good-natured countenance and spectacles, with bald head attached, of J. L. HATTON, (of 'little fat man' renown,) who presided over the orchestra, and who could not refrain from often joining his voice, in unison with the bassoon, double bass or some other instrument, to some of the quaint old music which accompanied some of the shepherd and bacchanalian dances of the piece."

MAX MARETZKE, in his new three years' lease of the Academy of Music, has wisely and successfully insisted on the curtailing of the stockholders' privilege, so fatal to all managers. He will charge stockholders fifty cents each for the choice of reserved seats, and every seat not so secured by noon on the day of performance, will be freely sold to the first comer. There is now some chance of a paying season of Italian opera in New York.... The Philadelphia Bulletin translates the following items:

The Cologne Gazette states that it is intended to build a monument to HANDEL at Halle, his native town, and that a committee of the principal citizens has been formed for the purpose.

On the 30th of June there died in Darmstadt, J. REICHEL, once celebrated as one of the first basso singers in Italy or Germany. He was for a long time attached to the opera in Darmstadt. The depth of his bass has seldom been equalled, and many of his parts, as for instance those of Sarastro, Osmin in the "Eloquence," Bertram, Marcel, will long be remembered as wonderful. Reichel was a Hungarian by birth, and a man of such colossal frame that one would have supposed his health impregnable to the ordinary attacks of disease, but he died in his 55th year. He bore, personally, a very high character.

"Stella," of the Worcester Palladium, says that "some of the finest music ever heard in that city was performed in the Catholic Church a week or two ago. If we are rightly informed, a mass by Mozart, and selections from Handel, Beethoven, &c., were given under able direction. Surely this is enough to move the heart of the sternest Know-Nothing. Why must all the best sacred music be confined to the Catholic church? Weekly we ask the question, as we hear fine voices singing nothing but psalm-tunes, the majority of which are to the works of these old masters what Mother Goose is to Shakspeare!"

The celebrated musician CARL FRIEDRICH ABEL was one day walking in the streets of London with Lord Kelly. They passed a tavern, where they heard some one playing a concerto of Abel's. "I should like to know who this conceited tavern virtuoso is," said the lord. "Who else can it be," said Abel, "but the accursed Cain?".... Here is an anecdote of another Abel:

JOHN ABELL was a native of England, at the time of the reign of Charles Second, and was celebrated for his fine counter-tenor voice. He was sent for at court; but evading to go by feigning some slight excuse, was commanded to attend. At the palace he was placed in a chair in the middle of a spacious hall, and suddenly drawn up to a great height, when the king and his attendants appeared in a gallery opposite to him. At the same time a number of wild bears were turned into the hall. The king bid him choose whether he would sing or be let down among the ferocious beasts. Abell chose the former, and declared afterwards that he never sang so well on any occasion before. From this circumstance originated the saying, "The bird that can and won't sing, must be made to sing."

TO THE HUMBLE BEE.

BY R. W. EMERSON.

Burly, dozing Humble Bee!
Where thou art is clime for me.
Let them sail for Porto Rique,
Far-off heats through seas to seek,
I will follow thee alone;
Thou animated torrid zone!
Zigzag steerer, desert cheerer,
Let me chase thy waving lines;
Keep me nearer, me thy hearer,
Singing over shrubs and vines.

Insect lover of the sun,
Joy of thy dominion!
Sailor of the atmosphere,
Swimmer through the waves of air,
Voyager of light and noon,
Epicurean of June,
Wait, I prithee, till I come
Within ear-shot of thy hum—
All without is martyrdom.

When the South wind, in May days,
With a net of shining haze
Silvers the horizon wall,
And, with softness touching all,
Tints the human countenance
With a color of romance,
And, infusing subtle heats,
Turns the sods to violets,
Thou in sunny solitudes,
Rover of the underwoods,
The green silence dost displace
With thy mellow, breezy bass.

Hot midsummer's petted crone,
Sweet to me thy drowsy tone,
Telling of countless sunny hours,
Long days and solid banks of flowers,
Of gifts of sweetness without bound
In Indian wildernesses found,
Of Syrian peace, immortal leisure,
Firmest cheer, and bird-like pleasure.

Aught unsavory or unclean
Hath my insect never seen,
But violets and bilberry bells,
Maple sap, and daffodils,
Grass with green flag half-mast high,
Succory to match the sky,
Columbine with horn of honey,
Scented fern and agrimony,
Clover, catch-fly, adder's tongue,
And briar-roses, dwelt among;
All beside was unknown waste,
All was picture as he past.

Wiser far than human seer,
Yellow-breech'd philosopher!
Seeing only what is fair,
Sipping only what is sweet,
Thou dost mock at fate and care,
Leave the chaff and take the wheat.
When the fierce north-western blast
Cools sea and land so far and fast,
Thou already slumberest deep—
Woe and want thou canst outsleep—
Want and woe, which torture us,
Thy sleep makes ridiculous.

Advertisements.

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)
389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S COLLECTIONS OF GLEES, MADRIGALS, PART-SONGS, &c.

Novello's Glee-Hive.

A Collection of Popular GLEES and MADRIGALS, in Vocal Score, with ad. lib. Accompaniment for Piano-forte. Complete in 8 vols. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt lettering. Price $2 each volume.

These volumes contain eighty-three of the best Glee and Madrigal by standard ancient and modern English composers. Among them will be found some of the finest Glee of Attwood, Calcott, the Earl of Mornington, Spofforth, Stevens, Webbe, &c. Each Glee and Madrigal is printed separately, at prices varying from 4 to 12 cents each.

Novello's Part-Song Book.

In One Volume, handsomely bound in cloth, with illuminated lettering.

This work consists of new Glee and Part-Songs, by the best modern composers—among others, Bishop, Benedict, Macfarren, Rimbauld, Wesley, &c.—with reprints of some of the best Madrigals by ancient composers, and Part-Songs by eminent German composers, set to English poetry. Each Glee and Part-Song printed separately, at from 4 cents to 12 cents each. Vocal parts to the whole work, 25 cents each part; Vocal parts to separate Glee, &c., 8 cents per set.

Orpheus:

A Collection of Glee and Vocal Quartettes, by the most admired German Composers, with English Poetry.

This collection is principally for male voices. Twenty nine books, each containing about six Glee, in separate Vocal parts, with separate Piano-forte accompaniment, have been published, and the issue is continued—the new books being received by J. A. Novello immediately on their publication in London.—Price 88 cents each book.

The Musical Times, AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR,

PUBLISHED (IN LONDON) ON THE FIRST OF EVERY MONTH.

Containing ANTHEMS, CHORALS, and HYMNS, or GLEES, MADRIGALS, and ELEGIES, for One, Two, Three, Four, or more Voices. Price 8 cents each.

A Monthly Journal, containing original articles by Edward Holmes, Author of the "Life of Mozart," &c.; Short notices of Singing-Classes, Concerts, &c.; Advertisements of new and important Musical Works; and, in addition, three or four pages of Music. The alternate numbers contain Music with secular or sacred words. Price 8 cents each, or post-free, 4 cents. Nos. 1 to 48, (Vols. I. and II.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 49 to 98, (Vols. III. and IV.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 99 to 144, (Vols. V. and VI.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75. Either Vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, may be had separately, in paper covers, 75 cents each. Annual subscription to the Musical Times, 50 cents, post-paid.

J. A. NOVELLO,

No. 389 Broadway, New York,
And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Garcia's Complete School of Singing.

JUST PUBLISHED:—A Complete School of Singing, in which the Art is clearly developed in a series of Instructions and appropriate Examples, to which are added Exercises, written and composed by MANUEL GARCIA.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESSEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $80 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THIS beautiful Art novel, by MME. GEORGE SAND, just completed in the Journal of Music, for which it was especially translated, has been reprinted in a neat pamphlet, and may be had at this office, and at the periodical and bookstores. Price 15 cents. Copies sent by mail post-paid, for 18 cents.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ma.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S
Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line 10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line 5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion $12.00
Do do each subsequent $6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 226.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 2, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 18.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BRACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGRAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Translated from the German for this Journal.]

The Life and Characteristics of Beethoven.

BY L. L. NICHOLSON DIZING.

As a star of the first magnitude in the musical firmament shines the name of a man, who opened an entirely new path in the domain of music, and who by the magic of his melodies mightily stirred the hearts of his hearers and drew tears from their eyes. This hero, whom nature had gifted with a rich and inexhaustible imagination, was LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN.

He sprang from a musical family. His grandfather, Ludwig van Beethoven, who died Dec. 24, 1773, as kapellmeister and bass singer in the service of the Elector of Cologne, Max Frederick, had often in his earlier days appeared acceptably upon a national theatre established by his liege. He had particularly distinguished himself in the musical play: L'amore artigiano, and in the then very favorite opera, "The Deserter," by Monsigny. His son, John van Beethoven, also devoted himself to music. He held afterwards a position in the chapel of the Elector, residing at Bonn. On the 12th of November, 1767, he married Maria Magdalena Kewerich, the daughter of a head cook of the Elector of Treves, and widow of the electoral Chamberlain, Johann Laym. She was born on the 20th of December, 1746, at Ehrenbreitstein, near Coblenz, and died at Bonn on the 17th of July, 1787. Her husband died Dec. 18, 1792.

The second son by this marriage was the great master of tones, LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN.—He was born at Bonn, on the 17th of December, 1770. His elder brother, Ludwig Maria, had died soon after his birth (April 2, 1769). After him two younger brothers saw the light: Caspar Anton Carl, on the 8th of April, 1774; and Nicolaus Johann, on the 2d of October, 1776. The former supported himself as a piano-forte teacher; the latter learned the art of an apothecary at Bonn. Both afterwards followed their brother Ludwig to Vienna, where he spent the greatest part of his life.

Reliable accounts indicate as the spot where Beethoven first saw the light, the "Graus house," situated in the Bonn-gasse, number 515, the fourth house on the right from the Jews' lane, afterwards owned by Dr. Schildt. Subsequently his parents hired a habitation of the baker, Fischer, in the Rhein-gasse, No. 934, and this house has often been erroneously taken for Beethoven's birth-place.

The scandal here and there circulated about Beethoven's descent from the king of Prussia, Frederick William II., scarcely needs a refutation, since neither was that monarch in Bonn before Beethoven's birth, nor had the mother ever left that city during her married life. How Beethoven expressed himself concerning it, appears from a letter which he addressed in the latter part of his life, Dec. 7, 1826, to an aged friend. "You write me," said Beethoven, "that I have somewhere been referred to as a natural son of the late king of Prussia. I heard of the story a long time ago. But I have made it a principle, never to write anything about myself, and never to answer anything that is written about me. I gladly leave it to you therefore to make known to the world the honesty of my parents, and particularly of my mother."

The education of Beethoven was not distinguished. Reading, writing, drawing, and a little Latin he learned at a public school. Among the pupils the one to whom Beethoven was most deeply attached, was Wurzer, afterwards president of the State Tribunal at Coblenz. But little progress was made in his elementary studies. Music soon supplanted in him any interest in other occupations. Already in his fourth year he knew no greater satisfaction than to listen to his father, when he was preparing himself for a musical performance on the piano. Then Beethoven hastened away from his playmates, listened with eager attention to the fascinating tones, and begged his father, when about to end, that he would still keep on. His greatest pleasure was when his father took him on his lap, and let him with his little fingers accompany the melody of a song on the piano. Presently he began to attempt a repetition of it all alone. This succeeded so well in his fifth year, that his father was induced to give him instruction in music. But by this means music was well nigh spoiled for him entirely. Often did he shed bitter tears over the hard treatment of his not very morally refined father, who was somewhat given to drink, and in that condition would indulge in an irritability that knew no bounds. This inconsiderate harshness of the father had a still more special ground. His salary scarcely sufficed for the bare necessities of life. In the want of other resources, he cherished the hope of soon procuring through his oldest son some aid towards the education of the two other sons.

Better instruction than he owed his father, in such circumstances, Beethoven received from a certain PREIFFER, who was music-director and oboist, and afterwards kapellmeister to a Bavarian regiment. To this excellent man, who was known as a talented composer, Beethoven was indebted for the greatest part of his musical education. In his later years he gratefully remembered the instructor of his youth, and, when he found himself in needy circumstances, sent him pecuniary aid from Vienna.

Still greater progress did Beethoven make in music, when one of the most distinguished pianists in Bonn, the court organist and chamber musician, VAN DER EDEN, offered, in consideration of the father's straitened circumstances, to instruct the boy gratuitously. But van der Eden's duties were so pressing, that the lessons could not be continued as regularly as the teacher, who was much delighted with his pupil's progress, could have wished. Van der Eden received a commission from the Elector Max Franz, whose attention had been called to the talent of the boy, to give him an hour's instruction daily at the royal expense. In his musical development, and especially in the technical handling of the organ, Beethoven made such rapid progress, that he often had to let himself be heard in the chapel and in the private chambers of the Elector, and always won applause. Max Franz provided also for the further instruction of the boy after van der Eden's death. Beethoven's teacher now was the celebrated composer and court organist, CHRISTIAN GOTTLÖB NEEFE, who, after having been for a long time music director in Grossmann's theatrical company, had been appointed to the place vacated by van der Eden's death in the electoral chapel at Bonn.

It was of essential advantage for Beethoven's musical culture, particularly for his taste, that he was made acquainted through Neeffe with the works of SEBASTIAN BACH, and learned to overcome the difficulties involved in the execution of these compositions. By this means he acquired an uncommon facility of finger, by which his playing was in later years distinguished. In his eleventh year he already played Sebastian Bach's "Well-tempered Clavichord," which consisted of four and twenty preludes and fugues in all the keys, with such wonderful facility, that his performance was compared with that of many a distinguished pianist. In his ninth year he had begun to compose. His attempts were more successful, after Neefe had taught him the rules of composition, of which until then he had been entirely ignorant. In his eleventh year he composed nine variations on a march, three piano sonatas, and some songs, among others the well known one of Claudius: Wenn jemand eine Reise thut, &c. He also wrote about this time the music to a chivalric ballet produced by the high nobility in the Carnival season, which for a long time passed for the work of a Count von Waldstein, who with the dancing master Habich from Aix had arranged the ballet in question.

Beethoven had found an especial patron, who remained not without influence on the higher culture of his talent, in the above-named Count von Waldstein, who at that time lived at Bonn as knight of the Germanic Order, and afterwards as Commander of the order and imperial treasurer at Birnsberg. The Count was not merely a connoisseur of music; he engaged in it practically. It was he who first rightly appreciated Beethoven's talent, and through him was developed in the young artist the gift of varying and working out a theme extempore. From him Beethoven received, with the most delicate regard to his sensibility, frequent pecuniary aid, which was for the most part considered a donation from the Elector. With him the Count stood in high favor, and was almost his inseparable companion. By his mediation Beethoven already in his fifteenth year (1785) was appointed organist to the electoral chapel in Bonn, where he alternated with his teacher, Neefe, in the discharge of the not heavy duties. The little organ in the then Court Chapel (now Evangelical Church) required no great dexterity, nor could such have found sphere in an instrument of such limited construction. Neefe was strong and healthful, and not prevented by other business from attending to his duties. From all this it appears, that Beethoven's appointment was simply a kind provision for his support. Beethoven always alludes to his patron, the Count Waldstein, with a feeling of the deepest gratitude, which he expressed in his later years by dedicating to him his great Sonata in C major, (opus 58), one of his most celebrated works.

To the musical instruction which he gave in a few families, Beethoven was indebted for an attractive acquaintance, which was of the most favorable influence for his social culture. He made it in the house of the widow of the electoral Counsellor von Breuning. The family consisted of three sons, nearly of Beethoven's own age, and one daughter. Besides the latter, the youngest son also received music lessons from Beethoven, and was already a distinguished piano-player, when, after completing his medical studies, in 1798, he died. The second son, Stephen, afterwards imperial Counsellor in Vienna, where he died a few months after Beethoven, (on the 4th of June, 1827,) was his friend of many years' standing, devoted to him with the most inviolable constancy. The third son, Christopher, received a position in Berlin, as privy counsellor of revision and cassation. To the daughter, Eleonore, afterwards married to Dr. F. G. Wegeler, in Coblenz, Beethoven dedicated his first Variations for the Piano.

Throughout his life he retained a friendly recollection of the happy days which he had spent in that family. There too he had first become acquainted with the German literature, particularly with the best poetical productions. In that house reigned, with all the impulsiveness of youth, an unconstrained fine tone. Christopher and Stephen von Breuning tried their hands not without success in little poems. The family lived comfortably, and in their social circles there prevailed a conversation, which combined the useful with the agreeable. From several of the later letters of Beethoven it is evident how contented he felt himself in that family, where he was soon treated as a child of the house. Not only the greatest part of the day, but many a night he passed there. There he felt free and without any restraint. Many things conspired to make him cheerful and to further the development of his mind. Especially did the friendly and good-natured lady of the house exert a beneficent influence upon the young man's humors, which occasionally bordered upon stubborn self-will.

In his above-mentioned capacity as court organist, Beethoven first gave accidentally to the orchestra a proof of his talent at a solemnity which took place during Passion week in the Catholic church. There the Lamentations of Jeremiah, consisting as it is well known of little sentences of four to five lines, were chanted to a definite rhythm as chorales. The tune consisted of four successive tones, for example, c, d, e, f; several words, indeed whole sentences being always sung upon the third, until a few concluding words led back into the ground tone. As the organ had to be silent during Passion week, the singer was only accompanied ad libitum by a pianist. Beethoven, upon whom this office devolved, contrived by his modulations in the accompaniment to throw the very accurate singer Heller so out of time, that he could not find the closing cadence. The kapellmeister Lucchesi, who was present, was amazed at Beethoven's playing. The latter was complained of by Heller, in the first ebullition of his rage, to the Elector, who, although pleased at the youthful wag-gery of the pianist, commanded a more simple accompaniment.

About this time also Beethoven became Chamber musician. One day he was playing at sight in a court circle a new Trio by Pleyel, together with FRANZ RIES, the first violinist of the Electoral Chapel, who died in his native city, Bonn, in 1845, and the celebrated BERNHARD ROMBERG, who closed his early career in 1841, at Hamburg. In the second part of the Adagio, the artists, if they were not together, did not break down; they played bravely on, and came out happily together. It was found afterwards that there had been two bars left out in the piano part. The Elector wondered very much about this work of Pleyel's, and a week afterwards caused it to be repeated, when the mystery was discovered, to the satisfaction of the prince.

It was on the first return of the famous JOSEPH HAYDN from England, in July, 1792, that the Elector's orchestra surprised him with some music at a breakfast at Godesberg; a summer place of resort near Bonn. Beethoven was very happy, when a Cantata of his composition, which he submitted to the great master, attracted the especial notice of Haydn, who encouraged the composer to continued studies. The intended performance of this cantata afterwards at Mer-gentheim, where the Elector used to reside as grand master of the Germanic Order, fell through, because several passages for the wind instruments were so difficult, that several musicians declared they could not play them.

According to the judgment of one of his contemporaries, Beethoven's piano-playing, for which he was afterwards so celebrated, had at that time something rough and hard about it; he had never yet heard any excellent pianist and knew not the fine nuances in the treatment of the instrument. Not long afterwards, when he had composed his Variations, dedicated to the Countess von Hatzfeld, upon Vieni amore, a theme of Rhigini, he followed the electoral orchestra to Aschaffenburg. By Ries and the two Rombergs he was presented to the kapellmeister STERKEL, who died in 1817, in his native city, Würzburg. By repeated entreaties this then celebrated master was moved to play upon the piano. His performance was very easy and graceful. Beethoven stood by him with the most earnest attention. It was now his turn to play. He only consented to do so because Sterkel had intimated a doubt whether he himself, as the composer of the above-named Variations, could play them readily. Sterkel could not find them. But Beethoven played not only those Variations, so much as he remembered of them, but also several others, which were not less difficult, to the greatest amazement of the listeners, in the same graceful manner, by which he had been so much struck in Sterkel. He thus gave a proof, how easy it was for him to learn his manner of piano-playing from another.

At this time, however different it may have been in later years, it cost but little pains to persuade him to a musical performance. It only required a friendly invitation. So much the greater was his aversion to giving lessons, except those in the von Breuning family. Opposite the house of Madame von Breuning was the hotel of the Austrian ambassador, Count von Westphal. Beethoven could hardly be induced to continue the often interrupted lessons which he had commenced there. Frequently he turned back before the door of the hotel. Then he would promise Madame von Breuning, that he would give two hours' instruction on the following day, but that day it was impossible. His own rather narrow circumstances did not trouble him; but he was made anxious by the thought of his family, particularly of his mother, whom he deeply loved. A similar, if not even stronger aversion, to that for giving lessons, was felt by Beethoven in his later years against invitations to play the piano in company.

"Then he came to me," relates one of his friends, "gloomy and out of tune. He complained of their forcing him to play, even if the blood burned under his nails. Gradually a conversation was spun out between us, in the course of which I sought in a friendly way to entertain and quiet him. That end attained, I let the conversation drop. I seated myself at my writing-desk, and Beethoven, if he wanted to speak with me again, had to sit down upon the stool before the piano. Presently with a careless hand, often while turned away from the instrument, he would seize a couple of chords, out of which by little and little the loveliest melodies developed themselves. About his playing I must say little or nothing, even in passing. Beethoven now went off in an entirely changed mood, and always liked to come back again. But that repugnance still remained, and frequently became the source for him of the greatest misunderstandings with his friends."

[To be continued.]

Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri."

[ROBERT SCHUMANN is certainly one of the "best abused" and hated of all musical composers. Witness the following amusingly bitter protestations from that lamentable victim of the English bugbear about the "Music of the Future," the London Musical World.]

The last concert of the season, [of the Philharmonic Society,] which took place on Monday night, was certainly unique. The programme was entirely devoted to—

"Paradise and the Peri," a cantata for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra, by Dr. Robert Schumann; the poetry from Moore's Lalla Rookh, translated and adapted to the music by William Bartholomew. First time of performance. Conductor, Professor Sterndale Bennett."

We do not remember any other composer besides Schumann to whom the whole programme of a concert has been assigned. No doubt "Paradise and the Peri" is a long work, which must necessarily preclude anything else being given on the same night. The Choral Symphony is a long work, too, but only one part of the programme is absorbed in its performance. There are many other compositions of length (and strength) which are dealt with by the society according to rule. If compassable within the ordinary duration for one part, they may be performed; if not, they are rejected. The new work of Dr. Schumann constituted an exception: why, we cannot make out, unless that it was given at the express desire of her Majesty, who attended, and who should have the privilege of constructing her own scheme, or, at least, of naming the principal morceaux. If, on the present occasion, Her Most Gracious Majesty named Dr. Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," she was thereby the unconscious means of excluding anything else from the programme. We repeat, the concert was unique.

Mme. Goldschmidt's singing was entirely thrown away, the music of "Paradise and the Peri" being everywhere unvocal, and scarcely anywhere interesting. Indeed, many who heard Jenny Lind for the first time, went away disappointed, having expected something very different from a singer of such colossal reputation. In short, a more dreary concert was never listened to at the Philharmonic.

Of the music of "Paradise and the Peri," it is not easy to speak. If judged by the standard of the great writers, it can hardly be considered music at all. It has nothing akin to Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, Mendelssohn, Weber, Cherubini, Rossini, or any of those whom we have been taught to regard as the masters of the art. There is no melody, no form—nothing that "appeals" to the ear—nothing that touches the heart. Even the effects, to which the disciples of the new school point so triumphantly, are produced by means anything but legitimate. Dr. Schumann, in short, is not possessed of that musical organization, without which all the talent and ingenuity in the world avail nothing. He has mind—but his mind is not musical. He has power—but he lacks the instinct for music. He produces by some mysterious rule of his own; but nothing he does springs naturally from the heart. For years Schumann reigned a high authority on musical matters; but in an evil hour he fancied he could compose, and began, as he imagined, to exemplify his doctrines of taste by music of his own. Finding he could not follow in the path of the really great masters, he determined to strike out a new one for himself, which he effected accordingly in a totally opposite direction. The world will never be in want of those who think that whatever is new must be good, and that what is unintelligible must surely be profound. Dr. Schumann was hailed as an apostle of a new school, and became the prophet of a certain clique. The new preacher, nevertheless, did not boast of many disciples; and Schumann was soon compelled to abdicate in favor of another apostle, who brought with him greater eloquence, subtlety, and daring, with an equal contempt for precedents. The old was deserted for the new; Schumann was dethroned, and Richard Wagner sat in his place. Such is a brief outline of Schumann's career. The asylum at Düsseldorf can tell the sequel.

The principal vocal performers in the Cantata were Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt, Mr. Lockey, Madame Weiss, Mr. Benson, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Lawler. The orchestra and chorus were as zealous and careful as if they had to play the Walpurgis Night or the Requiem. The singers did their utmost. Professor Sterndale Bennett took immense pains, and never more earnestly strove for a success; but all would not do. There was no success—not even the shadow of a success. The applause at the end was faint, until the Queen arose to depart, when loyalty gave vent to that enthusiasm which the music itself failed to excite.

And yet Jenny Lind sang the last air—when the Peri has found the treasure which buys back her place in Eden—like a cherubim(!)

(From the same, June 28.)

Robert Schumann has had his innings, and been bowled out—like Richard Wagner. "Paradise and the Peri" has gone to the tomb of the "Lohengrins."

When, to drop metaphor, is all this trifling to cease? How many times more shall we have to insist that the new school—the school of "the Future"—will never do in England? If the Germans choose to muddle themselves with beer, smoke, and metaphysics, till all things appear to them through a distorted medium, or dimly suggested through a cloud of mist, there is no reason why sane and sober Britons should follow their example. The moon-struck zealots of Weimar, Halle, and Leipzig, have their Liszt, to (mis) guide them; but without a Liszt, who may "stand at our elbow and teach us what is whale and what ouzel" (Athenæum—"ante," page 786), it is impossible for ordinary thinkers to apprehend the meaning, if meaning there be, of such strange fish as Wagner, Schumann, Brahms, Franz and Co. Unhappily, or happily, we are unprovided with a jack-a-lantern. Thus, when listening to the music of such men, we are compelled to wander at random in a dark and impenetrable forest, without even a cheat of a will-o-the-wisp to deceive us for a moment into the notion that we are going somewhere, that we are really about to light upon an unseen path conducting to an outlet from the labyrinth of trees and undergrowth. We are lost, like the babes of the wood, when night approaches—seeing nothing but shadowy phantoms, hearing nothing but the howling of furious wolves, and the roaring of pitiless pards. Why then, we repeat, in the absence of Liszt—who will not travel from Weimar to London, and enlighten us, but sends us books which we cannot understand—why thus helplessly afflict us with Wagner and Schumann? We put it to Professor Bennett, who took such care to introduce the Peri in her best attire, that, but for her moral deformity, she might have passed for something decent and becoming—we put it to Professor Bennett, who has redeemed the Philharmonic sins by good works, and saved those who, justly, should have done penance in a winding sheet—we put it to Professor Bennett, a musician and composer of genius and attainments, who knew Mendelssohn intimately, and worships John Sebastian with his soul—to Professor Bennett, the champion of English instrumental music among foreigners, and the spoiled child of his own country—Professor Bennett, who was nurtured in harmony, and brought up in the path which all sincere musicians should tread—we put it to Bennett, whether such a tuneless rhapsody as "Paradise and the Peri" was fit for those whose delicate ears—during half a century, more or less—have been nourished with the pure, and sweet, and healthy strains of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, and Mendelssohn? We anticipate his answer—"No."

After the disastrous failure of Richard Wagner and his music, last season, there was no excuse for devoting a whole concert to the music of another composer of "the Future." Since these gentlemen have written for "the Future," let "the Future" enjoy the exclusive benefit of their inspirations. Why perturb and vex the Present to no purpose? The Present—as the most enthusiastic partisans of Schumann and Wagner admit, nay, insist—is incapable of fathoming the depths of their philosophy; all the length of line which it can throw out is unsufficient to get half-way down to the bottom. To abandon it as hopeless, then, and rest satisfied with Mozart and his successors, would surely be the wiser course.

Such an experiment as that of Monday evening must not, on any account, be repeated. The Queen's visit and Jenny Lind's singing were almost rendered inflictions—since, as no one was willing to rise before Her Majesty had given the signal, or to quit the concert-room while Jenny Lind was in the orchestra, the inconveniently crowded audience was compelled by courtesy, if not by inclination, to remain till the end. Imagine—oh, uninitiated reader!—three uninterrupted hours of Schumann, three uninterrupted hours of music "without form and void," three hours of organized sound without a single tune! We are not exaggerating, but stating a simple fact. Seriously, this passes the limits of toleration. It was sad to listen to the efforts of Mme. Goldschmidt Lind and her associates—so clever, intelligent, and zealous—to give life to music which has no more spark of vitality than a corpse; it was painful to view the care-stricken countenance of the conductor, who with an "anxious polyscopy," natural under the circumstances, surveyed now the band and chorus under his control, now Jenny Lind and her vocal fellow-sufferers, now the Queen and her most musical Consort, and now the poor subscribers, half suffocated and half asleep—as though fearful that in spite of all his toil and trouble, the cantata would sooner or later go to pieces. Poor Professor Bennett! His task was not an enviable one—before the Queen, too, in presence of the "Nightingale," and with Mr. Costa, all eyes and ears, among the audience.

Last year Richard Wagner very nearly annihilated the Philharmonic. Luckily he did not quite. But, now that Wagner has returned to Zurich, never again to be summoned "to the rescue," if Robert Schumann is allowed to represent the school of "the Future" (not as conductor, of course, but as composer), a still greater peril will be incurred—for, though Richard is more subtle, uncompromising, arrogant, and fearless, Robert is more specious. His music, at times, more nearly resembles music than the monstrous combinations of Tannhäuser and Lohengrin; yet inasmuch as, in principle, it is just as vicious and bad, for that reason it is all the more dangerous.

Paradise, or Purgatory?

[From Punch.]

Being particularly desirous to know what kind of a musical dish the Philharmonic Society had set before the Queen and the subscribers at the concluding concert, Mr. Punch on the following morning sent for the two journals in which the two ablest musical critics of the day keep watch and ward. The great and important novelty of the night was a composition, called "Paradise and the Peri," by Dr. Schumann, and Mr. Punch's mind was thus set at rest, and his curiosity satisfactorily met.

The Daily News says:

"From the impression on ourselves, as well as the evident effect on a highly critical audience, we believe 'Paradise and the Peri' to be a work of great genius and power, of which the beauties will develop themselves more and more as it is oftener heard and better understood."

The Times says:

"We have only to add that 'Paradise and the Peri,' as a musical composition, is destitute of invention, and wanting in intelligible form. In short, any thing so hopelessly dreary, so wholly made up of shreds and patches, so ill-defined, so generally uninteresting,—we have rarely heard."

And the question being thus decided, and the foolish idea of the heterodox, who think that there is no such thing as an absolute fact in musical art, being thus overthrown, Mr. Punch is happy to place on imperishable record the opinions of his brother critics, with whom, he begs to add, that he cordially agrees, without having heard the composition they describe.

Objects of Musical Education, and their Time.

By DR. A. B. MARX.*

What is to be learned, and which is the proper time for each kind of instruction? These questions, of the utmost importance in their minutest particulars, demand the gravest and most searching consideration from parents and teachers when they have determined to dedicate a child to musical education. To professors of music, these questions must always be of the highest interest. In order to point out, at least, the most important periods, we will take a cursory view of all the relationships and circumstances of musical employment, whether as a profession or otherwise.

We must, in the first place, clear away a deep and widely diffused prejudice. On the question being asked: What ought to be learned in music? it is usual, particularly among teachers, to make a distinction between those persons who make music a profession, and those who cultivate it merely for pleasure and general humanizing education; between future professional men and mere amateurs. The former, according to the judgment of the teachers, ought to be fundamentally—the latter, however, only superficially, or less fundamentally instructed. This distinction is one of the most erroneous and destructive that ever crept into discipline. That education alone is beneficially fruitful which is most perfectly grounded; and what is more, it is the easiest, and consumes the least time. In order to be convinced of the truth of these assertions, it is only necessary to have a right understanding of the nature of this fundamental knowledge; not of the false pedantry which assumes its name (and is as useless to the professional man as to the amateur), but of the study absolutely necessary for the comprehension of the real nature of the science, of the close connection of all that is essential, and of the constant and rational development of one form or figure from another, so that the preceding form necessarily leads on the succeeding, and the succeeding form is always prepared and facilitated by the preceding.

Between the instruction of the artist and of the amateur there is only this difference—that the latter may discontinue his pursuit of the science earlier than the former, at any point or position of artistic power he may choose to fix; whereas the artist is necessarily obliged to dedicate himself entirely, once and for ever, to the art of his election.

Now to return to our own proper question—What is to be learned, and which is the right time for each study?

I. SONG.

We have already said that, if possible, every one should learn music: we now pronounce our opinion more specially, that every one, if possible, should learn singing. Song is man's own true peculiar music. The voice is our own peculiar connate instrument—it is much more—it is the living sympathetic organ of our souls. Whatever moves within us, whatever sensation or emotion we feel, becomes immediately embodied and perceptible in our voice; and so, indeed, the voice and song, as we may observe in the earliest infancy, are our first poetry and the most faithful companions of our feelings, until the "shrill pipe of tremulous age." If, as in song, properly so called, music and speech be lovingly united, and the words be those of a true poet, then is consummated the most intimate union of mind and soul, of understanding and feeling—that combined unity, in which the whole power of the human being is exhibited, and exerts upon the singer and the hearer that wonderful might of song, which by infant nations was considered, not quite untruly, as supernatural; and whose softened, and therefore, perhaps, more beneficent influence now contributes to social elevation and moral improvement.

Song is the most appropriate treasure of the solitary, and it is at the same time the most stringent and forcible bond of companionship, even from the jovial or the sentimental popular catch of the booth, to the sublime creations of genius resounding from congregated artistic thousands assembled by one common impulse in the solemn cathedral. Devotion in our churches becomes more edifying; our popular festivals and days of enjoyment become more mannerly and animated; our social meetings more lively and intellectually joyful; our whole life, in short, becomes more elevated and cheerful by the spread of the love of song and of the power of singing among the greatest possible number of individuals. And these individuals will feel themselves more intimately connected with society, more largely participating in its benefits, of more worth in it and gaining more in it and gaining more by it, when they unite their voices in the social harmony of their friends.

To the musician, but more especially to the composer, song is an almost irreplaceable and indispensable means of calling forth and seizing the most delicate, tender, and deepest strains of feeling from our inmost sensations. No instrument can be a substitute for song, the immediate creation of our own soul in our own breast; we can have no deeper impression of the relations of sound, of the power of melody; we cannot work more effectively upon our own souls and upon those of our hearers than by heartfelt song.

Every friend of music, therefore, should sing; and every musician, who has a tolerable voice, should be a master of song in every branch. Song should, also, in the order of time, be our first musical exercise. This should begin in the earliest childhood, in the third to the fifth year, if it be not possible earlier; but not in the form of instruction. The song of the mother, which allures imitation, the joyful circle of children playing together, is the first natural singing school, where, without notes or masters, simply according to hearing and fancy, the fibres of the soul are first freely excited and set in vibration. Instruction in music, properly so called, should not in general begin until the second step of life's ladder, between the seventh and fourteenth years.

By far the greatest number of individuals have sufficient qualifications of voice for singing, and to justify their pursuit of the art with reasonable hope of success. Indeed, very considerable and valuable vocal faculties are much more common than is generally imagined. There is certainly less deficiency of natural gifts than of persons observant and talented enough to discover, to foster, and to cultivate them. In the meantime, if indeed every one have not disposition and means (and good fortune) to become of some consequence as a singer, let us consider that even with an inconsiderable voice, much of the most touching and joy-inspiring capabilities may be attained, if feeling, artistic cultivation, and a vivid conception speak through a medium but slenderly endowed. Why should any one be dissatisfied if small means and trouble have made him capable of touching our hearts with a joyful or tender song; or have enabled him to participate skilfully in the choral assemblies of his fellow citizens? Whether it may be advisable to proceed farther in singing and the cultivation of the voice, must be decided by the circumstances and inclinations of each individual. From composers, conductors, and higher masters, a complete knowledge of everything belonging to singing is to be absolutely demanded, and also practical execution thereof; unless, indeed, organic defect should render it to them impossible. A composer who does not expressly study singing, and practise it as far as possible, will scarcely be able to write for the voice; he will with difficulty acquire the more delicate musical declamation; he will never become entire master of the life-like conducting of the voice, which is something far different from mere correctness.

II. PLAYING ON THE PIANO.

After singing, the command of the pianoforte is our most essential qualification, and among us is so considered. The piano is the only instrument, excepting the scarcely accessible organ, on which melody and harmony, and the rich web of combined and simultaneous voices, or parts, can be produced with accuracy and almost unlimited magnificence of effect. It is also highly adapted to accompanying song, and to conducting. From these advantages it has happened, that for this single instrument more masterpieces have been written, since the time of Seb. Bach up to Beethoven, than for all other instruments put together. Most songs have been composed with accompaniment for that instrument—organ parts can be transferred without any change—and whatever quartet and orchestral music found favor with the public, was immediately presented to pianoforte players in the form of arrangements, &c. Therefore, no branch of practice can promise so rich a harvest as piano playing; and it must be acknowledged, that, without so abundant a field, any extended acquaintance with our musical literature would be scarcely possible to the world in general. To the composer this instrument is nearly indispensable, partly on the foregoing grounds, and partly because no other is so appropriate, both for exercising and exciting his own imagination and for proving the effect of many-part compositions. It is equally important to the conductor and to the singing master. Even its defects are advantages to musical education, and particularly to the composer. The pianoforte is greatly inferior to bowed and wind instruments in inward feeling and power of tone or quality of sound, in the power of sustaining a tone in equality of force, in crescendo or in diminuendo, in melting two or more tones into each other, and in gliding imperceptibly from the one to the other, all which so admirably succeeds on bowed instruments. The piano does not fully satisfy the ear: its performance, compared to that of bowed and wind instruments, is in a manner colorless, and its effect, in comparison with the resplendence of an orchestra, is as a drawing to a painting. But exactly on this account the piano moves more powerfully the creative faculty of both player and hearer; for it requires their assistance to complete and color, to give full significance to that which is but spiritually indicated. Thus imagination fosters the new idea, and penetrates therewith to our hearts; while other instruments immediately seize, and move, and satisfy the senses, and by their means attack the feelings more powerfully, perhaps, in a sensuous direction, but not so fruitfully in the soul. This is probably the chief reason why the piano has become the especial instrument for spiritual musical education, and particularly for composition; since other instruments easily overcome their votaries, whom they seduce into their own instrumental peculiarities, and create a one-sided mannerism in their productions.

For the earliest instruction, also, the piano has the advantage (good tuning being supposed) of presenting to the pupil correct tones, and a clear insight into the tonic system by the key-board.

But just from this point arises the important quality of the instrument, which may be perilous to all the real advantages derived from it, unless it be sedulously counteracted; and this, we must confess, is at present but little thought of—may, indeed, that dangerous quality is speculated on, and an entirely false system of education is built on it for outward show, through whose apparent advantages even the true artistic education is represented in a false light, as ignorant and baneful. Since the pianoforte has its fixed tones provided, it is easier to play upon this instrument than upon any other, without any internal feeling of correctness of tone, or even without hearing, and to arrive at a certain degree of mechanical dexterity. How often do we meet ready piano players, who, from want of a cultivated feeling of tone, are incapable of singing a correct succession of tones, or of imagining it, who have no clear notion of what they are playing—nay, who in reality hear nothing correctly! How many bravura players might one name, to whom the artistic meaning of a simple movement remains a sealed book, and who therefore perform the greatest and the least compositions, with assumption and vanity indeed, but without awakening joy in themselves or in their audience, but merely a fruitless astonishment at their technical cleverness! And how deep has this perversion of art into dead mechanism penetrated into artistic life! Whoever has an opportunity of observing many students of music and their teachers, cannot conceal from himself that at present, particularly in large towns devoted to vanity and fashion, the greater part of the pianoforte students are in this manner led astray; and that a great part of the teachers are themselves ignorant of the right path, or otherwise have not the courage to oppose the stream of fashion, or the allurements of example and personal advantage.

* General Musical Instruction. (Allgemeine Musiklehre.) An Aid to Teachers and Learners in every branch of Musical knowledge. By Dr. Adolf Bernhard Marx, Professor of Music in Berlin. Translated, by George Macrone, from the original German, expressly for Novello's Library for the Diffusion of Musical Knowledge. The musical portion has been revised by Mr. Josiah Pittman, Organist of Lincoln's Inn. London and New York: J. Alfred Novello.

If, however, satisfactory instruction is not to be expected from all masters, nor every student is to hope for the choice of a good master, there remains still a tolerably sure method of guarding against this wide-spread evil. It consists in rigidly examining the work, which is exacted from the pupil, in the pupil himself, and his parents or preceptor insisting absolutely that the teacher shall furnish really profitable work; or, if that cannot be secured with certainty, in seeking immediately another teacher more trustworthy to his art.

[To be continued.]

BIRD CONCERTS.—At Verviers, in Belgium, another species of sport and amusement has become altogether fashionable. The Belgians are not fond of hunting; they are partial to birds, not for masticatory purposes, but in order to hear them sing. On Sunday last a grand concert of linnets took place at Verviers, at the residence of Mr. Henry Talurasse. The linnet belonging to Mr. Jean Huizé, a butcher, having performed fifty-five quoting-sages in two hours, carried off the first prize, consisting of a gold medal and a ham. The word quoting-sage signifies song, musical flourish. The second prize was awarded to a linnet belonging to Mr. Henry Hanlet, having executed fifty-three flourishes, and the third to a linnet belonging to Mr. Henry Talurasse. Numerous amateurs from Spa, Lieges, and the surrounding country attended this interesting concert. The sport is a singular one, but de gustibus non est disputandum.—N. O. Della.

Brass! Brass! again.

[A friend (whose style sounds wondrously familiar) writes Willis's Musical World the following letter about the Commencement music at Cambridge.]

Last week we had commencement—commencement at old Harvard—and as usual, a Boston band assisted at the exercises. But—Ichabod!—the glory has departed. Brass, brass, brass,—nothing but brass. Brass led the procession from the library to the church—brass stood in the entry, and blew and blew—as we advanced to our pews. Brass clashed, and drums cracked the drums of our ears as we entered the doors. Brass led us to the dinner in Harvard Hall—brass gave us sentimental melodies in the President's yard in the evening—all is brass now-a-days—nothing but brass.

Brass plays upon the Common in Boston, evenings.—Brass leads off our military and civic and political processions—brass is everywhere, and nothing but brass. God grant, that the disease among the bands do not become chronic. I remember, I remember—when the old Brigade band was our principal delight in musical matters—dulcet flutes, tender hautbois, manly clarinets, solemn bassoons, melting horns, soul-stirring bugles, all joined in the harmony, and filled my soul with delight. But now—oh, no, I cannot mention it—without inwardly execrating Sax! In the history of Tom Thumb, we read that he was the son of a trumpeter, in Queen Anne's service, who might have lived to this day had he not blown his breath away! When I hear this continual braying of brass, I silently pray that the fate of the elder Thumb soon overtake these followers of Sax.

Dwight begs, entreats, prays for a return of the olden time—all in vain: the multitude is satisfied—what though the few are discontented? Really, though, the matter is becoming serious. At this rate, in a few years wood instruments will become unknown, and we shall have to go to Europe to learn how one sounds. Like the singing of men's voices, a brass band occasionally is very beautiful and satisfying; but as in the one case the ear becomes weary, and longs for the soprano voice; so, in the other, we want the soft voices of the wood.

There is one kind of brass music which I never hear here—wonderful for its effect upon the feelings. You can recall, doubtless, from your experience abroad, the thrill which has gone through you as in some narrow street of an ancient European city, suddenly you met a funeral procession, and the long-drawn notes of an old Lutheran choral arose from the deep-voiced horns, trombones and trumpets. The feeble Sax-horn found no place there, but the bold, manly tones of those old-fashioned, masculine brass instruments, playing the harmonies of Bach, Mozart, Strauss, were pervaded with a solemnity and grandeur for which we sigh here in vain. Here is a legitimate use for brass. But why try to make it the only music?

The music on Boston Common, these moonlight evenings, calls out a vast number of people—many of whom go to hear. Now and then comes up some favorite waltz or song,—then it is fun to hear the applause; but the whining sentimental ditties from operas do not always take. I am glad of it. It is a good sign. The music which takes best is that which is good in its way—that which is genuine. A march, waltz, quickstep, or negro melody, which is the true thing—which has the real spirit of the march, waltz, or quickstep—is sure to be liked. There is taste enough—I only ask that this taste should be cultivated; and this might easily be done by having a full band instead of half a one; and in giving us band music more, and poor vocal music, imitated on brass instruments, less.

One of the Boston German singing societies came out on Commencement evening, and sang in the College yard. It was good, and reminded one of old Germany. Good as it was, much as I liked it, still I am not anxious to have this style of music much cultivated in this country; now that I love Cæsar less, but Rome more. I do not call men's choruses bad, but mixed choruses better—as long as young men and women can mingle so freely as our New England habits now allow, we need not give up the beauty of the true soprano.

Descriptive Music.

A great rage has arisen, in modern days, for giving instrumental music what is called a "descriptive" character; and this rage is now about reaching its maximum intensity. It has been thought not enough that music should excite emotions in the mind; but it has been desired to make it also suggest ideas of facts, which is quite a different office. Emotions must necessarily be produced by the concord of sweet sounds; and happily it is the province of all good music, whether pure or mixed, vocal or instrumental, to excite in us feelings and sensations of the highest and noblest order. But the advocates of descriptive music are not content with this; they wish to make it perform a work altogether different—namely, to excite in the hearers ideas of things properly cognizable only by other senses than that of hearing. For by descriptive music we do not mean that which is imitative only, such as the expression of the warbling of birds by a shake on the flute, or the roll of thunder by a tremolo on the drums; this parrot-mocking of sounds is of the lowest grade, and scarcely worthy of serious mention; but the true descriptive music is of a much better class, and, from the patronage it has received from the best writers, is worthy of much higher esteem.

A few examples will show this, and will at the same time illustrate our meaning clearly. In Handel's Israel in Egypt, the chorus, "He sent a thick darkness," is a sublime attempt to give, by the character of the music, an idea of intense gloom—"even darkness which might be felt." There is no proper connection between sound and optics; but few fail to appreciate the merit either of this or of other great descriptive music in the same oratorio. Haydn's representation of Chaos is an effort to raise in the mind ideas analogous to a state of formless, incoherent disorder; and, though to do this well lay beyond the composer's power, there are good points in the composition; as, for instance, the snatches of melody, intended no doubt to symbol the existence, in the midst of the chaos, of the materials from which a fair and happy world should hereafter be formed. There are many other examples of true descriptive music in this Oratorio, mixed however with much of a lower grade. We may content ourselves with a mere allusion to the exquisite dramatic music of Weber, symbolic equally of earthly scenes and unearthly fancies, and refer to—what is by far the grandest of all descriptive compositions—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. And this is more to our purpose, as it is purely instrumental; it depends only on inarticulate sounds, having no libretto, save the few introductory words attached by the composer to make his intentions more clear. There is much misunderstanding about the nature of the descriptiveness in this Symphony, even among some musically educated persons, who, judging by one or two exceptional parts, imagine the representation to consist of mere imitations of sounds, the kind of music we have already condemned. But this is a great mistake; the only portions amenable to this charge are the drums in the storm, and the bird passage at the end of the slow movement. Now, if the former were the only, or even the principal, feature, to indicate the confusion of the elements, it would be certainly puerile; but it is in reality quite subordinate; and as of course the drums must be included, they are skilfully given just that to do for which they are most suitable. As to the nightingale, wagtail, and cuckoo passage, we cannot defend it; we always wish it was not there, as compromising the dignity of the composition; and it is so obviously an episode, that we indulge a fancy it may have been a subsequent interpolation, added perhaps at the instance of some of the composer's romantic lady friends, who thought the presence of good unmistakable birds essential to complete the idea of the wood beside the murmuring stream. We firmly believe that if Beethoven had sincerely approved this style of description, he would have introduced the warblers into the body of the composition, as Spohr has done in Die Weihe der Töne. But putting these trifles aside, what a magical composition is this Pastoral Symphony! How true the depiction of the "heitere Empfindungen" (the word heitere has no correct equivalent in English), awakened by the arrival in the country! How gorgeous the natural coloring of the scene by the rivulet! How joyous the abandon of the dance of the peasants;—and then the storm! What a stupendous exercise of musical genius! This movement alone is a study for a lifetime; it is the climax of the power of legitimate musical description; for it might easily be shown that, strong as is the temptation offered by a storm for unworthy devices, there is scarcely a note of Beethoven's that is not pure music of the noblest kind! Only compare with it an analogous work of another composer of no mean order, the triton among the minnows of Italian Opera, Rossini, and see how poor the Guillaume Tell storm appears by its side!

(Conclusion next week.)

CRAWFORD, THE SCULPTOR.—A private letter from Munich gives a charming account of a little impromptu fête in honor of our countryman, Crawford, who arrived last week in the Fulton. Müller, the master of the celebrated Foundry, invited the sculptor and a few friends to see the newly-cast statue of Washington by lamplight. Accordingly thirty or forty artists and gentlemen entered the building after dark, and beheld the grand bronze figure exposed to view, against a dark-green curtain, and by the somewhat misty illumination of a few scattered lamps; the effect was quite solemn. The grand proportions of the statue half revealed, the dusky space around and the sombre back-ground gave it a spectral sublimity, like Don Giovanni in the opera. The guests formed a silent and attentive circle, with the artist in the centre; they sang, with impressive accord, an appropriate canzone, and, as the chorus died away, Müller stepped forth with an enormous glass of beer in his hand; he addressed the company and complimented the artist; each person then drank from the huge goblet to Crawford's health and prosperity. Suddenly a Bengal light flashed a noon-day radiance on the statue, where majestic grace and impressed dignity were thus revealed, as it were, by enchantment; cheer after cheer broke from the electrified assembly. They escorted Crawford to Müller's house, each bearing a lighted taper;—there a supper awaited them. Mrs. Crawford's health was drunk with enthusiasm, and speeches, songs and congratulations gaily closed this truly German fête.—Corr. Boston Transcript.

German Opinions on Crawford's Washington.

The Evening Post translates from the Allgemeine Zeitung two opinions on Crawford's equestrian statue of Washington. The first is as follows.

Several journals have already criticised Crawford's statue of Washington, expressing themselves both favorably and unfavorably towards it. The magnitude of this work of art, which is destined to occupy a distinguished place among modern statuary, must be our excuse for venturing once more to give our opinion of its merits.

Crawford has already shown, at the last German Exhibition of Industry, in his strongly contrasted statues of Henry and Jefferson—the one fiery and enthusiastic, the other thoughtful and calm—that he is entitled to rank among the most eminent of living sculptors, and he could, therefore, fear no comparison with his brother artists. But to compare him with Thorwaldsen and Rauch, because he equals them in many respects, is unjust to all parties.

We see in Crawford a sculptor of spirit and patriotic sentiment, both qualities being conspicuous in all his works; but he possesses sound judgment also, and with his acknowledged talent for individualizing plastic forms, we had a right to expect that in his Washington monument, the principal figures as well as the side figures would be properly conceived. Equestrian statues present unusual difficulties to the artist, who must represent the animal in motion, and yet in perfect rest, in order to give a proper conception of the figure. Crawford chose a position, which makes the horse rest with all his weight upon his left hind and right forefoot. The artist wished to show by this beautiful position the spiritual movement of the horse, full of the ardor of combat, and yet under the perfect control of his rider; and it is the execution of this double design in this excellent work that we regard as the least successful part of it.

On the one hand are to be noticed the unplastic appearance of the elevated right hind foot and the too violent movement of the stretched left fore foot of the horse; on the other hand, the curve of the neck, which is natural beyond doubt, but yet not æsthetic, because it covers the rider, the principal figure, if seen in front. One word on the rather clumsy management of the unnaturally swollen veins on the throat of the horse will complete all we have to say of the principal faults of a work which is destined to occupy an honorable place among the trophies of modern plastic art.

Another critic of the same sheet writes from Munich:

"The unfavorable opinion which one of your correspondents has expressed of Crawford's masterpieces, has brought the whole population of Munich, in the midst of a pouring rain, to the royal foundry, and they have expressed their indignation, without reserve. Although the illustrious names of Thorwaldsen and Rauch, have been mentioned in connection with that of the American artist, whose whole desire is to render himself perfect in his art, it has failed to change the favorable opinion of Crawford's Washington. The overwhelming admiration which this colossal work excites in the beholder, renders a timid searching for small faults impossible. The easy position of the horse, so full of animation, is wonderfully true to nature. In the noble attitude of the rider, Crawford shows the hero who commands on the battle-field, the man of courage and of iron will; he despises the stale accessory of drapery, and nothing conceals the rider's manly form, clothed in the historical costume of his time. Crawford held strictly, in form and treatment, the middle ground between the stiffness of antique models and the extravagant naturalism of modern, and particularly of French artists.

"It is with regret that we leave this noble statue, whose perfect proportions never awaken in the mind that feeling of oppressiveness which a colossal figure naturally produces. (The statue is twenty-two feet high, and weighs 21,000 pounds.) If America does not receive a masterpiece of Thorwaldsen or Rauch, it receives a masterpiece of Crawford, of which King Maximilian said: 'I wish it could remain here to ornament Munich.'"

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUG. 2, 1856.

To our Subscribers and Advertisers.

We have to remind many of our patrons that our terms are, payment in advance; yet very many are still in arrears not only for the present year, (which commenced in April,) but for one and even two years past. Bills have been sent to all since April, and it is hoped that those who have not already done their duty in this matter, will soon do so by remitting the amounts due, by mail, or otherwise.

☞ Money letters by mail should always be registered; in that way only can money be remitted at our risk.

THE "LIFE OF BEETHOVEN," which we have commenced translating in the present number, is one which we have found prefixed to one of the volumes of the new stereotype edition of the Piano-forte Sonatas, published at Wolfenbüttel, Germany. For a biography of moderate length, and suitable for a weekly journal like ours, it is about the best that has appeared. It is to be sure a matter of fact sort of affair, and its author seems to be one of the careful, industrious, dry literary hacks of Germany. It is not a Life in the artistic sense of the word, a life made alive by the reproductive imagination, the sympathetic feeling and insight of the writer. It is not made interesting and living by sparks of poetry and fancy, or by subtle metaphysical appreciation of genius and character. When it aspires beyond plain narrative of fact, as in the introductory sentence, which we translate literally, it is with an awkward grace.

But in the matter of its facts, it is, we are assured by those who should know best, remarkably complete (for its length) and reliable. And this is what our readers will most prize. Here is not a fine poetic tribute, in the shape of a biography, to the great master whom we all revere, such as LISZT paid to CHOPIN, OULIBICHEFF to MOZART, or CARLYLE to SCHILLER. But here are brought together in convenient shape and size, for reference, the authentic facts, so far as known, of the artistic career of Beethoven. Even the particularity of dates about the persons incidentally mentioned, dry as it may make the story, adds to its value as a work of reference. And a work of reference is what we want. We may find more,—if not a well-digested life, yet certainly much that is extremely interesting about Beethoven,—in the Life by MOSCHELES;—a work however almost out of print. The truth is, a satisfactory biography of Beethoven, one really worthy of the subject, and accepted as a standard work, does not yet exist. We look forward, as all admirers of Beethoven in this country must do, to the long promised biography by an American, our own "Diast," who has been devoting the best years of his life with pains-taking earnestness to the collecting and mastering of all the materials to be found in Germany for the composition of the true life of Beethoven. His explorations were nearly completed, when he was obliged, in order to recruit his health and give rest to an over-taxed brain, to come home for the summer months. He will return to Europe in the autumn, and a few months passed in Vienna will complete his long researches. May he then have strength and inspiration to fuse the materials into the book we want, and give it to us speedily!

The present biographer (Dr. Döring) has certainly in one respect discharged his duty well and wisely. He has allowed Beethoven to speak for himself, by frequent citations from his letters. This in itself goes far to clothe the dry bones of fact with flesh and blood. And for the rest have we not the very soul of the composer in his music? Have we not the immortal symphonies? Have we not the thirty piano-forte Sonatas, and the Trios and the Quartets, and the "Egmont" music, and the "Fidelio," unspent vibrations from the very chords of his own life and inmost experience? Have we not the "Choral Symphony?" And shall we not have every year the privilege of listening to it and to all the symphonies, here in our Music Hall, with CRAWFORD's noble statue of the man rising before us in the midst of his interpreters?

Musical Party Warfare.

On another page we copy some curious articles about the recent performance of ROBERT SCHUMANN's "Paradise and the Peri," in London. Those from the Musical World, like the articles in the same journal last year about Richard Wagner, manifest a disposition to find nothing good in any music emanating from certain recent German composers, whom it is pleased to sweep together into one category, called sarcastically the "Music of the Future." Mr. CHORLEY, of the Athenæum, is equally bitter and systematically opposed to whatsoever hails from that quarter. So is the musical critic of the Times, and so are most of the musical oracles of England; while at the same time they claim MENDELSSOHN to themselves, set him up as the model and ne plus ultra of a musician, and abuse the Germans for not publishing every MS. work or sketch he left behind him, good, bad or indifferent.

Of the particular merits or demerits of "Paradise and the Peri," the three hours long Cantata, we cannot speak, since we are not familiar with the work. We only know that in Germany, where there are as good judges of music as there are in England, the work has been over and over brought out with acceptance, and spoken of with admiration in the best critical journals. As to the utter lack of melody complained of, the "three hours of organized sound without a single tune," those of our readers who were so fortunate as to be present at a certain private concert held in Chickering's rooms last winter, and to hear the "Chorus of Houris" from the work in question, will be slow to chime in with the complaint so far as that piece is concerned, and remembering that experience, will be apt to take the English report with some grains of allowance. Moreover we have heard more than one intelligent German say, that in musical ideas Schumann is rich to overflowing, that his chief short-coming has been in the art of using them to the best advantage; that, given half the ideas found in "Paradise and the Peri," Mendelssohn by his consummate treatment would have produced a wonder of the world.

But this we do know. We have come in contact with Robert Schumann's creative genius at enough points to know, that he is not to be set aside as nought by any dictum of an English or an old-school prejudice. We have heard and have enjoyed and been inspired by—and so have not a few of our readers—a symphony of his, a piano Quintet of his, a great variety of his compositions for the piano alone, which, if they were in some respects strange, have yet left a deep impression, and a desire, which grows by every hearing, to listen to them again. He has composed songs surely, which are among the most beautiful and full of melody and feeling that we know, and which "appeal," (to use the Musical World's expression,) to both ear and heart. Therefore the wholesale condemnation of the London critics makes us suspect there may be something of these qualities in "Paradise and the Peri." To take a somewhat analogous case in literature, such abuse is probably worth just about as much as some of the slashing criticisms upon Robert Browning.

But the most striking folly and injustice of this partisan warfare is the absurd way in which it confounds together composers who are most essentially unlike. New School and Old School become mere catch-words, mutual bugbears, and whatever is not wholly of the one is set down as wholly of the other, whose is not for us is against us, and so the thorough-going partisan sees only one indefinite level in all his adversaries and has but one name for the host of them. "Wagner, Schumann, Brahms, Franz & Co!" There is a combination for you! "Music of the Future!" It is mere calling names. It is like the blind and absurd way of calling people "Transcendentalists" in this country when they show any individuality of thought. For Schumann is no more like Wagner, than Mendelssohn is like Wagner. Their adventurousness, their Beethoven-like unwillingness to be mere copyists, is about all they have in common. Of the young Brahms we know but little; but we presume it is enough for the London critics' purpose, that Schumann happened to admire him and anticipate great things of him. As to Robert Franz, he surely is not in any way of kindred tendency with Wagner. His songs are entirely sui generis, as much remarkable for their even classical perfection of form and harmony, as for their peculiar genius. And when he has written for many voices, as hymns, a Kyrie, &c., there is no master with whom he seems so kindred as with the most classic of the classics, old Sebastian Bach!

THE GREAT ORGAN AT FREYBURG.—As everything relating to the world's great organs derives a peculiar interest here, just now, from the discussion of the Music Hall Organ question, we take pleasure in presenting the following extract from a private letter, dated Freyburg, July 5, 1856.

"But the famous organ, built by Mooser, was the great attraction, and is considered one of the finest, if not the finest in Europe. Certain it is, I felt that I had never heard anything that could be called an organ before, fine as some of ours are. We made a large party of strangers from our hotel, and paying a fee of one franc each, at the appointed hour, eight o'clock, P. M., we entered the church, taking seats as far from the organ as possible. The music selected is always that which will best exhibit the wonderful powers of the instrument; but it was so perfectly played that it had not the effect of anything like dap-trap.

"First we had the national song of Austria, a charming air, followed by variations upon it, of the organist's own composition; infinite in changes. The last piece was also of his composition, representing a storm, as it commences in the distance and draws gradually near a convent among the mountains. Sighings and gusts of wind are heard, and low, smothered roarings—flashes of lightning—rumbling thunder, driving rain and fierce howlings, as of a terrible hurricane. Through all this, occasionally was heard the prayer of a single monk or nun, in the sweetest, most plaintive of melodies, represented by so close an imitation of the human voice, that we could hardly believe there was not a company of singers up in the dimly lighted organ-loft. And then all the voices would seem to join in grand chorus to finish the evening vespers. All the while, above the roar of the fierce tempest, and the songs of the monks, tolled a bell, signaling to the weather-beaten traveller that a refuge was near.

"I had heard great playing, I had thought, at home, and splendid organs; but this surpassed all my ideas of what an organ might be. You know, in America, when anything is undertaken to show what a player can do with his hands and feet, our organs do not seem to join in the display: they make a great noise, but the sounds jump, particularly in the playing of accompaniments. There was nothing of the sort here. We were entranced, as we sat listening in the old cathedral, till the twilight had died away entirely, and there was nothing to be seen save the glimmering light far up in the organ-loft, which cast but faint shadows through the gloomy aisles. But the music of that glorious organ—shall I ever hear anything like it again on earth?"

Beethoven's Sonatas.—A Card.

The subscribers to the new German stereotype edition of Beethoven's Piano-forte Sonatas, are respectfully informed that a case of them has arrived, and that they are ready for delivery at the office of this Journal, 21 School St. The undersigned regrets exceedingly the long delay which has attended their passage to this country, arising from their having been forwarded by a sailing vessel. A. W. THAYER.

Musical Review.

SHEET MUSIC.

(Published by Oliver Ditson.)

Un Soir sur le Alpes: Nocturne, pour le piano. By CHARLES MEINERTH. pp. 5.

Quite a sweet and graceful little Nocturne, which indicates a refined musical feeling, as well as careful, conscientious writing, it being a regular piece of four-part harmony. It is not difficult, but must be played with expression, and due attention to the four parts.

(Published by Geo. P. Read & Co.)

Good Night, my Heart (Gute Nacht, mein Herz). No. 2, of Six Songs by ROBERT FRANZ, with English and German words. pp. 3. Price 25 cents.

This is one of those sweet, sad little songs, so full of feeling, in which Franz, with the highest refinement of art, seems still to have caught the natural melody of the people. It is taken from his 12th opus, and not from the first, as indicated at the head of this reprint. The tune repeats itself thrice, with some variation at the close, to verses by the German poet Geibel. Franz is very faithful always to his poet. The English translator therefore has a nice task to perform. In the main it is well done in this instance, only with a sacrifice of the double endings, and of some little felicities in the fitting of verbal to musical accents, by which Franz develops the melody as it were out of the words. Both sense and accent protest against this:

Thy pains, thy pains, thy joys are dead,
The songs of Spring are o'er,
For the love's rose, so purple red,
Shall bloom, shall bloom no more.

Instead of "For the love's rose," read "The rose of love." And then that repetition of "thy pains" is bad. We mention these little things, because in the Franz songs poetry and music are alike important. But the German words are also here, and every singer who shall learn the little song will be richly rewarded. It is one of the easier ones.

Tone Blossoms: Six Characteristic Pieces, for the Piano, by F. SPINDLER. No. 5, "Lily," pp. 3. Price 20 cts.

A cheerful little six-eight melody, running and leaping in sparkling semi-quavers, with common-chord guitar-like accompaniment for the most part. Pretty enough, good for practice to cultivate a light and graceful finger, but not especially "characteristic" of "lilies," or aught else, that we perceive.

Beauties of Mozart and Beethoven, in the form of Petites Fantaisies for Young Pianists. By TH. OESTEN. No. 2, "Dearest Maiden," by MOZART. pp. 5.

The piece before us is a simple sort of child's melody, unmistakably Mozart, with introduction and several pretty variations and finale. Of medium difficulty, and good for practice. The subjects of the rest of the series are to be drawn from a curious variety of sources, from the operas, violin quintets, septuor, &c. of Beethoven and Mozart.

1. There are Angels ever near us. Song, by JAMES G. BARNETT.
2. The truest friend is God. Sacred Song for Contralto, Baritone or Bass voice. By the same. 25 cts. each.

Two simple English songs, in a chaste and serious vein, without affectation, and with considerable beauty. They are likely to be popular.

Case of Jewels: A Collection of Opera, People's and Dance Melodies, for Piano. By TH. OESTEN. No. 9. Price 30 cts.

This number contains a song by Kücken, airs from I Lombardi, Fra Diavolo, &c. Easy little pieces.

La Traviata Valse, on VERDI's celebrated opera. By G. MONTAGUE. Price 60 cts.

A set of waltzes, easy and good to waltz by, with introduction and coda.

Musical Chat-Chat.

One of our Boston oratorio societies is in treaty with Madame CLARA NOVELLO for the coming season. She is always spoken of as the greatest living oratorio singer in England. The accession of such a talent would ensure a brilliant season; and we trust the negotiations will not fail. She would probably give also concerts on her own account, and there have been intimations (we know not upon what authority) of some intended combination of forces on the part of the oratorio societies of Boston, New York and other cities, with Mme. Novello for prima donna, to hold one or more musical festivals like those of Birmingham, Norwich, &c. in England. Her first appearance will probably be in this city in October or November.

A. W. LADD, Esq., of Boston, Ms., was officially notified by the last mail from Europe that he had been admitted as a Brother Member of the Grand Imperial Society of Piano-Forte Makers of Paris, as a distinctive mark of honor.

In the list of scritture, or engagements, for the next Carnival season at the Pergola theatre in Florence, we notice the name of our townswoman, ELISA BISCACCIANTI. The Florentine Journal of Arts and Sciences, L'Indicatore, alludes to her eminently successful debut there at a concert of the Philharmonic Society on the 22d of June, and expresses the hope that the management "will be able to give the Biscaccianti companions worthy to stand by her side." The same journal says her singing of Ah non giunge produced such an outburst of enthusiasm as was excited twenty years before in the same piece by Madame PASTA. Another journal, L'Arte, calls her "questa incomparabile artista," and is at a loss which to admire most, "the pure and silvery timbre of her voice, her most beautiful accent, her unimpeachable method, or the grace, the soul, the sentiment with which she executes the most difficult passages."

Sig. LABLACHE's health prevents his visiting London this season.... Messrs. Fox and Henderson, (says the Athenæum), "have contracted to deliver a new Covent Garden Theatre, on the site of the old one, in six months."... Among the doings of innumerable musical societies in London, we read of the Sacred Concerts of the Ecclesiological Motett Society now in progress.... M. HECTOR BERLIOZ has been elected by the Académie des Beaux Arts, as successor to Adolphe Adam. His competitors were Panzeron, Felicien David, Niedermeyer, Gounod, and others.... PALESTRINA's "Mass of Pope Marcellus" was announced to be sung on St. Peter's day, at the Church of St. Sulpice, by 250 voices.... The Bradford Triennial Festival (in England) is announced for the 26th to 29th of August. The principal singers will be Clara Novello, Viardot Garcia, Mlle. Piccolomini, Mme. Alboni, Mme. Weiss, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Montem Smith, Weiss, Reichardt, Belletti, Beneventano, Formes, &c. Conductor, Mr. Costa. The oratorio of the first day will be Mendelssohn's "Elijah"; of the second day, Costa's "Eli"; of the third day, Handel's "Messiah"; the fourth day, miscellaneous. In the evening miscellaneous concerts, two MS. Cantatas, "Robin Hood," by J. L. HATTON, and "May-Day" by G. A. MACFARREN, (composed expressly for the festival,) will be performed; besides the usual melange of symphonies, overtures, madrigals, operatic selections, &c.

Advertisements.

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

CALCOTT'S MUSICAL GRAMMAR.

JUST PUBLISHED. A Musical Grammar, in four parts. I. Notation. II. Melody. III. Harmony. IV. Rhythm. By Dr. CALCOTT.

The design of this work is to compress into a small volume the leading principles of practical music. From the analogy which exists between music and language, the author has adopted the classification first suggested by German theorists. He has endeavored by examples selected from the best authors to render the instructions more satisfactory than if they were merely verbal. By due attention to this volume, it is believed the student may obtain all that is necessary to discriminate between false and correct harmony, and to compose conformably to established rules. Price 75 cents.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
ORGANIST OF ST. PAUL'S CHURCH,
ALBANY, N. Y.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S COLLECTIONS OF GLEES, MADRIGALS, PART-SONGS, &c.

Novello's Glee-Hive.

A Collection of Popular GLEES and MADRIGALS, in Vocal Score, with ad. lib. Accompaniment for Piano-forte. Complete in 8 vols. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt lettering. Price $2 each volume.

These volumes contain eighty-three of the best Glee and Madrigals by standard ancient and modern English composers. Among them will be found some of the finest Glee of Attwood, Calcott, the Earl of Mornington, Spofforth, Stevens, Webbe, &c. Each Glee and Madrigal is printed separately, at prices varying from 4 to 12 cents each.

Novello's Part-Song Book.

In One Volume, handsomely bound in cloth, with illuminated lettering.

This work consists of new Glee and Part-Songs, by the best modern composers—among others, Bishop, Benedict, Macfarren, Rimbauld, Wesley, &c.—with reprints of some of the best Madrigals by ancient composers, and Part-Songs by eminent German composers, set to English poetry. Each Glee and Part-Song printed separately, at from 4 cents to 13 cents each. Vocal parts to the whole work, 25 cents each part; Vocal parts to separate Glee, &c., 8 cents per set.

Orpheus :

A Collection of Glee and Vocal Quartettes, by the most admired German Composers, with English Poetry.

This collection is principally for male voices. Twenty nine books, each containing about six Glee, in separate Vocal parts, with separate Piano-forte accompaniment, have been published, and the issue is continued—the new books being received by J. A. Novello immediately on their publication in London.—Price 88 cents each book.

The Musical Times,

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR,

PUBLISHED (IN LONDON) ON THE FIRST OF EVERY MONTH.

Containing ANTHEMS, CHORALS, and HYMNS, or GLEES, MADRIGALS, and ELEGIES, for One, Two, Three, Four, or more Voices. Price 8 cents each.

A Monthly Journal, containing original articles by Edward Holmes, Author of the "Life of Mozart," &c.; Short notices of Singing-Classes, Concerts, &c.; Advertisements of new and important Musical Works; and, in addition, three or four pages of Music. The alternate numbers contain Music with secular or sacred words. Price 3 cents each, or post-free, 4 cents. Nos. 1 to 48, (Vols. I. and II.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 49 to 96, (Vols. III. and IV.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75; Nos. 97 to 156, (Vols. V. and VI.) bound in cloth, with Index, $1.75. Either Vol. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, may be had separately, in paper covers, 75 cents each. Annual subscription to the Musical Times, 50 cents, post-paid.

J. A. NOVELLO,

No. 350 Broadway, New York,

And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

Garcia's Complete School of Singing.

JUST PUBLISHED:—A Complete School of Singing, in which the Art is clearly developed in a series of Instructions and appropriate Examples, to which are added Exercises, written and composed by Manuel Garcia.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART, BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives Instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

Apr 29
MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THIS beautiful Art novel, by Mme. GEORGE SAND, just completed in the Journal of Music, for which it was expressly translated, has been reprinted in a neat pamphlet, and may be had at this office, and at the periodical and book-tories. Price 15 cents. Copies sent by mail post-paid, for 18 cents.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

HEWES'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co. 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S

Depot of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line 10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line 5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion $12.00
Do do each subsequent $6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 227.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 9, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 19.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway, "
" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Translated from the German for this Journal.]

The Life and Characteristics of Beethoven.

BY DR. HEINRICH DÖRING.

(Continued from page 139.)

In the year 1792, Beethoven's outward circumstances, which never had been easy, shaped themselves more favorably than before. The Elector Max Franz, with whom he always stood in favor, invited him at his expense to take a journey to Vienna. There he was to improve himself still further in music, especially in composition, under the tuition of the celebrated HAYDN. He became more intimately acquainted with SEBASTIAN BACH's works, which he had already studied at an earlier period, his attention being now again directed to that great master by his teacher. At the same time he diligently studied, with a view to the church style, the compositions of HANDEL. Haydn had formed himself upon them both, and therefore thought he could not commend better models to his pupil, whose progress he remarked with satisfaction. Haydn also made him acquainted with the works of MOZART, whom he found on his arrival in Vienna no more among the living, he having died the year before. Such models gave Beethoven's taste that distinguished direction, to which he remained faithful all his life, thereby winning universal admiration. The instruction he had been receiving was interrupted in 1795, when Haydn made another journey to London. He turned his pupil over to the celebrated contrapuntist, ALBRECHTSBERGER, under whose direction Beethoven studied on industriously.

To the first part of his stay in Vienna belongs a letter, which shows his character from a very amiable side, through the good-heartedness with which he openly confessed and asked pardon for a hasty act of which he had been guilty. This letter, dated Vienna, Nov. 2, 1793, was addressed to the friend of his youth, Eleonore von Breuning, afterwards the wife of Dr. Wegeler. "A year has elapsed since my stay in this capital, and this is the first letter you receive from me; yet rest assured you have ever lived in my recollection. I have often conversed with you and yours, although not with that piece of mind which I could have desired; for the late wretched altercation was hovering before me, showing me my own despicable conduct. But so it was; and what would I not give, could I obliterate from the page of my life this past action, so degrading to my character, and so unlike my usual proceedings! It is true, there were many circumstances widening the breach between us, and I presume that in those whisperings, conveying to us our mutual expressions, lay the chief source of the growing evil. We both imagined that we spoke from conviction, and yet it was but in anger, and we were both of us deceived. Your good and noble mind has, I know, long forgiven me; but they say that self-accusation is the surest sign of contrition, and it is thus I wanted to stand before you. Now let us draw a veil over the whole affair, taking a warning by it, that should a difference arise between friends, they should not have recourse to a mediator, but explain face to face."

This letter was accompanied by some Variations, composed by Beethoven, upon the aria: Se vuol ballare, from Mozart's Figaro. Beethoven had dedicated them to his friend. "I could only wish," wrote he, "that the work were greater and more worthy of you. They importuned me here to publish this little work, and I improved this opportunity to give you a proof of my respect and friendship for yourself, and of an ever enduring recollection of your house. Accept the trifle, and think, when you look at it, that it comes from a friend who respects you very highly. If it only gives you pleasure, my wishes are entirely satisfied. Let it be a little revival of the time, when I spent so many and such happy hours in your house. Perhaps this work will keep me in your memory, until I come again, which, to be sure, will not be so soon. How we will enjoy ourselves then! You will then find a happier man in your friend, from whose brow time and his better fate have smoothed out the furrows of his past refractory conduct. At the close of my letter I venture one more request. I should like again to be so happy as to possess a waistcoat embroidered with Angora by your own hand. Pardon your friend this presumptuous request. It arose from a great partiality for every thing that is from your hands, and confidentially I can tell you, vanity lies at the bottom of it, the vanity of being able to say that I possess something from one of the best, most estimable maidens in Bonn. I still have the first waistcoat, which you were so kind as to present to me in Bonn; but through the fashion it has become so unfashionable, that I can only keep it in my clothes-screen as something very dear from you. You would give me great pleasure if you would soon rejoice me with a letter. Should my letters cause you any satisfaction, I promise so far as possible to gratify you."

In relation to the Variations, which accompanied this letter, Beethoven said: "They will be somewhat difficult to play, especially the trills in the Coda. But that need not terrify you. It is so arranged, that you need do nothing but make the trills; the other notes you may leave out, since they occur also in the violin part. I never would have set anything so; but I had frequently remarked, that there was here and there some one in Vienna, who, when I had been improvising in the evening, would write down many of my peculiarities the next day, and make a show upon them. Foreseeing that such things would soon appear, I determined to anticipate them. Another reason was, to puzzle the resident pianists here. Many among them are my deadly enemies, and I wanted in this way to revenge myself upon them, since I foresaw, that here and there the Variations would be set before them, where the gentlemen would make a poor figure in attempting to perform them."

A letter of Beethoven's, written a few weeks later, described the impression made upon him by a gift from the fair friend of his youth. "I was exceedingly surprised," he says, "by the beautiful neck-tie, wrought by your hand. Pleasant as the thing was in itself, it awoke in me feelings of sadness. Its effect was the recollection of former times, and shame on my part through your magnanimous conduct towards me. Really, I did not believe that you still held me worthy of your thought. O, could you have witnessed my emotions yesterday, you surely could find no exaggeration in what I tell you now, that at the thought of you I wept and was very sad. I beg you will believe me, little as I may deserve faith in your eyes, that I have suffered very much, and do still suffer through the loss of your friendship. You and your dear mother I shall never forget. You were so kind to me, that your loss cannot and will not be so soon replaced to me. I know what I have lost, and what you were to me; but—were I to fill up this interval, I should have to go back to scenes which would be unpleasant for you to see, and for me to describe. As a slight return for your kind memento to me, I make free to send you a violin Rondo. I have a great deal to do, or I would have written off for you the long promised Sonata. In my manuscript it is hardly more than a mere sketch. You can have the Rondo copied off, and then send me back the score. What I here send you is the only one among my things which would be useful to you, and I thought that possibly this trifle might afford you some pleasure. If it is in my power to contribute aught else to your gratification, I beg that you will not pass me by. It is the only means now left of testifying to you my gratitude for the friendship I have enjoyed."

In the above letter Beethoven had spoken of having a great deal to do. His tasks were lightened by a young man, with whose father he had stood in friendly relations in Bonn. It was FERDINAND RIES, then a youth of sixteen, who died at Frankfort on the Main in 1838, a son of the first violinist in the electoral chapel at Bonn, Franz Ries, who closed his earthly career at an advanced age in 1845. By thorough instruction Ferdinand Ries had become a clever pianist and made remarkable progress in music. With a letter of introduction from his father he went to Beethoven, whom he found busied about the completion of his oratorio: "Christ on the Mount of Olives," which was to be produced for his benefit at a concert in the theatre. Beethoven read the letter through, and said: "I cannot answer your father now. But write to him, I have not forgotten how my mother died. With that he will be satisfied." It was only some time later that Ries learned, that his father had in every way actively supported the Beethoven family, then in needy circumstances.

In the very first days Beethoven found that he could use the son of his old friend. On the day of the performance of the above-named oratorio, Beethoven sent for him at five o'clock in the morning. Ries found him still in bed, writing upon single leaves. When he asked what it was, Beethoven replied laconically: "Trombones!" So the trombones were played from those sheets. Possibly they had forgotten to copy those parts.—But it was more probably an after-thought, since Beethoven might have had the original sheets, as well as the copied ones. The rehearsal began at eight in the morning. Besides the oratorio there were also performed for the first time a Symphony of Beethoven's in D major (No. 2) and a Piano-forte Concerto. It was an extremely difficult rehearsal. By half-past two o'clock all the musicians were exhausted and more or less dissatisfied. The prince Lichnowsky, who was present from the beginning, ordered bread and butter, cold meat and wine brought in great baskets. By that means he re-inspired the players to rehearse the oratorio through once more. It is Beethoven's first work in this kind, said the Prince; it must be produced in a manner worthy of him. The concert began about six o'clock, but was so long that a couple of pieces were omitted.

Beethoven had given the score of the above-named Symphony in D major, in his own handwriting, to his young friend Ries. The latter remarked upon it some years afterwards: "The score showed something very striking in the Larghetto quasi andante. Indeed the Larghetto was so beautiful, conceived in so pure and friendly a spirit, and the carriage of the voices so natural, that one could scarcely imagine anything had been changed in it. The plan too was from the beginning the same as in the later editions. But in the second violin, almost in the very first lines, in many passages a very considerable part of the accompaniment, and in some places also in the viola, had been changed; and yet all had been so carefully erased, that I could not with the utmost pains find out the original idea. I asked Beethoven about it, and he answered dryly: "It is better so."

Several circumstances conspired to plunge the universally celebrated composer into a sad mood, which often bordered on despondency. It was not merely the cabals of his rivals, who envied him his fame. An essential reason of his melancholy lay in his state of health. An obstinate bowel complaint, of which the first traces had already shown themselves in the year 1796, induced a train of other disorders for him, among which his increasing hardness of hearing became an unspeakable torment, embittering all the joys of life. An extended description of his physical sufferings is contained in a letter to Dr. Wegeler, in Bonn, afterwards the husband of his former pupil, Eleonore von Breuning. After an eight year's residence in Vienna, on the 29th of June, 1800, Beethoven wrote this letter, which may serve as a pure transcript of his mode of thinking and of feeling. He opened it with self-reproaches on account of his long silence.

"How much I thank you," says he to his friend, "for thinking about me! So little have I deserved or tried to deserve from you, and yet you are so kind, you let yourself be turned away by nothing, not even by my unpardonable neglect, but remain always the faithful, sterling friend. That I could ever forget you, you who were once so dear to me, o, do not believe that! There are moments when I yearn towards you, nay when I long to pass some time with you. My fatherland, the beautiful country in which I first saw the light of the world, is still ever beautiful and clear before my eyes, as when I left you; in short, I shall regard that time as one of the happiest events of my life, when I can see you again and greet our father Rhine. When that will be, I cannot yet determine. So much I will tell you, that you will see me right great. Not greater as an artist, but better and more perfect as a man, shall you find me; and then should my fortune become somewhat better in my native land, my art shall exhibit itself only for the benefit of the poor. O happy moment! How happy I esteem myself, that I can bring thee near, that I can myself create thee!"

From the above it appears, that the very straitened circumstances, in which Beethoven lived at Bonn, had shaped themselves more favorably. "You wish to know," he writes to his friend Wegeler, "something of my situation; it is not so bad. Within the last year the prince Lichnowsky, who, if there have been little misunderstandings between us, always was and has remained my warmest friend, has set apart for me a sure sum of 600 florins, which I can draw so long as I find no suitable position. My compositions bring me in a good deal, and I can say I have more orders than I can satisfy. For every thing I have six or seven publishers, and even more, if I make a point of it. They no longer stipulate with me; I demand and they pay. You see that is a nice thing. I see for example a friend in need, and my purse does not allow me to help him immediately; I have only to set myself to work, and in a short time he is relieved, and then I am more economical than formerly."

[To be continued.]

Objects of Musical Education, and their Time.

By DR. A. B. MARX.

[Concluded from p 141.]

We have already said that the pianoforte possesses an extremely voluminous literature, partly written expressly for it, and partly adaptations from other works foreign to it. What can be more natural or more enlightening than to make these works the chief means of instruction, their complete possession being one of the objects of pursuit? For this end, technical readiness, finger exercises, and studies are required. But these are manifestly only means to an end; and as certainly as their use ought not to be delayed, so certainly also they ought to be set aside when the required dexterity has been gained, and the principal difficulties overcome; or else, from a want of methodical arrangement, exercises may be prolonged without end. We cannot conceal from ourselves that in these latter times this error has been stretched to excess, and has overwhelmed us with countless studies, &c. Every respectable teacher, every distinguished amateur, considers himself bound to present the world with some dozens of studies, from which a few particular artistic forms of fingering are to be acquired. And since the composition of a well-sounding study exacts nothing but the occurrence of an idea to be worked in the ordinary routine of composition; since, moreover, a little burst of enthusiasm is highly thought of in these matters; and, further, since the brilliant playing of the author, or the reputation of his master, renders him tolerably sure of his public, we can never tell when this composition and spread of studies will come to an end: neither, indeed, can we imagine how the pupil shall find time to labor through the most respectable of them only; to say nothing of the real works of art themselves, for whose sake alone the whole drudgery has been endured.

Let the non-musical inquirer consider the foregoing as a token of good and bad instruction in the question before us.

Sebastian Bach and Handel, Joseph Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—these are the artists to whom we owe the greatest and the most numerous works of art for the pianoforte. Among these, Bach and Beethoven stand forward, the one in elder, the other in our own times, as those who have reached the highest eminence. After them, Emanuel Bach, Clementi, Dussek, Karl Maria von Weber, Hummel, and many more may be named. We abstain from giving a more numerous list, particularly of those still living, as it is not the province of this work to pass judgment upon individuals. Upon the highest, the vast preponderance in estimation of the five first-named artists, there is not the slightest question among those who have the least tincture of art. The one may indeed be compared with the other, but the high preeminence of all is unquestioned.

We can therefore declare as a condition for good pianoforte teaching, that the works of those five eminent men* shall be considered as the

*We have to give an urgent warning with respect to Seb. Bach's work, the "Wohltemperirte Klavier," that the younger scholars be not set too early to the study of it; and that neither they nor others should be persuaded that everything that that great man has composed—often composed for momentary objects of instruction, &c.—was of equal value. Bach's manner is so different from the modern style, that we cannot without reflection employ his works. This, and the usual beginning with pianos of the most accustomed temperament, have driven more friends of art from this master than the pleasure of his music has created admirers; and, therefore, with the greatest veneration in his regard, we will not refuse to acknowledge that another portion of his works, namely his dances, have outlived their time and become antiquated. But the enlightened teacher will find in the "Six Preludes pour les commencans," in the inventions and single fantasias, namely in the English and other suites among the preludes, sarabands, jigs, &c., a rich choice of the most charming and imperishable compositions, most intimately adapted to our tastes and feelings, and highly calculated to produce both pleasure and improvement in his scholars. We would distinguished and governing lessons in the instruction. Whatever finger exercises, hand lessons or secondary work, a teacher may find necessary for his pupil, must be left to his decision, as it cannot be estimated. But the teacher who does not conduct his pupil into the study of the five great masters, as soon as it can be done with any precision, and the time of the lesson permits it, and does not make them the chief object and goal of the instruction, such a teacher, we say it without hesitation, is not able to give a true artistic education, however clever and careful he may be in other parts of his duty. Teachers who keep their pupils to fashionable dances and such trifles, to arrangements from favorite operas, &c., are altogether unworthy of the confidence of those who seek for genuine education in art. Therefore, no teacher ought to be chosen without the previous knowledge of his method of instruction.

Pianoforte learning may begin very early—in the seventh or eighth year, or even earlier, even before the hand can span the octave. There is, moreover, a sufficiency of excellent works of Haydn and Mozart, well adapted to the sensibilities of that tender age, if the teacher be but capable of choosing them.

III. COMPOSITION.

We name the study of composition as the third object of general musical education. Deep penetration into art and its productions, a rich development of musical talent, cannot be attained without this study. If it be undertaken in the right sense, it rewards every step forwards with clearer insight and increased pleasure; and, indeed, those also who are not destined by peculiar talents to the profession of composers.

This circumstance demands the more deliberate consideration, the more imperfect and erroneous the representations are which have been attached to it.

Music consists, as can be seen from this book, in an inward comprehension of innumerable most diversified forms, constantly approaching and separating, perpetually combining and dissolving in each other. Their operation can be perceived, more or less, without previous cultivation, and can be understood and represented by a superficial instruction; but to comprehend them entirely, to penetrate into their whole nature and attributions, is to know the meaning and force of each form by itself, and also when in combination with every other. Now, let us imagine a great composition before us, in which different parts are united in the most varied manner, in all sorts of artistic forms, each part having its cantilena, its rhythm, its succession of tones, while each tune has a determined relation to the tones of the other parts, and with all this are combined different degrees and kinds of motion, of forte or piano, and of manner of performance. Now, we say, with such a composition before us, we presume it will be admitted that without study such a composition could not be understood, and that the study for that object must be thorough, systematic, and methodical.

Let us suppose for a moment that any one unaccustomed to composition undertook the dissection of the above imagined work. Then would he be overwhelmed with an intolerable burden of unities. The completion of his task would be impossible, were it only from the creation of new forms and applications of them which daily takes place in art.

The only ready, practicable, and fruitful procedure is, therefore, to set one's own hand to work, to learn oneself how to bring the forms from out the world of sound, to "call the spirits from the vasty deep;" to learn to feel the rhythm of the here wish to recommend the new collective edition of Bach's works, at Peter's in Leipzig. As an Introductory School for conducting from our own time and manner into those of Bach, which are so importantly different, and for primary instruction in polyphonic playing, the Author has published a selection from Seb. Bach's compositions, at Challier's in Berlin, at 20 Sgr.

The above warning may also apply to Handel, whose works, however, for the piano, are not numerous. We can recommend his Six Fugues and a Capriccio, at Trautwein's, in Berlin, for more advanced students.

forms, so that all present and future forms shall be within our scope and comprehension, because we have grasped the root of their existence—because we know how they have come into existence, and why. This the doctrine of composition teaches us. This science alone gives us, not abstract ideas upon art—not merely superficial notions upon the operations of art—not a few cut out dead parts, but the whole entire, with all its individualities, and in its unity, matter, and spirit, form and meaning, in that single entirety which is the material of true art.

We may add, from a large experience of every age and of both sexes, that the study of composition, without any proportionate loss of time, even for amateurs, most surely rewards every step, even when but small disposition exists in the student, or when circumstances prevent a lengthened pursuit of the subject. The first few lessons in one-part* compositions will at once awaken the sense for melody, and give a significant idea of its fundamental forms, of the efficacy of rhythm, and of the origin and accumulation of passages and phrases. Already the doctrine, so comprehensive and so easily comprehended, of the two and two composition in two parts, built upon the natural harmony, makes the foundation of all harmony and tonic progression perfectly obvious, and furnishes to moderately endowed students, pleasurable and exciting lessons. So much can be acquired in two or three weeks, with a couple of lessons a week and but little exertion; and, moreover, we might abandon our studies at this point, without having lost our labor. Then the gradual development of harmony and the richer progression of parts, will have, in the mere inspection, the charm of a perfectly rational and highly copious display, from the most simple fundamental forms and the most obvious laws. But to any one who enters upon this pursuit with inbred activity, to such a one the regions of sound are illumined and extended with every effort,—the sense of music is vivified, excited and strengthened by every fresh manifestation of the internal art. Now, with the knowledge of the limitation of chords, freedom in the unfolding of art returns, and her play becomes continually richer and more variegated. Then all artistic forms are imagined and explained, the one from the other—the order of the succession being pre-supposed—the one quite as easy as the other, until, finally, their realization on determined instruments or in song, in ecclesiastical, dramatic, and other objects of our art, completes the whole study. At any point the study may be relinquished with profit, in proportion to the labor bestowed, if circumstances should so command, or the zeal of the student should not urge him to further investigation.

The study of composition may begin early, particularly with talented and lively children, but not before they have made some progress upon a musical instrument,—if possible the pianoforte, and have thereby gained some participation in and capacity for art, and also more penetration and habits of reflection. They ought at least to have got beyond the elementary exercises, and be able to play with feeling and technical correctness larger works, such as, for example, the sonatas of Haydn and Mozart. Instruction in composition

*The author has conformed himself here to the tenor and tendency of his Doctrine of Musical Composition (Lehre von der Musikalischen Komposition), at Breitkopf and Härtel. How little can the above assurance be given by the old thorough-bass and doctrine of harmony; how unartistic is it in foundation and method, how extremely incomplete and unsatisfactory! This the author has exemplified from time to time in the Instruction for Composition, but more demonstratively in the work "Die alte Musiklehre im Streit mit unsrer Zeit" (the old Doctrine of Music in contention with our times), at Breitkopf and Härtel, 1841,—as had been acknowledged and declared long enough before him by Reicha and every thinking professor of composition. The indolence of so many old masters, or the ignorance of masters absolutely unacquainted with the real nature of composition, is still answerable for the painful and useless labor of many young persons. Many such, indeed, are still enduring in the continually disappointed hope that they will at last, some day, arrive at composition, or at least at a clearer insight into the nature of art; they endure until the time has passed, and with it all pleasure and natural feeling, which either dies away or becomes corrupted.

at an earlier period than this would be mere empty playing; or, what is much worse, would disturb, in the still unself-supporting scholar, the free and immediate enjoyment of the compositions lying before him; and thrust in the place of lively, soul-inspiring, artistic employment, cold and profitless mechanism of the understanding. This is one of the greatest errors of a system pursued in many shapes, of instruction in the piano and harmony combined, which apparently advances the students through an intricate mechanism with great rapidity, but at the cost of the feeling of music itself, which remains undeveloped, and becomes, indeed, oppressed and stifled by the disturbance of the understanding, and the mechanism which that system brings into action. The true joy of art and artistic accomplishment becomes the more surely destroyed thereby,—the more deceptive to the observer is the joy of the scholar at his mechanical success,—and the more his sudden progress in certain parts of music is in the beginning inexplicable to the uninstructed.

We consider thus much to be necessary upon general education. The choice of other instruments may be left to each individual, under the advice of the better-informed. The science and history of music must in like manner be left to the disposition and leisure of every friend of art. The composer, and particularly the well-educated musician, will scarcely be able to restrain himself from the history of his art, not merely from books, but from the works of art themselves.

Descriptive Music.

[Concluded.]

Far be it from us, therefore, to deny that descriptive music may be made a noble thing; but what we complain of is, that it is running wild, or at least the musical world are running wild after it. We only wish we could persuade some of the gifted modern composers, who waste their time in representing the unrepresentable, just to try the experiment of writing a little music, which should, like Mozart's Symphonies, be innocent of meaning; and, though they might not find the task easy, we would back its success very strongly.

It is an open question, which deserves more investigation than it has yet received, how far music is legitimately capable of expressing ideas lying out of the proper domain of sound; that it is so to a certain extent is undeniable; but this extent is much more limited than is usually supposed, as may be evident by the fact of the exceeding indefiniteness of the representations produced. For, if we examine closely into the working, on the mind, of any descriptive piece of instrumental music, we shall find that by far the greater portion of its efficiency is due to our own fancy, and very little to the suggestive power of the music itself. It is easy enough, when we are told beforehand the programme of a composition, to identify, or rather to imagine we can identify, its descriptions; but let any descriptive symphony or overture, even of the highest class, be played to a person ignorant of its name or intention, and see the result of his endeavors to make out its meaning. We once heard a magnate of a provincial festival (where Mendelssohn had just succeeded Neukomm in favor) declare he could distinctly trace, in the Wedding March, the exact point where the ring was put on; but for our own part we failed to discover any hymeneal character in it, except, perhaps, the frequent and prominent discords! The most contradictory guesses are made, even by eminent musical critics, as to the meaning of compositions; and we think this very fact might warrant the inference that the meaning so anxiously pursued might be, after all, an ignis fatuus—the composition never having been intended by the composer to bear any meaning at all. And often, when an explanatory programme is given, the case is not much better; for we have remarked the perplexity of hearers listening to a romantic composition of the modern school with a long sheet of explanation in their hands, and trying their utmost, but in vain, to make out what part of the scene is being played! And we have been almost profanely reminded of the reply of the showman, when asked inconvenient questions by his juvenile spectators as to which parts of his picture he was describing.

It is probable that music may be only really capable of describing facts, through the medium of sensations appertaining to them; which sensations are producible also by musical compositions. Thus, for instance, an impression of liveliness or solemnity conveyed by music, may correspond with feelings of the same nature excited by certain objects or certain scenes; and so may seem to describe such objects or scenes; whereas in reality it only results from certain subjective qualities of them. Hence, if the hearer is told what the music refers to, he may probably succeed in tracing the description; but if not, he may altogether fail in divining what is intended to be described.

However this may be, there is no doubt that descriptive music is good and commendable, so far as it is kept in bounds; it may call forth much skill and talent; and where a thorough appreciation of the æsthetic character of music exists, it may tend to results of high merit. But to say that all good music must be descriptive, because some good music happens to be so, is illogical in the extreme; for by far the greater part of our most esteemed instrumental compositions are of such a character that it is impossible to imagine any consistent programme for them, except by resorting to the wildest rhapsodies of modern German enthusiasm.

And it needs but little argument to show that non-descriptive music, at least in the instrumental form, is of a purer and nobler order than descriptive. The latter depends for its interest partly on an element foreign to the essential nature of the art; for music, strictly speaking, is intended to give pleasure by combinations of sound only; and when the descriptive element is introduced, the composition becomes no longer pure music, but, to a certain extent, a combination of music and drama. But a work to which no programme is attached, must please by its merit as a pure musical composition, standing independently on its phonetic qualities, and unaided by any foreign associations; and we think it may be taken for granted, that the composer who excels in works of this nature shows more true command of his art than he who owes half his success to the embodiment in his composition of some tangible scene or extraneous idea.

It will now, we trust, be seen that we were in sober earnest when we stated that Mozart's instrumental compositions were enhanced in musical worth by their having no meaning. Nobody could write descriptive music better than Mozart, when he pleased, as all the world knows; but he did not think that Symphonies, Quartets, and Quintets were the proper field to display this talent upon; and, consequently, in these he confined himself to pure, unadulterated, essential, abstract, music. We are not aware that, throughout the whole range of these strictly instrumental compositions, there is any attempt to introduce or suggest a descriptive feature, extraneous meaning, or non-musical idea of any kind whatever. And this is one reason why they form such admirable examples for study. To those who seek intellectual gratification only, the genius of Beethoven may be more captivating; but for solid benefit and practical improvement in composition, there is no school like Mozart, whose works are truly a 'pure well of music, undefiled.'—Lon. Mus. World.

Verdi.

A Paris correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune, apropos of the performance of the "Sicilian Vespers" on the occasion of the baptism of the imperial baby, gives the following sketch of this popular composer's life.

Verdi, the author of the "Sicilian Vespers," is more than forty years of age. He was born in the Duchy of Parma, at Brussetto, a place so small that it does not even appear on the map. His parents were poor carri, who had not even the means to teach his car to read. In Italy, and particularly in the coun-try, the knowledge of reading is an acquirement and a luxury which benefits no one. But Verdi was unlike his compatriots. The curate of his village took a sudden friendship for him, and taught him all he knew, to wit: reading, writing and music. In a few years the pupil became more learned than his master. He composed military marches and church music, to the great astonishment, admiration and delight of the good curate. Verdi felt his vocation—he left his village, started for Milan, and there, poor, unknown and without protection, he toiled night and day. He subsisted for some time giving music lessons at twenty cents, when destiny brought him in contact with Merelli, the great impresario. Merelli proposed to him the composition of a partition for the Scala, the first theatre of Milan, and gave him the poem of Oberto di San Bonifacio. In Italy, musicians and operas are in such great requisition that the directors oftentimes give themselves up to luck for new operas and productions. They are obliged, sometimes, to have recourse to some unknown composer. If he succeeds, they pay his services with glory; if he fails, they lay him aside to try another. The only difficulty is that experienced by the artistic corps, who have uselessly wasted their time and talents to study works destined to be reproduced no more. Oberto di San Bonifacio succeeded admirably, and, as was to be expected, Verdi did not make one cent out of it. Merelli ordered him a second work, Un Giorno di Regno, (the reign of one day,) but the violent grief which, at the time, he had conceived at the loss of his wife, whom he adored to distraction, dried up the wells of his wit and inspiration. It is the only work of Verdi which did not take. He did not, however, allow himself to become discouraged.—He had tasted the sweetness of success and of applause, and he began to prepare himself for greater triumphs. Convinced that a musical composer, beside a study and knowledge of the great masters of music, should be deeply versed in the study and knowledge of the great masters in poetry and literature of all times and countries, he condemned himself to a forced labor. He studied, at the same time, Corneille, Hugo, Lamartine, Schiller, Goethe, Shakspeare, and Dante; and with that perseverance and strength of will characteristic of genius, he felt himself, at length, able to put on the lips of heroes and of nations the musical words which suited each.

Merelli comprehended well the cause of the fiasco which had attended the production of Un Giorno. He therefore did not hesitate to offer him the poem of Nabucco, which he had previously offered without success to several musical composers. Verdi felt the grandeur of the subject.—He treated it in a masterly manner. His success was immense; it gave him more gold than glory—two thousand francs, perhaps. His fortune was secure. From that moment all the directors were at his feet, but Merelli obtained the preference. Verdi composed for the Scala the opera of I Lombardi, which was more applauded than his previous work; and which yielded him ten thousand francs. Then came Ernani, which was represented at the Fenice, in Venice; I Due Foscari, at Rome, in the Apollo theatre. His genius authorised him to dictate conditions to the directors. In the midst of the furor produced by his masterpieces and his glory, he never lost sight of the great object he had in view, viz: to purchase the cottage in which he was born and to establish around it a vast domain. With the proceeds of Nabucco he purchased the cot, and by means of his other operas a property which is not less, at present, than nine miles in extent. His great pleasure consists in living upon his lands, in the midst of his peasants, who all know by heart the finest pieces in his operas. At Brussetto the reapers perform their work singing the chorus of Rigoletto, Ernani, of La Traviata, and the Trovatore.

Endowed with a scientific but brusque disposition, Verdi does not love the contact of the world, and studiously avoids all public honors. After the production of his opera, La Jerusalem, which was acted for the first time in Paris, he received the cross of the Legion of Honor, and after that of the Sicilian Vespers, the cross of officer—distinctions awarded to him without his knowledge or solicitation. He might have had the cross of Parma, which had been conferred upon the most insignificant composers, had he only applied for it, but he disdained to do so. Even the situation of Master of the Emperor's Chapel at Vienna, which has been repeatedly tendered to him, he flatly refused. His art supplies all his wants.—Early in the morning he sits at the piano—he commences over again, if necessary, the same passages, until he is perfectly satisfied with the performance. He does not compose with facility, and his works bear more or less the marks of the midnight lamp. It will take him hours to master the difficulties of a simple note, and to elaborate a single air according to his fancy.

SUMMER.

BY REV. RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH.

I.

Now seems all Nature to conspire,
As to dissolve the world in fire—

II.

Which dies among its odorous sweets,
A Phoenix on its funeral-pyre.

III.

Simoom breathes hotly from the waste,
The green earth quits its green attire:

IV.

Floats o'er the plain the liquid heat,
Cheating the traveller's strong desire—

V.

Illusion fair of lake and stream,
Receding as he draweth nigher.

VI.

Ice is more precious now than gold,
Snow more than silver men desire.

VII.

'Tis far to seek unfailing wells
For tender maid or aged sire:

VIII.

Men know the worth of water now,
And learn to prize God's blessing higher;

IX.

The shallow pools have disappeared,
Caked into iron is the mire.

X.

Through clouds of dust the crimson sun
Glares on the earth in lurid ire:

XI.

The parched earth with thirsty lips
Is gasping, ready to expire.

XII.

Oh, happy, who by liquid streams
In shady gardens can retire—

XIII.

Where murmuring falls and whispering trees
Sweet slumber to invite conspire:

XIV.

Or where he may deceive the time
With volume sage, or pensive lyre.

A BATH AMONG THE MOUNTAINS.—The Independent of last week contained a "Star Paper," from HENRY WARD BEECHER, descriptive of "A time at the White Mountains." The following is as good as iced Champagne in these hot dog-days.

Reaching the hotel in due season, tired and sweaty, a bath must be had. We went toward the Notch, and turning to the right at the first little stream that let itself down from the mountains, we sought the pools in which we knew such streams kept their sweetest thoughts, expressing them by trout. The only difficulty was in the selection. This pool was deep, rock-rimmed, transparent, gravel-bottomed. The next was level-edged and rock-bottomed, but received its water with such a gush that it whirled around the basin in a liquid dance of bubbles. The next one received a divided stream, one part coming over a shelving rock and sheeting down in white, while the other portion fell into a hollow murmuring crevice, and came gurgling forth from a half-dark channel. Half way down, the rock was smooth and pleasant to the feet. In the deepest part was fine gravel and powdered mountain, commonly called sand. The waters left the pool even more beautifully than they entered it; for the rock had been rounded and grooved, so that it gave a channel like the finest moulded lip of a water vase; and the moss, beginning below, had crept up into the very throat of the passage, and lined it completely, giving to the clear water a green hue as it rushed through, whirling itself into a plexus of cords, or a kind of pulsating braid of water. This was my pool. It waited for me.—How deliciously it opened its flood to my coming. It rushed up to every pore, and sheeted my skin with an aqueous covering, prepared in the mountain waterfalls. Ah, the coldness! Every drop was molten hail. It was the very brother of ice. At a mere hint of winter it would change to ice again! If the crystal nook was such a surprise of delight to me, what must I have been to it, that had, perhaps, never been invaded, unless by the lip of a moose, or by the lithe and spotted form of sylvan trout! The drops and bubbles ran up to me and broke about my neck, and ran laughing away, frolicking over the mossy margin, and I could hear them laughing all the way down below. Such a monster had never, perhaps, taken covert in the pure, pellucid bowl before!

But this was the centre-part. Not less memorable was the fringe. The trees hung in the air on either side, and stretched their green leaves for a roof far above. The birch and alder, with here and there a silver fir, in bush form, edged the rocks on either side. As you looked up the stream, there opened an ascending avenue of cascades, dripping rocks, bearded with moss, crevices filled with grass or dwarfed shrubs, until the whole was swallowed up in the leaves and trees far above. But if you turned down the stream, then through a lane of richest green, stood the open sky, and lifted up against it thousands of feet, Mount Willard, rocky and rent, or with but here and there a remnant of evergreens sharp and ragged. The sun was behind it and poured against its farther side his whole tide of light, which lapped over as a stream dashes over its bounds and spills its waters beyond. So it stood over against this ocean of atmospheric gold, banked huge and rude, against a most resplendent heaven!

As I stood donning my last articles of raiment, and wringing my over-wet hair, I saw a trout move very deliberately out from under a rock by which I had lain, and walk quietly across to the other side. As he entered the crevice, a smaller one left it and came as demurely across to his rock. It was evident that the old people had sent them out to see if the coast was clear, and whether any damage had been done. Probably it was thought that there had been a slide in the mountain, and that a huge icicle or lump of snow had plunged into their pool and melted away there. If there are piscatory philosophers below water half as wise as those above, this would be a very fair theory of the disturbance to which their mountain homestead had been subjected. As I had eaten of their salt, of course I respected the laws of hospitality, and no deceptive fly of mine shall ever tempt trout in a brook which begets pools so lovely, and in pools that yield themselves with such delicious embrace to the pleasures of a mountain bath.

And so, as the sun was gone, it was time for me to go. Step by step I climbed the moss carpeted rocks; slipped in due degree, leaped the wide-set stones, got caught on the dead branches of the cedar, climbed astride over the birch, and reached the road.

MUSICAL CONSERVATORIUMS in Germany are now becoming as plentiful as other educational institutions; and even the little kingdom of Saxony, with its two million of inhabitants, has had the courage to found a second institution for cultivating the art of music. The one which Mendelssohn founded at Leipzig has acquired European fame. That lately established at Dresden has still to attain honor. The institution is, I believe, an exclusively private undertaking, but its views are purely artistic, as it intends only to teach and encourage the study of "classical music." Persons of both sexes are admitted, whether they intend studying the art as a profession or otherwise; nor is it absolutely necessary they should have acquired even the rudiments of a musical education. The pupil can be taught the pianoforte, organ, singing, and any two orchestral instruments he wishes, either string or wind, besides chorus singing, declamation, harmony, counterpoint, and composition. Lectures are given on the history of music; playing at sight, both in single parts and in full score, is practised; orchestral music, duos, trios, quartets for piano, with or without other instruments, is also taught. The active director of the whole scheme is M. Trostler, who has gained some repute in this town as a violin player. The committee of management selected are—MM. Charles Mayer, Franz Schubert, Julius Otto, and Schneider. M. Charles Mayer is at the head of the pianoforte, and M. Schubert, concert master at the Theatre Royal, at the head of the violin instructors. The rest of the teachers are men of talent; and it is to be hoped that the undertaking will meet with encouragement.

MUSIC AT SHIRLEY CHASE.

BY MORTIMER COLLINS.

"The most valuable collections of 'catches, rounds and canons, for three or four voices,' were cautiously circulated during the Protectorate; and deep in the retirement of many such a house as Woodstock the prayers for the Restoration and the practice of 'profane music' were kept up together."
"The merry monarch loved a tune, and small blame to him."—Quarterly Review.

I.
Cavalier music! Shirley Chase,
Hidden deep amid oak-trees royal,
Is the noble home of a knightly race
Old as the oak-trees—proud and loyal.
Snow has fallen on the White King's bier—
Cromwell lords it, late and early,
But as yet his troopers come not here:
At home in his hall sits Sir Everard Shirley.

II.
Moonlight pours through the painted oriels,
Firelight flickers on pictured walls;
Full of solemn and sad memorials
Is the room where that mingled glimmer falls.
There is the banner of Arthur Shirley.
Who died for Charles on a misty wold:
There is his portrait—an infant curly—
Whose corse in an unknown grave lies cold.

III.
Hot and sudden swoop'd Rupert's horse
Down on the villainous Roundhead churls,
But they left young Arthur a mangled corse,
With the red mire clotting his chesnut curls:
Only son of an ancient race
As any that dwells in England's realm—
Ah, a shadow sleeps on Sir Everard's face
When he thinks of his soldier's snow-plumed helm.

IV.
Madrigal music fills the room
With a spring-like beauty and delicate grace:
Vanishes half their weary gloom
As Harry St. Osyth's manly bass
And Maud's soprano and Amy in alt
Mingle like streams on a verdurous shore;
But memory sets them once at fault
As they think of the tenor that's heard no more.

V.
After, a rare old English glee,
Humorous, eloquent, daring, buoyant,
Rings through the chamber, strong and free,
And shakes the mullion'd panes flamboyant:
Merry music of olden time
Gaily defying the Cromwell-manacle,
Stoutly rebelling in hearty rhyme
'Gainst cant and heresy puritanical,

VI.
Then Amy down to the organ sits,
And a pleasant prelude sounds sonorous
As over the keys her white hand flits,
And a Latin canon claims their chorus.
Not in the great cathedrals now
Does saintly song as of yore find place:
But it smooths awhile the furrow'd brow
Of the sad old master of Shirley Chase.

VII.

But the King shall have his own again—

Merry King Charles o'er the stormy water:

Then shall ye hear an easier strain,

A gayer music, Joy's own daughter.

Melody then shall dance right merrily—

Beauty undreamt-of, endless grace,

Shall sound through the air of England, verily,

And flood the chambers of Sir Shirley Chase.

—Dublin University Magazine.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUG. 9, 1856.

Beethoven Literature.

It speaks well for human nature, that whoever in any department of intellectual exertion far outstrips his contemporaries, making his mark deeply upon the progress of his race in science, art, literature, politics, jurisprudence, or war, thereby renders himself the topic of so many pens—the cause of so much shedding of ink. What an immense field of our literature is that devoted to biography, to the sayings and doings of great men, to the discussion of their works, their opinions, their feelings, their intentions! Look at Napoleon, Wellington, Washington, Franklin, Webster, Raphael, Mozart, Michael Angelo, Goethe, Shakspeare, Dr. Johnson, and numberless others.

Beethoven was born eighty-six years ago. For fifty years he has been the mark for critics, the hero of story-tellers, and the subject of biographers. We have at various times called attention in our columns to the absurdities written by admirers of his music in the form of novelettes and tales, in which real circumstances in his history have been twisted to their fanciful purposes, the origin of the peculiar expression of certain of his works been fantastically explained, or in which stories have been told, utterly without foundation, except in the imaginations of the writers. We propose to give our readers at this time a short review of the sources from which the future biographer of the great master can draw his materials.

The first and most natural source to which he will turn is the periodical musical literature of his time and country. The earliest notice of Beethoven in a printed work, unless we except the dedication by "Ludwig van Beethoven, aged eleven years," of his first published work, to his protector, the Elector and Archbishop of Cologne, is to be found in a musical magazine published in Hamburg, by a certain Cramer, in 1782-3. This work, of which we know but two or three copies in existence, contains a letter from Christian Gottlob Neefe upon Music and Musicians in Bonn, in which he speaks of his remarkable pupil, then about thirteen years of age. Soon after this date the annual Electoral Almanacs begin to give the name of the composer as assistant Court organist and member of the orchestra. (He played viola.)

The Leipziger Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung began to be published in the year 1798, and during the fifty years of its existence there is not a volume which does not contain something which throws light upon the history of the composer and the success of his works. This is perhaps the most valuable musical periodical ever published, and as it covers the space of time from 1798 to 1848, must be made familiar by any one who will write upon the music of this century. Less important, though hardly so, are the twenty odd volumes of "Cæcilia," edited by Godfried Weber, at Mayence, with the exception of the last few volumes, which appeared under the auspices of the indefatigable and accurate Dehn. General letters and many notices of Beethoven adorn the columns of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, begun by Schumann about 1835(?), and by other editors still continued. Marx's Berliner Musik Zeitung, 1823-28, gives some valuable facts. By the way, the piano-forte piece called "Dernière pensée musicale de Beethoven," was furnished Marx by the composer, and printed in the Zeitung more than three years before his death. The Wiener Musik Zeitung, edited at one time by Kanne, an acquaintance of Beethoven, covers a space of several years beginning about 1816, and has considerable value, though less than might be expected from a sheet published in the city where the composer lived and died.

The Leipziger Repertorium, of which only two volumes appeared, contains much that is very valuable and interesting from Schindler's pen. These are the more valuable periodicals to the biographer of Beethoven. Besides these, of less value, but not to be overlooked by one who desires to be thorough, are the volumes of Reichardt, (Berlin, 1805-6,) the two musical papers now published at Cologne, one at Mainz, two in Berlin, and especially certain musical and theatrical periodicals of more or less recent date, published at Vienna. Others also have come under our notice, from which something is to be gained.

The Kölnener Zeitung—the famous Cologne Gazette, a news and political daily paper—contained a long controversy in 1835-6 upon the question whether Beethoven was born in the Rheingasse or the Bonngasse at Bonn; from this controversy many facts and anecdotes of Beethoven's childhood may be drawn, and from it we are enabled to correct a minor statement in our translation of Döring last week in regard to the age at which the little Ludwig was put to the pianoforte for practice by his father. Two old gentlemen, one a mayor of Bonn, the other Beethoven's friend Wegeler, recollected seeing the child at the age of three years standing at the instrument, and practising, with the tears running down his little cheeks.

The second source to which the biographer will naturally look, is musical lexicography. In the case of living musicians, a dictionary of musical science and biography is of value, both for the facts contained, and because of the discussions which doubtful points awaken. In the present case there are two such lexicons which possess value—Gerber's and Schilling's—Fétis's is valueless. Gerber published his first two volumes about 1790-92; his four additional volumes in 1812-14. He appears to have applied directly to Beethoven for information, though of this we are not certain. The article in Schilling, written probably by Marx, was founded apparently upon Gerber, and continued from other sources, and so far as it goes is quite reliable.

The third source is the biography proper of the composer. Setting of course the sketches to be found in periodicals aside, we have the following works of this class.

Immediately after the decease of the great composer, a certain Aloys Schlosser published a little work, which is of about the same value to the biographer, as a campaign life of Scott to the future historian of the United States—possibly less; we will waste no space upon it. Another small work called out by the death of the composer, was "Beethoven's Tod" by his friend Kanne—a work of which we have not yet been able to find a copy. The most valuable work upon the early history of Beethoven, is one published at Coblenz in 1838, in two parts, viz: "Biographische Notizen ueber Ludwig van Beethoven," by Dr. Wegeler and Ferdinand Ries. Wegeler knew the boy Ludwig, was the intimate friend of the young man Beethoven, and the correspondent of the great master in after years. In his "Notizen" he gives particular and precise information in relation to the circumstances of his friend's family and to the first years in Vienna. Several letters of Beethoven to him are among the most valuable which remain from the master's hand.—The second part contains the recollections of Ries, who was Beethoven's pupil, and many letters and notes addressed to him. In 1845 Dr. Wegeler published an appendix to the Notizen, containing several valuable and important matters for the future student of Beethoven's history.

In 1840 appeared Schindler's Biography. Few books have been so censured for their shortcomings as this. No reader can arise from its perusal without feelings of strong indignation at the small amount of information given within its pages.* It must be stated to the credit of Schindler that this was not entirely his fault.—The book known in English as "Moscheles' Life of Beethoven," is but a translation of Schindler, with an appendix consisting mostly of translations from the work of Wegeler and Ries. We should have mentioned before that in one or two instances Ries' memory failed him, and his anecdotes (in these particular cases) are not quite correct. He died before their publication, and probably never had opportunity of giving them a due version.

Affixed to the work known as Beethoven's Studien, also published in English—"Beethoven's Studies"—is a short notice of the composer by Ritter von Seyfried. Seyfried was an old Vienna acquaintance of Beethoven, and Kapellmeister of the "Theatre an der Wien" where 'Fidelio' was first given. We are sorry to say that his memory of events, which transpired twenty-five and thirty years before he wrote, was not always exact and correct. Still Seyfried gives us some valuable facts, and quite a number of interesting letters by Beethoven. More recently Lenz has given the public two works, one upon Beethoven's writings, in which we find little more than a catalogue, with extracts from Schindler and the Leipziger allg. Mus. Zeitung, and also Lenz' opinions, and the other a biographical study, which is little more than a rehash of Schindler, Wegeler and Ries, with a few absurd stories from the periodicals of the day. Our journal has already noticed some of the errors of the first volume of this work. These are the principal works in this department of the Beethoven literature.

We have yet to name one other source of knowledge about Beethoven, which we shall consider in our next.

* Our "Diast" asked Schindler why it was that he gave so little? "Because," said he, "the publisher refused to print more than eighteen sheets!"

Musical Review.

SHEET MUSIC.

(Published by Oliver Ditson.)

Twelve Two-Part Songs, by Kücken, Abt, Mendelssohn, and others. No. 3. "Gondola Duet": O come to me; by KÜCKEN. pp. 9.

A beautiful duet, for two sopranos, or soprano and bass, with a gently flowing movement, in G minor. Words German and English.

Gaily through life wander, (Libiamo ne' lieti calici); the Brindisi from La Traviata, by VERDI. Words Italian and English.

A gay and easy little melody in waltz time; pretty enough, but tame compared with some of those dashing drinking songs of Verdi, not to speak of Donizetti's, in Lucrezia Borgia.

Dah prendi un dolce amplesso. (We part, we part). Duettino from MOZART's Clemenza di Tito. pp. 6.

Another number of Wesley's arrangements of "Favorite Songs, Duets and Trios of Mozart." This is a lovely duet, without much pretension, sweet, simple, serious, and brief. It has been ascribed, like several of the minor pieces in that opera, to Mozart's pupil, Süßmayer.

Ti guida a palma nobile, (The path that lies before thee): Terzetto from MOZART's "Magic Flute." pp. 5.

This appears as a number of the "Harp of Italy," though it is properly a string taken (or rather a vibration from a string) from the Harp of Germany.—It is a trio of sopranos, a strain of exhortation addressed by the "Three Ladies" to the young hero Tamino, whose tenor voice once intervenes in a bit of solo, easily sung by the third voice. Of course very beautiful.

Wayside Flowers of France and Italy, translated and adapted by THEO. T. BARKER. No. 1. La Manola, by PAUL HENRIOT. pp. 5.

This is a charming little French song, to a Spanish subject: De l'Aragon, de la Castille, &c., and with a sparkling, piquant, half sentimental, half coquettish sort of Spanish melody. A Spanish invitation to the dance, reaching a climax in the ecstatic thought of the Jota Aragonese.

Music Abroad.

London.

The season is drawing to a close. It has been a more than usually eventful one. Such a gathering of great artists has rarely been witnessed in one year, and never except in "unmusical London." Mr. Ella never tires of admonishing us that (except at the Musical Union) there is no Music in England, and that the eager connoisseur must betake himself to Vienna, Berlin, Paris, or some other great town on the continent, to enjoy the manifestations of his beloved art. Nevertheless we have visited nearly all these boasted marts of harmony, and never heard so much music (or so good) in any of them as in London.

What have we not heard this season? To begin with the concerts of Jenny Lind at Exeter Hall and the Hanover Square Rooms. Where else could this greatly renowned and most charitable of public characters be heard so many times in succession?—and with her husband, Herr Otto Goldschmidt, to boot, who knows all "the Concertos?" Then we have had two Italian Operas. At the one the ricelle garde—the still unrivalled troop—with Grisi, Mario, Bosio, and Ronconi at its head; at the other, the new revelations of little Piccolomini and big Joanna Wagner, with the incomparable Albani to bring up the rear. Any one—or at least any two—of these singers would have sufficed to give "the season" éclat in a continental town. But we have had them all at once, and many others in the bargain, whom, however talented and respectable, it is not necessary to specify by name.

We have had also two Philharmonic Societies—the "Old" resuscitated, as it were, by Dr. Sterndale Bennett, the "New" manfully and successfully striving under the guidance of Benedict and Dr. Wylde. We have thus had symphonies and concertos, overtures and what-not, to our heart's content. Pianists have swarmed among us—first rate pianists, like Clara (Wick) Schumann, Sterndale Bennett, Charles Hallé, Alexander Billet, Arabella Goddard—to say nothing of a host of minor stars, all struggling for a hearing, and few of them getting it (at the Musical Union). For violinists it is sufficient to name Ernst, Sivori, Molique—since the "et cetera" would take up too long a space. With Piatti as Violoncello, and Bottesini (better late than never) as double-bass, we need scarcely enlarge the list—both being inimitable.

The unknown artists who have paid us visits this year are too many to count them.

And what a legion of concerts have sprung out of this embarras de richesses—concerts entirely independent of the "societies," whether Philharmonic or Sacred Harmonic, of St. Martin's Hall and Mr. Hulah, who brought out a new oratorio (Rheinthal's Jephthah) and of the stereotyped benefit performances under well-known names. Out of all this novelty, however, it cannot be said that music has gained much. We are still waiting for a composer—since neither Herr Rheinthal nor Senor Yradier will suffice, even with the recommendation of the Athenæum. The oratorio of the first is dry and unimaginative; the Spanish romances of the last are trifles, all of a color—when you have heard one of them you have heard the rest.

The single new opera which has been given this season—La Traviata—is the weakest of its composer; and though it brought with it a young, fresh, and charming actress, full to overflowing of enthusiasm and promise, it did not present us with what may yet be denominated a singer.

Musically speaking, what, then, have been the facts of the season 1856? Dr. Schumann's "Paradise and Peri," at the elder Philharmonic, was less a 'fact' than a falsehood. Dr. Wyld's "Paradise Lost" remains unfinished; and though two fine works of Mozart were disinterred, they were too ill performed to be successful. The only offering of the New Philharmonic, therefore, was Dr. Schumann's pianoforte concerto, which, although played con amore by his clever and interesting wife, was very properly declined by those critics who attempt with more or less success to direct public opinion. We have thus to thank the Philharmonic Societies for Madame Jenny Lind Guldschmidt—and nothing else? Yes, we are grateful to the directors of the ancient Society for allowing their subscribers an opportunity of hearing and applauding a masterpiece composed by an English musician, and performed by an English pianist. To us, we own, one of the most interesting events of the year was the performance of Dr. Bennett's concerto in C minor, by Miss Arabella Goddard.

To turn to the Sacred Harmonic. That great Society has introduced Mr. Costa's Eli to London; but with the committee of the Birmingham rests the credit of having suggested and first produced that very popular work in public. The Sacred Harmonic has otherwise been content to follow in the beaten path it has trod so long.

Beethoven's later compositions are winning their way slowly but surely. We have dwelt upon Miss Goddard's second performance of the grandest and most difficult sonata; and we have rendered justice to the fine execution of his Ninth Symphony by the Orchestral Union under the direction of Mr. Alfred Mellon. Acknowledgment is due, however to Mr. Hallé, for his intellectual "interpretation" (permit the word) of another of the latest and greatest of the pianoforte sonatas, at his last "Recital"—we mean the Op. 111, in C minor, which, while not designed on a scale so vast and infinitely developed as the Op. 106, in B flat, ranks nevertheless as high as any of its companionworks as an effort of imagination. Even the timid and conservative Mr. Ella has [for the third—not "the first" time in 10 years], assailed the ears and perplexed the understandings of his perfumed "sitters," with the posthumous quartet in B flat—another giant inspiration of the Colossus of instrumental harmony.

Of the concerts of Jenny Lind so much has been said lately that we need say nothing now. Suffice it, the year 1856 will be remembered as the year in which one of the grandest and most perfect of singers retired into private life, in the midst of triumphs, and in the zenith of her powers.

At the Italian Operas (besides the apparition of Marietta Piccolomini), we must mark as "facts" the unfading energy and vigor of Giulia Grisi—the unusually splendid singing of Mario, which has made of the season at the Royal Italian Opera a veritable "Mario season"—the temporary secession of the popular Tamberlik at an early part of the season—the wonderful musico-dramatic displays, tragic and comic, of Ronconi—the increasing reputation and continual improvement of Angiolina Bosio—and the inimitable vocalization of Marietta Albani, who looks younger and handsomer than in 1847. These have given sufficient interest and éclat to the Italian campaign.

What more? Let us see. Balfe has succeeded from the post he filled so honorably from 1849 to 1853 (inclusive) as musical director at Her Majesty's Theatre; in revenge, however, he has set some songs of the poet Longfellow in so kindred a spirit that they promise to excel in popularity all he wrote before; and he has given a benefit at Drury Lane, which was at the same time a bumper and a triumph—so that Balfe, the ex-conductor, stands in no need of consolation.—Covent Garden was burnt down early in March; and in the middle of April the Royal Italian Opera commenced proceedings at the Lyceum! Her Majesty's Theatre has re-opened its familiar doors to the public after two whole years of torpor, with Mr. Lumley, still zealous, eager, and full of enterprise, at the helm. Enfin, while one great edifice devoted to Music perished by fire in March, another has risen, as it were by magic, four months later, in the midst of a garden—we mean, of course, the Surry Music Hall, the inauguration of which took place on Tuesday with such brilliant success, under the direction of M. Jullien.—Mus. World, July 19.

To our Subscribers and Advertisers.

We have to remind many of our patrons that our terms are, payment in advance; yet very many are still in arrears not only for the present year, (which commenced in April,) but for one and even two years past. Bills have been sent to all since April, and it is hoped that those who have not already done their duty in this matter, will soon do so by remitting the amounts due, by mail, or otherwise.

☞ Money letters by mail should always be registered; in that way only can money be remitted at our risk.

Musical Chat-Chat.

The Triennial Exhibition of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association will open in this city on the 10th of September. We understand that the display of Piano-Fortes will be unusually large and brilliant. . . . All who recollect the admirable playing of Mr. MORGAN, last summer, on the Tremont Temple organ, will rejoice to learn, by the announcement in another column, that he is to visit this city again in a few weeks, when he will give two Organ Concerts, in the same place, in connection with the Musical Convention under the auspices of Messrs. JOHNSON and FROST. Mr. M. is one of the most accomplished of English organists, and he will give us plentiful supplies of Bach and Handel, as well as discourse on the fancy stops.

"La Spia," writing to the Evening Gazette about one of those interminable English concerts which he attended lately, says "classical music becomes tedious and monotonous, when listened to for more than three consecutive hours." Is there any kind of music which does not? The concert referred to was one of Mr. HOLMES's Piano-forte concerts, in which Mme. CLARA SCHUMANN, Miss ARABELLA GODDARD, and thirteen other well known names were announced to perform on the same instrument. This Yankee "Spy" dissents from the applause of La PICCOLOMINI. He says:

She really does not deserve it. In La Figlia del Reggimento her singing was beneath criticism and her acting such as any piquante French grisette would be able to do after six months experience on the boards of the Opera Comique. Everything she did, whether good, bad or indifferent, was applauded and certainly would have been discouraging to any artist of merit, had he or she been present. She is much better in La Traviata, though were her name Miss Jenkins instead of Mlle. Piccolomini she would produce no more effect than would any debutante from the Conservatoire of Paris.

WAGNER, says the Spy, is to sing in Tancredi and the Marriage of Figaro, "which opera is the sequel by Mozart to the immortal 'Barber of Seville.'" Is not that rather putting the cart before the horse?—Of an American singer in London, the same writer says:

Mr. Drayton, who has been absent from his native city, Philadelphia, for sixteen years, and who holds a very high position as a basso, from his fine voice, his manly and robust figure and his general excellence as an artist, may return home this fall and allow the musical world to see what "Young America" can do in the artistic line. He is acknowledged as the best "Devilshoof" on the stage in England. He has sung for six years in English opera, and before that time had a good schooling in the French Opera Comique.

RICHARD STORRS WILLIS, editor of the Musical World, has been invited to deliver a course of lectures on Music before the Board of Education in New York. The school officers and teachers of the public schools are invited to be present. . . . WILLIAM

VINCENT WALLACE is said to have recovered from his illness, and to be on his way back to America.

OLE BULL, we see, has given $500 towards establishing a campaign (Fremont) paper among the Germans in Iowa. He never was truer to the instincts of the Artist. If Freedom fails, there is an end of Music and all other Art. . . . The New York Mirror says:

We announced a few days since, a little prematurely, that Max Maretzek had leased the Academy of Music, and would open the Opera season early in September. We now learn from one of the Directors that Mr. Maretzek has actually taken the house from Mr. Paine until Oct. 1st, (Mr. Paine's lease expiring at that time,) and that a short season of the Opera will commence about the 1st of September. There is also a possibility that Max may become a permanent lessee, backed up by men of capital; and that a plan has been adopted which can hardly fail to make the Academy of Music a self-paying institution. * * Of the Company, we have learned no particulars. Madame La Grange is in Newport, whither Max has gone to treat with her.

WILLIAM STERNDALÉ BENNETT, for some time Professor, is now "Doctor of Music" at Cambridge, Eng. He took his degree Monday afternoon, June 30, and was "created" (that is the term) on the morning of July 1st. The exercise-anthem composed for the degree, and performed a few days before at Great St. Mary's, is thus described by a local paper:

"An anthem composed by Professor W. S. Bennett, as an exercise for the degree of Doctor of Music, was performed—Mr. Hopkins, organist of the University and of Trinity College, presiding at the organ. The subject of the anthem is taken from the 15th Psalm, 'Lord! who shall dwell in Thy tabernacle?' The construction of the composition is original and effective, the question—'Lord, who shall dwell?'—preceding each of the verses in recitative, answered by a double choir. In one of the movements is introduced the English choral, 'St. Mary's,' the University Church bearing that name. The placid character of this choral is strongly contrasted with a declamation of the choir to another subject in unison. This is followed by an elegant movement of a pastoral character, which breaks into a manual and original choral, at the conclusion, to the words—'Gloria Patri.' The anthem will be more acceptable to educated musicians than to the general public."

The London Leader (July 19) says JOHANNA WAGNER's performance of Lucrezia Borgia confirms the opinion it had "very reluctantly" expressed of her Romeo; and adds: "Extraordinary physical power, incessant exaggeration, and a total want of true feeling, are the chief characteristics of this German prima donna. To those who were familiar with the Lucrezia of GRISI the contrast was at once ludicrous and painful. Witness the last scene, in which we all remember the passionate abandonment of despair and tenderness of GRISI when she throws herself on the body of Gennaro, the son sacrificed to her cruel lust of vengeance. At this terrible moment Mlle. WAGNER is seen gesticulating coldly but fiercely across the footlights, invoking we may suppose, the excited sympathies of the pit and gallery." Madame AMADEI was the Orsini upon that occasion; and Mr. CHARLES BRAHAM showed his inadequacy (in this critic's opinion) for the rôle of Gennaro.

The Cathedral of Gran, in Hungary, is to be consecrated on the 31st of August, and LISZT, the pianist, who is a Hungarian, has composed a mass for the occasion. . . . Bosio continues to fuoreggiare (as the Eco di Italia in New York says) at the Lyceum theatre in London. . . . STEFFANONE is in London on her return from Brazil. . . . Signora VIRGINIA WHITING LORINI is in London too; also our excellent buffo ROVERE, awaiting an engagement, or disponibile, as the Italians say. . . . A young soprano of great promise has made her début in Paris. "Her name is RIBAUT. About a year ago the committee of the Grand Opera met to hear a pupil of the Conservatoire, who solicited an engagement at that theatre. She selected the duo of 'Romeo and Juliet,' but there happened to be no one at the Opera to sing with her. A young girl modestly offered to sing a part in the duet. Her offer was accepted. The first mentioned artist failed; but the young girl was asked if she would not like to enter the Opera, and, upon her affirmative reply, she was at once engaged for three years. This is Mlle. Ribault; the Opera is paying the expenses of her musical education, as it did for Mario and Poulhier."

The report of THALBERG's intention of visiting us is confirmed, with the postscript that he will perhaps bring with him VIVIER, the eccentric hornist. Watchful "Stella" keeps the readers of the Worcester Palladium informed of all the symptoms of a growing taste for music in that "heart of the old Commonwealth"; witness the following:

Chancing the other day to be in the music rooms of GEORGE BURT, the excellent musician and teacher, I had the pleasure of listening to a rare musical entertainment, the only drawback upon which was the thought that more could not share the treat. As a violinist, this gentleman has no equal among us; and his piano playing is characterized by a singular fire and brilliancy, joined to correct and rapid execution. Three of Beethoven's sonatas, including the fine one in A flat, were played upon the violin and piano, by Messrs. Burt and Hodges, with perfect appreciation of their distinct spirit and beauty. Mr. Burt also interprets Mendelssohn and Chopin so finely, that, for the fortieth time, we second the motion often made by our music-loving citizens, viz: that public musical soirées, in which the rich mine of artistic talent now almost hidden in our midst shall expand itself, are "a consummation devoutly to be wished." Will not this proposition receive serious consideration before the close of another season?

Advertisements.

ORGAN CONCERTS.

Mr. GEO. W. MORGAN

WILL GIVE A

GRAND ORGAN CONCERT

On Wednesday Afternoon, Aug. 20th,

Commencing at 3½ o'clock, and a

SECOND GRAND ORGAN CONCERT

On Friday Evening, Aug. 22d,

Commencing at 8 o'clock, in the

TREMONT TEMPLE.

These Concerts will be in connection with the exercises of the BOSTON MUSICAL CONVENTION, which will commence its sessions in the Tremont Temple on Tuesday, Aug. 19th, and close on the succeeding Saturday evening.

Tickets for sale by J. K. HAYES, at the Superintendent's office of the Tremont Temple.

WANTED, a situation in a Boston Manufactory or Music Store, to learn the art of Tuning, by a person who has some theoretical knowledge of music.

Address "Stanhope," Charlestown, Mass.

CALCOTT'S MUSICAL GRAMMAR.

JUST PUBLISHED. A Musical Grammar, in four parts. I. Notation. II. Melody. III. Harmony. IV. Rhythm. By Dr. CALCOTT.

The design of this work is to compress into a small volume the leading principles of practical music. From the analogy which exists between music and language, the author has adopted the classification first suggested by German theorists. He has endeavored by examples selected from the best authors to render the instructions more satisfactory than if they were merely verbal. By due attention to this volume, it is believed the student may obtain all that is necessary to discriminate between false and correct harmony, and to compose conformably to established rules. Price 75 cents.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
ORGANIST OF ST. PAUL'S CHURCH,
ALBANY, N. Y.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY
FOR THE DIFFUSION OF
MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY:
VOLUME 7.

Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation
and Orchestration,

Containing an exact table of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $8.

VOLUME 8.

Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,
With the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering.— (Former price $5.25) In paper wrappers, $1.18. By mail, $1.20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue.....$1 68
- " 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.....1 68
- " 3. Fétis on Choir and Chorus Singing.....38
- " 4. Mozart's Succinct Thorough Bass School.....21
- " 5. Catel's Treatise on Harmony.....68
- " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected Writings on Thorough Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-Instruction.

Vol. 1. Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents.

Vols. 2 and 3. Guide to Composition, 88c each. Three vols. bound in one complete, cloth boards.....2 68

J. A. NOVELLO,

Sacred Music Store, No. 389 Broadway, New York,
And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

AN ENGLISH LADY, recently from London and Paris, experienced, talented and accomplished, wishes an engagement as Governess in a gentleman's family, or as principal Music Teacher in a first class Ladies' School.

She teaches thoroughly English, French, Music, Singing and Pencil Drawing. Excellent references and testimonials. Address at this office.

Garcia's Complete School of Singing.

JUST PUBLISHED:—A Complete School of Singing, in which the Art is clearly developed in a series of Instructions and appropriate Examples, to which are added Exercises, written and composed by MANUEL GARCIA.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $80 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

Apr 29

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THIS beautiful Art novel, by MME. GEORGE SAND, just completed in the Journal of Music, for which it was expressly translated, has been reprinted in a neat pamphlet, and may be had at this office, and at the periodical and book-tore. Price 16 cents. Copies sent by mail post-paid, for 18 cents.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S
Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC, A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
Do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 228.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 16, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 20.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I. "
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York. "
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y. "
G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia. "
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa. "
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore. "
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga. "
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O. "
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O. "

[Translated from the German for this Journal]

The Life and Characteristics of Beethoven.

BY DR. HEINRICH DÜRING.

(Continued from page 146.)

Beethoven's contentedness with his condition, and the cheerful mood dependent on it, were, as we have already said, darkened by his uncertain state of health, especially by his increased hardness of hearing, which ended finally in total deafness. He wrote about it in the above-mentioned letter: "That envious demon, my poor health, has thrown a bad stone in my way—to wit: my hearing for the past three years has grown continually weaker; and for this infirmity the first cause must have been furnished by my abdominal troubles, which you know are of long standing, but have here become so much worse that I have been constantly afflicted with diarrhœa and a consequent extraordinary weakness. My physician, Dr. Frank, wanted to restore tone to my body by strengthening medicine, and to my hearing by almond oil. But prosit (much good may it do!). Nothing came of that. My hearing became worse and worse, and the other trouble still remained. This lasted till last autumn, when I was many times in a state of despair. Then one medical asinus prescribed to me the cold bath, and a more cautious one the usual lukewarm Danube bath. That did wonders; my bowels were better; my deafness remained, or grew still worse. This winter again it went wretchedly with me. I had frightful attacks of colic, and I again relapsed into my former condition. And so it remained until about four weeks ago, when I went to Dr. Bering of the medical staff, because I thought that such a case required at once a surgeon; besides, I had always had confidence in him. He succeeded in almost entirely checking the violent diarrhœa. He ordered me the tepid Danube bath, into which I had to pour each time a little flask of strengthening matters, and gave me no medicine except four days ago some pills for the stomach and some tea. ~~stronger can, and I can now say, I find myself~~ and roar all day and night long. I ~~must~~ say, I pass my life miserably. For two years I have avoided nearly all society, because it is not possible for me to say to people: I am deaf. Had I any other profession, I might get on better; but in my profession it is a dreadful situation. And then my enemies, whose number is not small, what will they say to it?

"To give you an idea of this wonderful deafness, let me tell you that I am obliged in the theatre to lean close against the orchestra to understand the players. The high tones of instruments, voices, when I am any ways off, I do not hear. In conversation it is to be wondered that there are people who never have remarked it. As I was often absent-minded, they set it down to that. Frequently too I scarcely hear a person talking in a low voice—the tones, to be sure, but not the words; and yet, as soon as one screams, it is unendurable to me. Heaven knows what will come of it. Bering says, it will certainly become better, if not entirely well. Already often have I cursed my existence. Plutarch has brought me back to resignation. I will, if possible, defy my fate, although there will be moments of my life when I shall be the most unhappy creature on God's earth. I beg you, say nothing to any one of my condition. Only as a secret do I confide it to you. Should my present state continue, I will come next Spring to you; you can hire me a house in some pleasant place in the country, and then I will become a peasant for half a year. Perhaps that will effect a change. Resignation! what a wretched resource! and yet that is all that there is left me."

Of an earlier mentioned friend of his youth in the time of his life in Bonn, Beethoven wrote: "Stephen Breuning is now here in Vienna, and we are together almost daily. It does me so much good to call up the old feelings again. He has really become a good and noble youth, who knows a little, and has his heart, as we all have more or less, in the right spot. I have very beautiful lodgings now, which look out upon the ramparts and are of double value for my health. I think I shall make it possible to have Breuning come to me. Your love of Art rejoices me much. Only write me how it can be done, and I will send you all my works, which now amount to quite a pretty number, which is increasing day by day. In return for the portrait of my grandfather, which I beg you to send me as soon as possible by the post wagon, I send you here the portrait of his descendant, your ever kind and heartily loving Beethoven, which has been published here by Artaria, who has often asked me for it. I will write immediately to Christoph Breuning and read him a bit of a lecture on account of his peevish humors. I will scream the old friendship right into his ear. Never have I ~~forgoten~~ among you, ye dear and good ones, although I have not let you hear from me. But you know writing never was my forte. Even my best friends have not for years long received any letter from me. I live only in my notes, and one is scarcely down before another is begun. As I now write, I often make three or four things at the same time. Write to me oftener now. I will take care that I find time to write to you sometimes. One word of Ries, to whom my hearty greeting. As regards his son, I will soon write you, although I believe Paris is a better place than Vienna for him to make his fortune in. Vienna is overrun with people, and even the best merit finds it hard to sustain itself. Until the autumn or the winter I will see what I can do for him, for then everybody hurries back to the city again."

Beethoven had found a patron and an active furtherer of his talent in the first period of his Vienna life in the Prince Lichnowsky, mentioned in a foregoing letter, who had received him into his house, where he had remained till near the year 1800, alternating, however, with the country. The prince was a great friend and connoisseur of music. He played the piano, and studied diligently Beethoven's works, which he performed with more or less skill, and sought to prove to the young artist, whose attention was often called to the difficulties of his compositions, that he had no need to change anything in his manner of writing. Every Friday morning the Prince had music at his house. Besides four salaried musicians, Beethoven too was present, who willingly listened to the remarks of these gentlemen, as for instance, once when the celebrated violoncellist, Kraft, suggested to him to mark a passage of the third Trio of a symphony composed by him with sulla corda G, and in the second part of this Trio to change the 4-4 time, with which Beethoven had marked the finale, into 2-4 time. Beethoven's new compositions were always performed for the first time, so far as they were suitable for that, in the house of Prince Lichnowsky. Several great musical artists were generally present. There too was where Beethoven played over to the famous Haydn the three Sonatas, which he dedicated to him. It is related that Beethoven was there one day invited by the Count Appony to compose a Quartet for a stipulated sum. Thus far he had produced nothing in that form. Repeatedly reminded by his friends of this commission, he at length set himself to work. The first attempt, however, resulted in a grand violin Trio; the second in a violin Quintet. In the house of Prince Lichnowsky, too, a Hungarian Count once laid before him a difficult composition by Bach, in manuscript, which he performed with great readiness at sight. A musician by the name of Förster brought him one day a Quartet, which he had only copied out that morning. In the second part of the first movement the violoncellist got out. Beethoven stood up, and while he kept on playing his part, he sang the bass accompaniment. To a friend, who expressed his wonder at his thorough knowledge, he said, smiling: "So the bass part had to be, else the author understood nothing of composition." Whereupon the latter remarked that he had played the Prélude, which he never saw before, so fast that it could have been impossible to see the single notes. "That is not necessary," replied Beethoven. "If you read rapidly, a multitude of misprints may occur; you do not see nor heed them if you only know the language."

So far Beethoven had progressed in his musical culture through the fundamental instruction which, as before mentioned, he owed to the contrapuntist, Albrechtsberger, and to Haydn, after the return of that great master from England. His fame as a composer had been established in a few years through a succession of works, which had equal honor to the teachers and the scholar. To Vienna, which had been so far to his mind, he found himself tied forever after the death of the Elector Max Franz in 1801. He could not count with certainty on a support in his native city, Bonn, even if he had longed to go there. He had no need to be anxious about the means of subsistence. He had acquired so considerable fame as a composer, that he could sell his compositions to the music-dealers at high prices.

Beethoven loved best to compose in the open air, in the midst of nature, which had always from his boyhood had great charm for him. There he could give himself up undisturbed to his ideas. He fixed them upon paper at once, and went on working upon them by the way and after his return home. We have before intimated that he was quite as great a pianist as he was composer. His virtuosity in the overcoming of great difficulties was wonderful. His most splendid exhibition of himself was in free fantasias. His musical delivery, if not always equally tender, was yet always brilliant. There he possessed an uncommon facility, not only in varying a given theme with the fingers, but in really working it up. In this respect he came the nearest to Mozart, perhaps, of all the modern musicians.

With his rich earnings at this time, he might (which was not always the case) have lived free from care. Brought up in straitened circumstances, and constantly kept, if only by his friends, under a sort of guardianship, Beethoven never knew the worth of money, and was anything but economical. Of this he gave a proof while he still lived in the house of Prince Lichnowsky. The dinner table was set at four o'clock. Beethoven held it an infringement of his liberty, a burthensome constraint, against which his nature rebelled, to appear there at that time. "There I must be at home every day at half past three," said he to a friend, "dress myself better, attend to my beard, &c., &c. It's more than I can bear." The result was, that he often went to a restaurant, where, as in all economical matters, he fared badly, since he neither understood the value of the articles nor that of money.

The peculiar sensitiveness of his character was in striking contrast with his ideal liberality, by which he often precipitated himself into all sorts of cares and quandaries. This led him into manifold misunderstandings with his patron, Prince Lichnowsky, so long as he was an inmate of his house, and with other friends; although they were for the most part soon healed over. When the first ebullition of rage was past, he lent a willing ear to rational suggestions, and his heart was speedily inclined again to reconciliation. The consequence was, that in a short time he had begged pardon. One day he wrote as follows to a friend living in the same city with him: "In what a glorious light you have shown me to myself! O, I see it, I do not deserve your friendship! It was no consciously premeditated wickedness in me which made me treat you so; it was my unpardonable thoughtlessness." Beethoven closed the somewhat lengthy letter, full of the bitterest self-reproaches, with the words: "But no more! I will come to you myself, and throw myself into your arms, and beg for the lost friend, and you will give yourself back to me, the repentant, loving thee, never forgetting thee, Beethoven."

This irritability was partly a consequence of the gloomy humor into which he was brought by the weaker and weaker condition of his health. He had been obliged, in obedience to medical advice, to submit to the application of the bark of Daphne mezereum. About this and his physical sufferings, as well as about the remedies which had proved so fruitless, he speaks particularly in a letter written at Vienna, on the 16th of November, 1801, to his friend Wegeler.

"You wish to know how I am and what I take. Little as I like to talk about the matter, I must gladly do so with you. Bering for some months past has ordered blisters continually applied to both arms, consisting as you know, of a certain bark. This is an extremely disagreeable cure, since it robs me always of the free use of my arms for a couple of days, until the bark has drawn sufficiently, not to speak of the pain. It is true, I cannot deny it, the humming and roaring is somewhat weaker than formerly, especially in the left ear, with which my difficulty first commenced. But my hearing is not at all improved; I dare not determine whether it has not rather become worse. With my abdomen it goes better; especially when I use the lukewarm bath for some days, I find myself for eight or ten days tolerably well. I seldom take anything strengthening for the stomach. Of plunge baths Bering will not hear. On the whole I am very much dissatisfied with him. He has too little care and consideration for such an infirmity. If I had not first gone to him, and that too with much difficulty, I would never see him. What think you of Prof. Schmidt? I do not like to change, but it seems to me Bering is too much a man of practical routine, to get hold of many new ideas through reading. Schmidt seems to me in this regard a wholly different man, and perhaps would not be so careless. They relate wonders of galvanism. What do you say to that? A physician told me he had seen a deaf and dumb child restored to hearing in Berlin, and also a man who had been deaf for seven years."

Only for moments did a more tranquil mood return to him, soon snatched from him by a glance into a comfortless future. Weaker and weaker grew the hope in him of ever finding a complete relief, and he saw many of his darling plans thus thwarted. In this mood he wrote in the letter just referred to: "I am living somewhat more pleasantly again. You can scarcely believe how drearily, how sadly I have passed my life these last two years. Everywhere my weak hearing haunts me like a spectre. I fled from men, had to appear a misanthrope, and am in fact so little so. This change has been brought about by a dear, enchanting maiden whom I have again some happy moments, and it is the first time that I could feel marriage could make me happy. That cannot be at present. I must tumble about still farther in the world. Were it not for my hearing, I should long since have travelled over half the world, and that I must do. For me there is no greater satisfaction than to pursue and show my art. Do not believe that I should be happy with you in Bonn. What should make me happier? Even your solicitude would sadden me; every moment I should read the sympathy upon your faces, and should only feel myself the more unhappy. Those beautiful scenes of my fatherland, what was vouchsafed to me in them? Nothing but the hope of a better condition. It would be mine but for this calamity. O, I would embrace the world were I but free from this! My youth, I feel it, but begins from now. Was I not always a dried-up man? My corporeal strength for some time since grows more than ever, and so too my spiritual energies. Every day I attain nearer to the goal, which I feel, but cannot describe. Only in this can thy Beethoven live. Not a word about rest! I know of none but sleep, and it vexes me enough that I must give more to that than formerly. Give me but half delivery from my trouble, and then, as the completed, ripe man, I will come to you and renew the old feeling of friendship. You must see me happy, as it is allotted me to be here below, and not unhappy. No—that I could not endure! I will clutch hold of the wheel of Fate; surely it shall never bow me down entirely. O, it is so beautiful to live one's life a thousand times. I feel I am not made for a still life."

Almost equally as by his own condition was he troubled about the welfare of his early friend, Stephen von Breuning, living in Vienna. "The life here," he wrote, "involves too many fatigues for his health. Besides, he leads such an isolated life, that I really do not see how he could improve. You know how it is here. I will not say that society would impair his relaxation. One cannot persuade him to go anywhere. I had music at my rooms a short time since; but our friend Stephen staid away." In that Beethoven found all the more proof of his friend's melancholy, since Stephen von Breuning was an amateur, who had made himself an excellent violinist, and had sometimes played in the electoral chapel at Bonn. He seldom enjoyed uninterrupted contentment, owing doubtless in a great degree to his active labors, which he kept up incessantly until his death in June 1827.

[To be continued.]

Vivier.

(Translated for the Lond. Mus. World from "L'Illustration")

Although a great deal has been written about Vivier in every language, in Turkish and Russian, English and French, German and Italian, &c., &c., he is little known except among his friends. By the public he is seen, as it were, surrounded by the glorious halo of an artist at once incomparable and original, which threatens to make him pass for some fantastic and legendary personage.

It is time that the world should know in what light to behold him, and that we should raise the veil which hides the face of the gifted and eccentric being called Vivier.

Vivier is a Corsican by birth; his family is connected with the most illustrious of his country, among others that of the Colonnas of Istria. His grandfather, staff-surgeon to the armies of Louis XVI., was a Norman. He may thus be likened to an apple-tree grafted on a mountain chestnut, growing in a sunny land, beneath a blue sky. His temperament is robust, harmonious, and poetic. His strength is immense, he can break the hardest nuts between his finger and thumb, as well as perform other feats of physical strength; and if ever he were to give way to violent anger, he would, without doubt, be capable of accomplishing extraordinary things.

This singular physical organization is a great advantage. Vivier possesses wonderfully powerful lungs and a Herculean frame. He is a fine swimmer, and in diving often remains so long under the water as to frighten his friends. When he breathes into his horn, every one else is obliged to take his breath three or four times while he holds on a note, piano at first, and then swelling into a powerful fortissimo.

Vivier passed his childhood at Brioude in the Haute-Loire, where he first began his studies and where his musical genius was at first revealed. His father held an appointment in the administration des finances, and was possessed of a fine artistic organization, playing capably both on the horn and the violin. His three sisters were, also, excellent musicians. It is thus seen that Vivier was born in a musical atmosphere. There was at the college of Brioude a professor of music and dancing, who had the honor of teaching Vivier the violin. One day, during the holidays, the young student got hold of his father's horn, and he had no sooner applied it to his lips than he found he had a perfect embouchure. He immediately took a great fancy to the instrument.

Vivier was soon after sent to Poitiers, to an appointment under government. He did not forget to take his horn and violin with him, and most likely found more amusement with them than with his pen.

It was during this time, that by constant and indefatigable practice, he discovered how to produce double and treble notes simultaneously on the horn. He at first obtained the notes in octaves, but did not stop in his "career of conquest," for the sounds coming coarsely and loudly, he was not master of them, and could not, for a length of time, soften and then render them expressive. It was not till after continual study and practice that he was enabled to conquer the rebellious sounds and bend them to his sovereign will.

After having finished his term at Poitiers, Vivier was sent to Lyons to continue his government functions. There he pursued his musical studies, both at the theatre, as an amateur violinist, and in private parties, where he played quartets. He was one of the greatest favorites in the réunions of Mad. Mongolfier, a celebrity at that time.

The manager of the Lyons theatre offered Vivier splendid terms as solo horn in the orchestra; but, like another Hippocrates, Vivier refused the offer of this modern Artaxerxes. He felt himself impelled by an inward monitor; he instinctively believed he had a mission to fulfil. One day Vivier asked leave of absence, and, with his eye fixed on his guiding star, started for Paris, where he arrived with 25 francs in his pocket, and descended at the Hôtel de l'Univers, rue Croix-des-Petits-Champs, where he was located in a room on the seventh floor above the entresol.

With his usual self-confidence, Vivier called upon the heads of the Government department in which he was employed, to solicit the favor of being employed in Paris. For, above all, he would not give pain to his family, who always dreaded to see him abandon himself exclusively to music. By good fortune, the chief of the staff, M. David, was an excellent violinist. He heard, and at once understood Vivier, and obtained for him a prolonged leave of absence, and a promise of the first vacancy in Paris.

Behold him, then, in Paris, more occupied, no doubt, with music than with finance; always calm, gay, conscious of his strength, which never left him, waiting at home for fortune, and disdaining to run after the coquette.

A dramatic author, a man of esprit, who already knew Vivier, kindly offered the use of his rooms, that he might be heard by the most distinguished composers and artists of Paris. Vivier there met Auber, Halévy, Adam, etc., and, after playing before them, was acknowledged and saluted as "King of horn-players, while waiting for the place of horn-player to the king." The newspapers of the month of May, 1843, recorded this great event. We cite a curious extract:

"Give yourself the task of solving an insoluble problem, and imagine that you have succeeded. The quadrature of the circle, aerial navigation, universal peace—realize, in short, Utopia, and you will not be more astonished than we were with what we heard a few days since.

"Assemble all the scientific academies, all the physicians of Europe, and tell them you have heard a man, who, by blowing in a single tube, produces two sounds simultaneously; they will tell you the thing is impossible. But if you persist, and add, moreover, that you have heard, in the same way, three simultaneous sounds, you will run a great risk of being taken either for a madman or a fool. And going still further, should you declare that you have heard FOUR sounds at the same time, you may reckon upon obtaining a certificate that you are both. Our readers must therefore arm themselves with indulgence, and repose implicit faith in our words; they must consent to believe that an impossibility is possible. We shall then, with fuller confidence, attempt a description of what we heard.

"Luckily we are not without accomplices in credulity. Auber, Halévy, and the élite of literature and art, whom a colleague in the dramatic commission, Ferdinand Langlé, had assembled together at his house, can testify to the astonishment which this marvellous exhibition created.

"We allude to a young artist—M. Vivier—recently arrived in Paris, who plays on the horn (an ordinary horn without any artificial appliances), passages in chords of two, three, and four notes. What means M. Vivier employs to accomplish this strange phenomenon, which reverses all the laws of acoustics, is his own secret—a secret which no one else can fathom. Whether it is an individual gift, or a discovery that can be made available by others, Vivier alone can tell. All we know is, that the incredible feat has been achieved, and in the presence of witnesses whom it would be folly to endeavor to deceive.

"M. Vivier was in a room separated from his hearers when he played his first morceau, and we are ready to acknowledge that we were all rather suspicious of some trickery.

"But when M. Vivier came amongst us, and after playing a few single notes on the horn in the style of ordinary mortals, he produced several notes together, without preparation, and without taking the instrument from his lips, it was plain there was no deception in the matter, and that it was simply a thing inexplicable, a quasi miracle which we had witnessed.

"Horn players are generally divided into two classes—first horns, who play only the higher, and second horns, who play only the lower notes. The instrument, however, is the same in both instances, the difference being made by the embouchure. M. Vivier is neither a first nor a second horn—or better, perhaps, is both. He has made a particular study of the 'shut' notes, which he produces with a power that we never observed in any other horn player.

"In the key of F he played a scale of three octaves, sounding at the same time four C's in diatonic succession."

The above article was signed "Adolph Adam." We have given it complete, as much because the writer is an authority in such matters, as because, dating from the period at which it was written, M. Adam was always an enthusiastic admirer and devoted friend of Vivier.

At Adam's house Vivier met the musical celebrities of the day: Spontini, Meyerbeer, Donizetti, &c. At the time of the visit of the Queen of England to Eu, Vivier added to the brilliancy of the fêtes which were given on the occasion. Her Gracious Majesty complimented him, and expressed a wish to hear him in London. In London, by the way, Vivier made himself known to the public in association with Thalberg.

The career of the artist developed itself day by day. His little room at the Hôtel de l'Univers was besieged by distinguished visitors. Rossini never missed an opportunity of listening to Vivier, who, accompanied on the pianoforte by M. Adam, daily delighted the ears of the great composer. He played at several of the nobility's mansions—at the Duchess of Maille's, MM. Duchâtel, de Vetry, etc. It was not, however, till the year 1846 that Vivier made his début at the Théâtre-Italien before the Parisian public. His success on that occasion was immense, and the judgment, long before confirmed by competent critics, was ratified by the bravos of an enthusiastic public. We forgot to state that, when in London, he had sent a letter to the Ministre des Finances, tendering the resignation of his appointment, which was accepted with great regret.

And now Vivier could follow the bent of his inclination, and visit the scenes of his future conquests, England, Germany, Holland, Prussia, and even Turkey, certain of being welcomed with enthusiasm. The palaces of kings were open to him, as well as the châteaux of the nobility, and the more modest houses of men celebrated for their talents. He could not move a step without a hand being stretched out to grasp his; without eyes that sought his; and friends and admirers who courted his society.

And why? It is because Vivier is not only an accomplished and superior artist, but a composer of genius, and a musician of the first rank. He sings with exquisite taste, and plays the violin admirably, even when he uses it in the form of a guitar. Nature has been so bountiful to him, that he has every mode of expression at his command: the horn, the violin, the pianoforte, the voice, and mimicry. His throat is as flexible as his ear is fine. Above all, he is a man of delightful esprit, quick, "prime-sautier," with great tact, active and strong, full of life and vivacity. It does not require much more to please, or, at least, to be sought after with eagerness.

(Conclusion next week.)

[From the London Musical World.]

Opinions of Continental Organs.

During a recent tour, I had an opportunity, through the kindness and attention of the builder, Walcker of Ludwigsburg, of examining the magnificent new organ in Ulm Cathedral, which will be the largest he has yet built, if not the largest in the world. It stands at the west entrance under the tower arch, and the surrounding walls serve for three sides of a case. A vast space is thus allotted to the various portions of the organ and the sound boards are particularly wide and free.—Indeed the interior is quite majestic, and affords ample space for inspecting the details of mechanism, pneumatic application, &c.

The blowing apparatus consists of twelve upright cylinders in zinc; the upper end being weighted to force the air into the different trunks and is raised again by means of the ordinary valves underneath. This method of supplying the lungs of an organ is rather common in Germany, and appears desirable where space is limited, although that cannot be an object in this instance.

* * * The design of the organ is grand and comprehensive in the extreme, and embraces everything that can be imagined. Not being completed at the time of my visit, it was not possible to judge of the aggregate effect, but the quality of the portion I did hear, struck me as very beautiful. Walcker produces charming 8 and 4-foot work, and perhaps in this department he is not surpassed. The metal is of course first-rate, with fine voicing and an excellent temperament; the 8-foot work in his organs is very fascinating. Judging from his organ at Frankfort, neither his reeds, nor mixtures, equal those of some other builders, but there appears to be some special excellence belonging to each of the great foreign builders. Reed work may be the forte of the French builders, but mixture work certainly is not; while the Germans (to whom we look for everything that is orthodox, as they certainly have been the originators of the great style of organ building) appear to have obtained by simple means a variety of tone in their flue works, of which in England there is little idea. In this respect, varying the scales, voicing, and formation of the mouth of the pipe, Walcker has displayed his resources and ingenuity.

Most of the reed work is of the free species, including the Vox Humana, the body of which is similar to our stopped diapason, perforated. The registers are ranged in a semicircular form, on either side of the manuals, and are very convenient for use. The Double Pedal board also presents greater facilities to the performer than could be expected; the second or small pedal organ slanting upwards beyond the first pedal. The naturals are 10 inches in length, the harps 4.—The sixteenth principal, in wood, has the upper lip of iron, attached to the body of the pipe, which is moveable, to regulate the intonation.—The sixteenth violin is only $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches inside measure. The fagura is of a very small scale in metal, with three ears, and most of the metal pipes have an arched upper lip with moderate nicking (as we term it, the excess of which tends to deteriorate the tone.) The cost of the organ is 28,000 florins, (£2,240 sterling.)

A short account of the organ at Weingarten may not be uninteresting; as, though it has been held in universal renown, the place itself has, hitherto, been difficult of access. Weingarten nearly adjoins Ravensburg, which has a station on the Wirtemberg line of Railway, about an hour's ride from Ulm. The situation of the abbey is very commanding, and the surrounding scenery of extent and beauty probably surpasses even that seen from the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. The abbey is ascended by a long flight of steps, and is a very large and handsome building in the Italian style. It is sumptuously decorated and in good preservation.

Not so the organ, which has not been cleaned since its erection, and, therefore, is in a lamentable condition, and much dilapidated. It was commenced in 1739, and completed in 1752.—The case is as splendid as the abbey itself, and very gorgeous. The wind is supplied from 12 large bellows (which are placed in a distant chamber,) and conveyed through one immense run, but is not adequate to the requirements of the instrument. There are not two pedal organs, nor a mixture of 60 ranks, as recently stated.—The size and extent of the organ is somewhat like that at Haarlem, and were it as well preserved, it would probably yield a similar sweetness and brilliancy: but the resonance of the Abbey is inferior to that of St. Nicholas at Haarlem. The Weingarten organ evidently stands in its original integrity, and, on this account, is unusually interesting. The 32-foot metal speaks with a purity which characterizes the whole instrument, as far as it is possible to judge of the tone through accumulation of dust; but considering the poth at which it was built, the organ, throughout, is a wonderful specimen of skill and ingenuity. The carillons are played from the pedals; they are beautiful in tone, and contain a great portion of silver. There is also a small organ near the choir, by the same builder, Gäbler, of Ravensburg, who probably built the numerous organs in his native place, besides that at Stuttgart, which is nearly equal to the Weingarten, and has lately been renovated by Walcker. The large organ registers are ranged horizontally (an idea probably suggested to Cavallé at the Madelaine.)

The organ at Freiburg (en Suisse) is a fine instrument in the ensemble, but on analysis it seems to be over-rated. The tone is good, but of moderate quality. The Vox Humana, I think, is excelled by Cavallé at the Madelaine, although this register has probably gained for the organ half its renown. It stands in a position peculiarly favorable for effect, viz., in a swell (of which there are two) which opens behind the organ in the lowest part, causing the tone to speak under the tower-arch, from whence it travels into the building subdued and modified. The sub-bass, 32 feet, is a 16-foot bourdon. Some of the most striking registers are those recently introduced by Haas of Berne, viz., two free reeds, a clarinet 8 feet, and a physharmonica, a new flute, quint, and quintadine of 16 feet. The effect of this last is very beautiful, and proves great skill in voicing, the double sound of the fundamental tone combined with its harmonics being singular, yet charming. The organist, M. Vogt, makes free use of the clarinet as a solo stop in his storm illustrations, which he certainly manages well. The free reeds, now very general on the Continent, form a pleasing contrast to the beating reeds, and for solo purposes are preferable. The Paris builders produce them in the greatest variety and perfection; and I think they would be an advantage in English organs, but they are difficult to make well.—Another striking feature in the Freiburg organ is the cornet (which certainly ought not to have been discarded in large English organs). The one termed 16-feet contains a bourdon of this pitch from 2-feet C, and with the thick nasal quality peculiar to this register, imparts gravity and weight of tone in the full organ. It binds the mixtures with the 8 and 16-foot work well together, and destroys that piercing tone, which is too often a most unpleasant characteristic of modern organs. Haas of Berne is a builder of great repute, and he has lately reconstructed the cathedral organ of that place, where his free reeds are very prominent. The jeux de fond are very good, but the mixtures are bad. Haas is just completing a new organ at Basle of grand proportions, and is about to build a similar instrument at Lucerne.

I remain, your obedient servant,

CHAS. M. KOSKELL.

The Native Lands of Voices.

We begin with the Contralto. It is a curious fact that this voice is found principally in the southern parts of Italy and Spain, and among the poorer classes that work in the open air. I have always remarked in my own country (Italy), that in small provincial theatres, the Contralto chorussingers are in far greater number than the Soprano; I have no doubt that this is owing to the hard labor and frugal fare of these women, (they being mostly peasants, following some laborious out-door occupation), which manner of living gives to the vocal organs greater strength and volume.

The Mezzo Soprano is, if I may so speak, cosmopolite; for everywhere may this voice be found. Mme. Malibran, Spain; Stoltz, France; Sheriff, England, &c., &c.

Northern countries, on the contrary, are the cradle of fine Soprano voices. Mad. Sontag, Germany; Persiani, North of Italy; Demerit (who had one of the most beautiful voices possible), Hungary; Jenny Lind, Sweden; Damoureau Cinti, North of France.

The Tenor voices are principally found in the centre of Italy and South of France. Nourrit, Montpellier; Rubini, Bergamo; Duprez, Toulouse; Mario, Bettini, and Gardoni, centre of Italy.

Bass and Baritone are also cosmopolites. La-blache and Benedetti, Naples; Barolhet, France; Tamburini, Bergamo; Badiali, Marini, and Ben-eventano, centre of Italy; Herr Formes, Germany. But Russia may boast of having produced the very deepest and most powerful Bass.—N. Y. Musical World.

NOTES ON BELLS.—Human eccentricity nowhere records itself more nakedly than on bells, for example—At Albourne, on the first bell, we read, "The gift of Jos. Pizzie and Wm. Gwynn, Music and ringing we like so well And for that reason we give this bell."

On the fourth bell is—

"Humphry Symson gave xx pound to buy this bell, And the parish gave xx more to make this ring go well."

A not uncommon epigraph is—

"Come when I call
To serve God all."

At Chilton Foliot, on the tenor, is—

"Into the church the living I call,
And to the grave I summon all.
Attend the instruction which I give,
That so you may for ever live."

At Devizes, St. Mary, on the first bell, is—

"I am the first, altho' but small,
I will be heard above you all."

And on the second bell is—

"I am the second in this ring,
Therefore next to thee I will sing."

Which, at Broadchalk, is thus varied.

"I in this place am second bell,
I'll surely do my part as well."

On the third bell at Colne is—

"Robert Forman collected the money for casting this bell
Of well disposed people, as I do you tell."

At Bath Abbey, on the tenth bell is—

"All you of Bath that hear me sound, Thank Lady Hopton's hundred pound."

On the fifth bell at Amesbury is—

"Be strong in faith, praise God well, Frances Countess Hertford's bell."

And on the tenor—

"Altho' it be unto my loss,
I hope you will consider my cost."

At Stowe, Northamptonshire, and at St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford, we find—

"Be it known to all that doth me see That Newcombe, of Leicester, made me."

At St. Michael's, Coventry, on the fourth bell, is—

"I ring at six to let men know
When to and from their work to go."

On the seventh bell is—

"I ring to sermon with a lusty bome,
That all may come and none can stay at home."

On the eighth bell is—

"I am and have been called the common bell
To ring, when fire breaks out to tell."

At St. Peter's-le-Bailey, Oxford, four bells were sold towards finishing the tower, and in 1792 a large bell was put up, with this inscription—

"With seven more I hope soon to be For ages joined in harmony."

But this very reasonable wish has not yet been realized; whereas at St. Lawrence's, Reading, when two bells were added to form a peal of ten, on the second we find—

"By adding two our notes we'll raise,
And sound the good subscribers' praise."

[From the Canadian Musical Review.]

Musical Criticism.

In our editorial capacity it becomes our duty to pass judgment on the performances of others, be they artists or amateurs; and invariably will our remarks be found not only to have been generally averse to those expressed by our daily contemporaries, but contrary probably to the opinions of some of our readers. People in this latitude have become so accustomed to read such flattering encomiums on musical performances that they might almost imagine that remarks or criticisms disparaging to the persons interested, were suggested by ill feeling or prejudice, and certainly it is apparently contrary to all past practice for concert givers to expect anything at all approaching a fair or just criticism of their performances.—What they expect is to read that their performances were in the highest degree successful, and the applause (no matter whether bestowed by an intelligent and appreciating audience or not) was truly well merited. How true to nature this is! Who, embarking all his hopes of worldly success on the favorable opinion and judgment of the popular voice, can be insensible to the encomiums expressed in his behalf: and who is not equally jealous of such remarks as would appear to crush all his rising hopes and exultant feelings? How difficult then must be the position of that critic, who desires to discriminate without prejudice or partiality between genuine and fictitious talent, and yet to advance, as in duty and conscience he is bound, the favorite Art which he has (or ought to have) made his constant study! To do this rightly is, emphatically, no easy task. The human heart is not naturally so humble as to submit to the judgment of others without murmuring; but still as we acknowledge the duty of good citizenship is to yield to laws for the preservation of order and the public weal, so must those who seek or depend on popular favor submit to public criticism of their performances. Nor is this altogether a personal question. The object of criticism is not to advance persons but ART. On this principle we endeavor to base all our judgments; but we fear in these our days, and on this continent in particular, this just view of the subject is completely lost sight of, and we feel the incongruous criticisms which appear in many of our contemporaries to be extremely unfortunate for the true progress of the Musical Art; especially as it is not difficult to trace to its source the cause of this misfortune;—the ignorance of those who undertake to criticize everything, and the prevalence of that insatiable thirst for puffing, instances of which are too common and recent to be noticed here. A true minded man must scorn most indignantly these little mean contrivances for gaining “a name;” and we are convinced artists, who are so innately, will not fear, nay, they will be much more likely to prize critiques founded on just appreciation and truth.

We have been led to make these observations, because we desire all our remarks hitherto, as well as those we may have occasion to make in future, to prove useful both to those criticised and to our readers generally. We do not, however, claim infallibility for our judgments; but as they are given in all sincerity of purpose, we do think that the failings we point out should be cheerfully accepted, with a view of overcoming them by practice and farther good instruction; and our readers by remarking where failings have been detected will be more likely to know when and how to bestow their commendations, than they have done of late. In fact this ought really to be the proper aim and end of criticism, to point out defects with a view of removing, or at least diminishing their force, else what advantage arises therefrom? Unmerited, or if even merited, unduly bestowed praise tends considerably to the depression of all high Art; and there are few, even with the most brilliant talents, in whom we may not detect a retrogradation, more or less apparent, where we have observed the many injudicious compliments heaped upon them. The reason is obvious: why need they farther trouble themselves when their talents are already so highly appreciated? The truth is, the most talented artists that have ever appeared, notwithstanding their justly earned reputation, are not always exempt from just and impartial criticism, but these being judiciously expressed have frequently proved beneficial; indeed it is but the most ignorant, and those least entitled to notice of any sort whatever, on whom such suggestions fail in effect, or produce improper impressions. Every day experience proves unquestionably that the greater progress we make in scientific studies, the more we see and feel what we still have to learn, and then it is we understand how truly “a little knowledge is a dangerous thing.” Did our self-confident aspirants for public applause only wisely consider their position, and remember that whatever the various political journals may say of them—(for, we say it in all due respect, how many of them are capable of speaking critically of musical matters?) it would be utterly absurd to believe for one moment they had actually realized the perfection they would have us believe they had arrived at. To entertain such exaggerated opinions would simply prove us ignorant of the whole nature of musical art. To believe all these journals from time to time put forth, how many Jenny Linds, Albonis, Tambourinis, Formes's, Thalbergs, ad infinitum, might we not find reason to boast of possessing! But all these attempts to play on the public credulity are transparent enough; they may deceive us for a time, but their unsubstantial character is soon perceived.

Whilst exercising a judicious and impartial tone of encouragement to deserving virtuosi, but still not losing sight of the defects they may exhibit, it is surely the province of the critic to discourage by every means in his power the presumption and over confidence of many who dare to palm themselves on the public as first-rate artists; who, in the case of vocal aspirants, having a voice of fair quality, or as likely no quality at all, but a “great deal of assurance, and a “little” knowledge, would fain delude us poor ignorant beings into the belief that they alone held the palm for the possession of all the natural and acquired talent that goes to produce the artist. They, alas, for art, are too often successful in their deception, but the duty of an uncompromising and conscientious critic is plain, and we trust, as information and intelligence in musical matters become more and more disseminated, to witness a vast improvement in the criticisms of our contemporaries. There is too much enslavement to interest—too little regard for that which constitutes the soul of true Art, and correct judgment.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Music.

.....The Dorian mood

Of flutes and soft recorders; such as raised
To height of noblest temper heroes old
Arming for battle; and instead of rage,
Deliberate valor breathed, firm and unmoved
With dread of death to flight or foul retreat;
Nor wanting power to mitigate or suage
With solemn touches troubled thoughts, and chase
Anguish and doubt and sorrow and fear and pain
From mortal or immortal minds.

Paradise Lost, i. 550.

The cultivation of the Fine Arts is a principal source of the superiority in positive enjoyment which the civilized man possesses over the savage. The refined pleasure, moreover, which a contemplation of their productions excites, is seldom unattended with generous impulse. The existence of most of them, however, is precarious and evanescent in the extreme. Like exotics, they require a genial atmosphere and fostering care. Their productions are for the most part rare and expensive, and demand for them appreciation, abundant leisure and cultivated taste; but their tendency has been too often to enervate as well as to refine.

But there is one whose genial influence is as common and as gladdening as the sunlight—life's grateful anodyne—a potent sympathy which lends itself to our pleasures, our sorrows, our divinest aspirations—the noblest art of man, the only art on earth which has its counterpart in heaven—and this is Music.

Of all the finer arts, Music can claim the highest antiquity and the most extensive prosecution. Its birth is almost coeval with that of mankind; and we cannot account for the knowledge which the immediate descendants of Adam possessed of it, but by supposing it to be, like language, a gift to humanity direct from the hands of the Deity. Unless, indeed, with the help of imagination, we suppose that, in the freshness of the infant world, before sin had encrusted the senses of man, Jubal, in the stillness of the eventide, attuned his harp to the dying notes of the far-off flutes of angels, as the loitering zephyrs bore along the “star-born melody.” Nor is this all a dream, for more than once since then the harmony of heaven has broke on mortal ears, as on the enraptured plains of Bethlehem;

“When Jordan hushed his waves, and midnight still Watched on the holy towers of Sion Hill.”

And Music would seem, even now, to preserve something of its divine origin. It awakens emotions and conjures up visions which no other power can summon, and it seems at times when the passions are still, to set in motion some hidden chords in the soul—chords which once beat in unison with the choirs of heaven, and which call up what seem like memories—memories of a sinless time, now gone forever. “It brings us near to the Infinite,” says Carlyle; “we look for moments across the cloudy elements into the eternal sea of light, when Music leads and inspires us. Philosophers of every age have borne testimony to its ameliorating influence on mankind. Plato, who excluded it from his ideal republic, elsewhere speaks of it in terms of the loftiest panegyric.

The sisters have often been prostituted to ignoble purposes, and have been largely employed in the services of the Romish Church, with little advantage to true piety. But Music is preëminently the handmaid of devotion. It has ever been in all ages the language of prophecy. With its aid Israel's prophet king poured forth his raptures, Jeremiah his lamentations, and the rescued people of the Lord danced in exultation on the shores of the Red Sea. Since its incorporation with the ceremonies of the Christian Church in the time of Constantine, it has been adopted by every Christian creed. Catholic and Protestant, Calvinist and Armenian have alike availed themselves of its divine inspirations; and in earlier times the old Gregorian chant bore through the portals of heaven the thanksgiving of the Christian pioneers. Now on the wings of Music was wafted to heaven the psalm of some lonely anchorite from the desert of the Thebaid; now the vespers of some holy sisterhood sequestered from the world; now swelling in organ tones through the dim aisles of some solemn cathedral; and now rising like a cloud of incense from some kneeling host on the slopes of the Grampian hills “Devotion borrows Music's tone,

And Music takes Devotion's wing,
And like the bird that hails the sun,
They soar to heaven, and soaring sing.”

How prolific of pleasure, how important in its relations to mankind, has been the union of Music and Poetry! How wide and beneficent the influence of the ballad and the song! The former was long the vehicle of tradition, and well it performed its office. For Music once impressed upon the memory is never forgotten. Circumstances, impressions, familiar scenes grow dim in the memory, but who ever forgets a once well known air? It may lie latent in the mind, but strike the chord, and it rises fresh as ever, and as it rises, brings with it a host of forgotten memories that had lain embalmed along with it.

The minstrel was the historian as well as the poet of the dark ages, and his character was everywhere held sacred. In the semi-barbaric time of chivalry, when little literature and little taste for it existed, the minstrel supplied in a measure its absence. He was welcome in every baronial hall. Every festival was graced by his presence, and its enjoyment enhanced by his art. Great must have been his influence in attempering that ferocity, which war naturally engenders, to the generous gallantry which distinguishes and redeems that melo-dramatic age. The gleeman of the Saxon, the Norman minstrel, the Celtic harper, and the bard of Wales are frequently conspicuous in English history. They exerted a resistless control over the minds of their countrymen. Edward the First knew this well, and he deemed the conquest of Wales incomplete till he had treacherously invited her bards to a banquet and massacred them all.

Little or nothing remains of the northern bards, unless we believe that Fingal lived and Ossian sang; but wandering minstrels of the south of Europe gave birth to modern lyric poetry. The troubadours did much to refine the languages of the South, and how deeply is their character imbued with the romantic hue which pervades the whole chivalric age.

Far superior to the feudal chiefs in intellectual attainments, to them must be ascribed in a great measure the transmission to the West of some of the refinements which still lingered about the Eastern Empire, when, returning from a life of adventure in the holy war, they chanted to the dames of the pleasant Provence, in that mellifluous old Romanesque, the deeds of their knights in Palestine.

Not only is Music coeval in birth with our race, but its diffusion has been co-extensive. Everywhere has it been employed for the same lofty purposes. It links the lowest type of humanity with the cherubim; it is that golden chain old Homer dreamed he saw suspending earth from the stars of heaven.

But how wide the compass, how endless the variety of nature's music! The choristers of the morning, "wedding their notes to the enamored air;" the gilded insects, winding their slender horns in the sultry air of noon; Philomel, with her thick-warbled notes, loading the evening breeze with melody; the pleasant gurgling of the brook, "making sweet music with the enamelled stones;" the sullen bass of the angry ocean forever lashing the resounding shore; the low sigh of the zephyrs dallying with the closing flowers; the plaintive wailing of the gale; the deep murmur of the forest as it fluctuates in the storm; the full diapason of the thunder. But shall we stop here? Does the harmony of nature cease, when the finite faculties of man no longer hear it? No;

"There's not the smallest orb which thou beholdest,
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubims;
But whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close us in, we cannot hear it."

When this fleshly garment which enshrouds the soul is laid in its parent earth, and the disembodied spirit seeks the empyrean, who can tell its ecstasies as it threads among the spheres? For round the throne on heaven's crystal floor the angelic hosts are singing, singing an immortal song. The listening stars re-echo the refrain. We cannot tell the name this bears in heaven; but long ago a faculty was implanted in the breast of man, by which he learned to assuage the miseries of his fallen state and hymn the praises of his Maker, and men have called it Music.

August 1, 1856. ***

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUG. 16, 1856.

Beethoven Literature.

(Concluded from last week.)

The last field, and one which has been wrought with diligence by none save Schindler, Prof. Jahn of Bonn, and our "Diarist," is that of the manuscripts relating to the composer—namely, his correspondence, his memorandum and conversation books. Beethoven seems to have been an industrious correspondent. The number of letters already in print, though scattered in all sorts of publications and very difficult to find, is very large. Many are in the hands of collectors; others, which are known to have existed, have thus far escaped the most careful search. As for memorandum books, a few are still in existence, useful for the dates they give, but of no great importance upon the whole. They are generally nothing but calendars, upon the blank spaces of which little matters of domestic occurrence are just noted.

The conversation books are of a different nature. It is well known that Beethoven so completely lost his hearing, that for many years before his death he carried with him a slate or a little blank book, in which those who wished to communicate with him wrote out their share in the conversation. Of these books, some of which are stitched by the bookbinder and contain probably a quire of paper, folded into a size convenient for the coat pocket, while others are nothing but a few sheets of paper doubled together, one hundred and thirty-eight (we think that is the number) are preserved. During the last twelve years of the master, Schindler was much with him, and enjoyed a very large share of his confidence. Carl Beethoven, the brother, died in 1815. Johann was much absent from Vienna, and when present by no means a congenial spirit. The nephew, son of Carl, was but a child when his father died, and thus Schindler became the person to whom the composer turned in all exigencies. After his death Beethoven's manuscripts fell into Schindler's hands and were carefully preserved. Several of his greatest works in their original scores, many sketches for future works, as well as for such as he had completed, and especially the conversation books, were excluded from the sale at auction of Beethoven's effects, and, with the consent of the few parties interested, transferred to Schindler. The conversation books were then many more in number than now. Schindler says, that upon examining them he found that very many of them could be of no possible use—that some ought not to be preserved, out of regard to Beethoven's memory and the feelings of living persons, and that, moved by these reasons, as well as by the inconvenience caused by their great quantity, he carefully went through them all and destroyed a part. In 1845, at the time of the inauguration of the statue at Bonn, the King of Prussia was induced to buy the papers in Schindler's hands, paying him a large sum down, and an annual pension so long as he lives, and thus they come into the Royal Library at Berlin.

Of the difficulty of the task of going through these books, no one who has not had some similar experience can form a conception. It is not an easy matter always to read old manuscripts in our familiar English. In this case, however, one has to study out the broken sense of common talk upon all sorts of subjects, from questions of philosophy, politics and history, down to the chat of the little nephew of Breuning's son, or the cramped phrases of the old housekeeper upon the important question, what she shall buy for dinner. All this, too, is written in German, in German handwriting, with lead pencil, thirty years ago.

Many of the books are dated by Beethoven's own hand; others can have their dates fixed only by some allusions generally to the pieces performed at the opera or at concerts, which enables one to find the date by consulting the periodicals of the day. In many cases, leaves have been torn out, and not seldom in the midst of conversations, which, after costing days of labor to study out, prove of no value because the last part is wanting. Schindler has annotated the books to some extent, and performed a good service by inserting very extensively the names of the writers. The great value of these books, seldom containing anything from Beethoven's own hand, of course, as he spoke in reply to what was written to him, is the intimate acquaintance one forms with the people who were most with the great master. Here one becomes familiarly acquainted with Moritz Lichnowsky, with the composer's brother and nephew, Schindler, von Breuning, Schuppanzigh, Haslinger, Blahetka, Holz, Dr. Bach, Bernard, the author of the text of the "Oratorium für Boston in Nord Amerika," Grillparzer, author of the text to "Melusina," which Beethoven was under agreement to compose, and so on. Sometimes we find a musical idea noted down. For instance, in a book dated 1819, it appears that Bernard, Peters, (a particular friend of Beethoven,) and the composer dine at an eating house together. They talk about borrowing some money for Beethoven, about how Carl, the nephew, is doing, whose conduct excites much anxiety in the mind of his uncle, and other such common topics. In the midst of the conversation, two pages are taken up, one by the waiter's bill for the dinner, and the other with the first idea of the "Et vitam venturi, Amen," of the great Second Mass.

Several visits of Fraulein Ungher, now Madame Sabbathier, appear; one of Sontag, and of others known to fame. Nothing but the strongest sentiment of duty could ever lead a man to wade through such an immense mass of useless matter in search of the scattered facts, which still to one person in thousands repay the labor. Yet it is simply ridiculous for any one to pretend to have really fitted himself to speak with authority upon the life of Beethoven who has not done this. Whoever has accomplished or shall accomplish the task, will find at last that his love and respect for the master as a man have increased tenfold, and that his opinion of Beethoven's Boswell—Schindler—has been raised. The whole history of the sorrows caused that devoted uncle by the ingratitude and shameless conduct of his nephew, his legally adopted son, is there written. The shame and mortification caused him by the foul lasciviousness of the widow of his brother Carl, and that of the wife of his brother Johann—a strumpet, whom Johann married and took to his house, with her illegitimate daughter, of whom he was not the father—all this is written in these books; poverty was nothing in comparison with the shame which Beethoven felt at the conduct of persons bearing his name, one which in his person was honored, pure and unsullied.

Many interesting sketches are scattered through recent German literature, depicting the impression made upon visitors by Beethoven. Rellstab, Rochlitz, Tomaschek, are names which occur to us in this connection, and especially Bertina von Arnim, whose letters to Goethe, too highly poetical for Schindler, seem to us worthy of full faith. Zelter also, in his correspondence with Goethe,

In the case of Mozart, we have a most minute history of his childhood and early years preserved in the family correspondence; but the means of tracing his life from day to day in his later years are not furnished us, as is the fact with Beethoven. What in addition to the sources of the biography of the latter already mentioned may be found by our "Diary" in Vienna, cannot be known at present. It is his wish and intention, to make personal examination there before many months elapse, and he hopes not only to find materials in print and manuscript not yet known to him, but also to find some few persons still left, who knew Beethoven and enjoyed his acquaintance.

Hints for Choirs.

To the Editor of Dwight's Journal of Music.

DEAR SIR:—Your paper having been highly recommended to me by a friend, I take the liberty of sending you a few lines. I attend church at —, and have become quite discouraged about musical matters. The choir of which I have had the charge of late, has met with all kinds of discouragements during the past eighteen months. And all the evils incident to such a state of things have followed in their turn. Relating my troubles to a friend, he thought that I might create a little interest by circulating a paper devoted to the science of music, and spoke very favorably of your sheet. If I can get a few specimen numbers for either "love or money," I shall not hesitate; but make a show as quick as possible. I have tried to find an agent, but have been unsuccessful in my attempt.

But as Editors like short letters and right to the point, I will bring this epistle to a close. If you will send me a few specimen numbers, or inform me where or how I can get them, I promise that they shall have fair play here. There is no paper of the kind taken anywhere within seven miles, that I am aware of. Please to send the "glad tidings" as quick as you can make it convenient, and "I hope you will credit my friendly intent,

And in kindness receive what in kindness was sent,"

By your bewildered, disheartened, and I trust will be most obedient servant,

P. S.—I hope you will pardon me for making you any more trouble, but I wish to ask a little advice. What book would you recommend to a choir of about a dozen members, all four parts being represented. There is no professor in the place; but we are left to grope our way in the dark, as often meeting the frown as the smile of those to whom we should look for encouragement. Most of us being in the prime of life, any advice from older and wiser heads would be very thankfully received. We now use the "Shawm."

REPLY.—It is very rarely the case that we are able to reply to private letters, owing to the numerous calls upon our time. We make an exception in your case because we are pleased with the spirit in which you write, and because we hope that our own experience and observation may be of some use to you. You ask some advice in relation to the choice of a new book. Before recommending any one, we wish to give you a few hints as to the reasons which influence us in our opinion, and to what is necessary on the part of singer before a really good book can be used to any advantage.

We call a really good book one in which there is real music. Real music expresses feeling and sentiment; and this feeling and sentiment is found either in melodic or harmonic effects, or in both. Some tunes are mere melodies, and harmony adds nothing but a support to the air. Others are little more than harmonies, and are good for just nothing unless all parts be properly balanced. Now-a-days it is much the fashion to fill up books with tunes all cut out by the same pattern, having a sort of sickly sentimentality, but no real deep feeling—all such books should be avoided.

Now, can your people read music? When they see the notes, do they feel at once what the notes mean? What the tones are which they represent? If not, we fear that any good music will be found difficult.

Are your people willing to come together and really study their music? Will they take their books home and sit down and study out tunes, as they studied arithmetic at school? If they will do this, you can have a good choir and soon get up such an interest in singing, that it will become one of the pleasures of the week to come together and practice. Here in Boston people meet together, who have had regular and thorough musical educations, and study their music, choruses and the like, week after week before they undertake really to sing the piece. Now are not your singers willing to study a little for the sake of the pleasure which is to come?

We think the best book for you is "The Ancient Lyre," published in this city. It is full of splendid old tunes and of very fine new ones by Charles Zeuner. But as so much of the effect of this music depends upon the harmony, it is necessary that your bass singers should be able to sing their part full, firmly and correctly;—so of your altos, your tenors, and above all your trebles. Your trebles must learn to open their mouths and throats and pour forth long-drawn, full tones. Can they do this? If a discord is introduced by the composer, the notes must be sung just as fully and distinctly as if all was in sweet concord, because the succeeding notes will be found always to be just so much the sweeter and more delicious as the preceding discord may seem to you harsh.

If you have good music and your choir once is able to sing it in full and firm tones, then music will become a delight and you will need fear no discouragements from others. So long however as you go hesitatingly to work, half singing easy tunes, so long you can have no real enjoyment. Oh, that all singers could know the glory of joining in the choruses of Handel's "Messiah," or Mendelssohn's "Elijah"—but this is music which cost weeks of practice even in such societies as the "Handel and Haydn" society of this city or the most famous ones in Europe. Good singing must be preceded by good study. All that join in, must do it with spirit and understanding.

Much of the music in the "Ancient Lyre" requires a free, bold, lively execution. It must go with spirit and energy. We know of no book in which joyous Christian feelings are so nobly expressed.—Here are the names of some of our favorites, "Missionary Chant," "Telemann's Chant," "Zeuner," "Seaman's Song," "Boston." Nor is plaintive, sweet music wanting; in fact, the variety of music is greater than in any other book.

Our paper is not devoted particularly to psalmody, but aims to make its readers familiar with what is going on in the highest regions of musical art, without however neglecting other departments. You will see in the specimens sent that we forward the paper regularly by mail for $2 per annum, in advance. Surely there ought to be at least one or two copies taken constantly in every choir and singing school or club throughout the land. If all cannot appreciate discussions of high Art, yet through the minds of the minority, the one or two even, who can, it may exert a wholesome influence. The fear of things too difficult, too high, too good for us, is what saps all the soul and nerve out of our education, especially in music. Something to promote earnest thought and study is much needed.

We forgot to say above, that of all fourpart music for practice, none is equal to the old German chorals, arranged by John Sebastian Bach, to bring a choir into the knowledge of the beauty of harmonic effects, and to teach the singers to pour out their voices in long, full, firmly drawn notes. In sacred music this is utterly indispensable. Those who cannot sing slow music well, can never be really successful in that which goes quick and should be sung with life and energy. *

Musical Chat-Chat.

Signor BADIALLI, the great baritone, after numerous premature announcements, has at length sailed for Europe by the steamer Persia, last week, from New York; so L'Eco di Italia informs us. He first left Bologna in August, 1849, for Havana, where he remained seventeen months a member of the Marti troupe; after which he came to the United States with that celebrated company, which numbered a Steffanone, a Bettini, Salvi, Marini, Vietti-Vertiprach, &c. Next he entered into a long engagement with Maretzek, since which he has sung with Jenny Lind, with Sontag, Parodi and Alboni and his last appearance was at the benefit night of the orchestra and chorus of the Academy of Music, when his Carlo Quinto in Ernani excited quite a frenzy of applause. It is said that he will return to America; and it need not be said he will be sure of the warmest welcome in Boston, as in the other cities, whenever that good time may come.

Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS gives a concert at Nahant this evening, assisted by that very sweet tenore, Mr. C. R. ADAMS, and by CARL HAUSE, pianist, and JUNGNIKKEL, violoncellist. Miss Phillips will sing Non più mesta, which she always does so brilliantly, the scena: Dio elemento, by Donizetti, a couple of English ballads, and the duet from Trovatore with Mr. Adams, who is set down for Donizetti's In terra solo, and a German song, Fecsa's "Wanderer." Mr. Hause will play one of Hummel's concertos, and Mr. Jungnickel a grand violoncello fantasia. It is the first thing in the shape of a concert which we have heard of for a long time.

The New York Musical Review asks: "Mr. Perkins has already had his ovation; when is Mr. Crawford to have his?" He always has it, and he always will, so long as the work shall stand to praise the master. The Review is so fond of barking at this old hole, that it would do well to read H. W. Beecher's "Dog Noble" story.... BORDONI, the great singing teacher in Paris, who taught Sontag, Cinti-Damoreau, and latterly our own Miss Hensler, has retired, after thirty-two years of service. PANOFFKA takes his place.... STRAKOSCH and PARODI are said to have cleared $100,000 by their concert tour, while LAGRANGE and GOTTSCHALK, OLE BULL, and all the other wandering stars have failed.... A niece of Mrs. SEGUIN, named Signora EUPRASIA PAREPA, is prima donna at the same theatre in Florence at which our Bis-CACCIANTI is engaged.... A new semi-monthly musical paper has made its appearance at Albany, N. Y., called the "Musical Gazette." It is a neat sheet of eight pages, one of which is devoted to music, and published by John P. Grafton at $1 00 per annum. This makes the fifth or sixth new musical journal which we have chronicled this summer. Pray do not fancy our success so great that you must all rush into the business!

The members of the Teutonia and Liederkrantz Musical Societies of New York, have made a pleasure-trip to Niagara, which passed off with great satisfaction to all concerned. The party, all Germans, numbered 160 persons, and left the city on Saturday week, reaching the Falls Sunday noon. Arrangements had been made for a concert on the Canada side on the following evening, but as the company stopped on the American side, they were anxious to return after the performance. The Captain of the little steamer Maid of the Mist, which runs up to the Horse-Shoe Fall and back daily, declined to cross the river after nightfall, but finally consented, and the Germans built bonfires on both sides of the river as guides and signals. It was probably the first time so large a company has crossed the Niagara River in the night. An afternoon concert was given by the societies, at which there was an immense attendance of German farmers, who came in by an excursion train to hear the music of Fatherland. In the evening, the company gave another musical entertainment at the Clifton House, at which Dodworth's famous band assisted. The concert over, the musicians started for the dock, where the fires were blazing. Those who witnessed the scene say the effect of the flames was very curious and fantastic; one of the number says the rugged rocks, the red glare, and the falling water, made up a view like that of the Wolf's Glen, as it should be seen in Der Freyschütz, only infinitely better than any stage scenery can hope to be. The whole party returned home in the best of health and spirits.

N. Y. Musical Review, Aug. 9.

Advertisements.

ORGAN CONCERTS.

Mr. GEO. W. MORGAN

WILL GIVE A

GRAND ORGAN CONCERT

On Wednesday Afternoon, Aug. 20th,

Commencing at 3½ o'clock, and a

SECOND GRAND ORGAN CONCERT

On Friday Evening, Aug. 22d,

Commencing at 8 o'clock, in the

TREMONT TEMPLE.

These Concerts will be in connection with the exercises of the BOSTON MUSICAL CONVENTION, which will commence its sessions in the Tremont Temple on Tuesday, Aug. 19th, and close on the succeeding Saturday evening.

Tickets for sale by J. K. HAYES, at the Superintendent's office of the Tremont Temple.

CALLCOTT'S MUSICAL GRAMMAR.

JUST PUBLISHED. A Musical Grammar, in four parts. I. Notation. II. Melody. III. Harmony. IV. Rhythm. By Dr. CALLCOTT.

The design of this work is to compress into a small volume the leading principles of practical music. From the analogy which exists between music and language, the author has adopted the classification first suggested by German theorists. He has endeavored by examples selected from the best authors to render the instructions more satisfactory than if they were merely verbal. By due attention to this volume, it is believed the student may obtain all that is necessary to discriminate between false and correct harmony, and to compose conformably to established rules. Price 75 cents.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

WANTED, a situation in a Boston Manufactory or Music Store, to learn the art of Tuning, by a person who has some theoretical knowledge of music.
Address "Stanhope," Charlestown, Mass.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC, (Imported from England) 389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY
FOR THE DIFFUSION OF
MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY:

VOLUME 7.

Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration,

Containing an exact tale of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $3.

VOLUME 8.

Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,

With the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering.—(Former price $5.25) In paper wrappers, $1.18. By mail, $1.20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

- | | |
|--|--------|
| Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue..... | $1 68 |
| " 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction..... | 1 68 |
| " 3. Fétils on Choir and Chorus Singing..... | 38 |
| " 4. Mozart's Succinct Thorough Bass School..... | 21 |
| " 5. Crotch's Treatise on Harmony..... | 68 |
| " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected Writings on Thorough Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-Instruction. | |
| Vol. 1. Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents. | |
| Vols. 2 and 3. Guide to Composition, 88c each. Three vols. bound in one complete, cloth boards..... | 2 68 |

J. A. NOVELLO,

Sacred Music Store, No. 389 Broadway, New York,
And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
ORGANIST OF ST. PAUL'S CHURCH,
ALBANY, N. Y.

Garcia's Complete School of Singing.

JUST PUBLISHED:—A Complete School of Singing. In which the Art is clearly developed in a series of Instructions and appropriate Examples, to which are added Exercises, written and composed by MANUEL GARCIA.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION

GRAND AND SQUARE

PIANO-FORTES,

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,

TREMONT STREET,

BOSTON.

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THIS beautiful Art novel, by Mme. GEORGE SAND, just completed in the Journal of Music, for which it was expressly translated, has been reprinted in a neat pamphlet, and may be had at this office, and at the periodical and book-stores. Price 15 cents. Copies sent by mail post-paid, for 18 cents.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'

PATENT AMERICAN ACTION

PIANO-FORTE,

Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,

MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 789 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.

NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,

TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.

Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,

RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,

TEACHER OF MUSIC,

365 Washington Street, Boston.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S

Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,

19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.

Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (125 lines) first insertion.....$12.50
Do do each subsequent.....$6.25
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payment required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 229.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 23, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 21.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 222 Washington St. "
"GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
"A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
"O. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
"SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
"GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
"G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
"JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
"MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
"W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
"W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
"HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Translated from the German for this Journal.]

The Life and Characteristics of Beethoven.

BY DR. HEINRICH DÜRING.

(Continued from page 155.)

In singular contrast with his suffering condition was the humor which prevailed in some of Beethoven's letters in the first part of his life in Vienna. These letters were addressed to the kapellmeister Hofmeister, in Leipzig, who at that time, (1800) under the firm: "Hofmeister & Kühnel, Bureau de Musique," had commenced a correspondence with Beethoven. This correspondence adds an interesting contribution to the characteristics of Beethoven, who at that time, fired with restless activity, stood in the full bloom of his creative genius.

In a letter to Hofmeister, dated Dec. 15, 1800, Beethoven excused his delay in answering: "I am," wrote he, "extremely lazy as a correspondent; it takes a long time before I can bring myself to writing dry letters instead of notes. But now I have at length compelled myself to give you satisfaction. Pro primo, you must know, it pains me very much that you, my dear brother in musical Art, did not inform me earlier, so that I might have offered you my Quartets, as well as many other things, which I have now disposed of; and if my brother is as conscientious as many other honorable engravers (in German, Stecher, or prickers), who prick us poor composers to death, he would know how to find his account in publishing them. I will briefly state what the Herr Bruder may obtain of me. 1. A Septet per il Violino, Viola, Violoncello, Contrabasso, Clarinetto, Corno, Fagotto—tutti obbligati; for I can write nothing that is not obligato, inasmuch as I came into the world with an obligato accompaniment. 2. A Grand Symphony for full orchestra. 3. A Concerto for the piano, which to be sure I do not give out as one of my best, since I keep the best for myself until I make a journey. Yet it can do you no discredit to engrave this Concerto. 4. A grand Solo Sonata. This is all that I can produce at present. A little later you can have a Quintet for string instruments, and perhaps some quartets and other things, which I have not by me now. In your answer you can yourself fix the price, and since you are neither Jew nor Italian, nor I either, we shall readily agree."

Four weeks later, Jan. 15, 1801, Beethoven wrote to Hofmeister: "Right heartily I thank you for the good opinion which you have conceived of me and of my works, and I often wish I could deserve it. I rejoice in your undertakings, and I wish, if Art can be the gainer, that this gain might rather accrue to the genuine, true artists, than to mere traders in the art. Your design of publishing Sebastian Bach's works is something that really does my heart good, which beats entirely for the high, great Art of this great father of harmony. I hope, as soon as we shall hear the golden peace announced, to contribute to the undertaking much from here myself, if you take subscribers."

Beethoven's character shows an amiable side in this letter, through its disinterestedness. "As regards our own private business," he writes, "I make you, since you desire it, the following offers: For the Septet 20 ducats; the Symphony the same; the Concerto 10 ducats; grand Solo Sonata, Allegro, Adagio, Minuetto, Rondo, 20 ducats; this Sonata has washed itself, (is comme il faut), my dear brother. You will wonder, perhaps, that I make no difference here between the Sonata, Septet and Symphony. Because I find that a Septet or a Symphony has not so much sale as a Sonata; therefore I do this, although a Symphony should unquestionably be worth more. I set the Concerto down at only 10 ducats, because, as I have already written, I do not consider it as one of my best. I do not think that this will seem exorbitant to you, taking the whole together. At least I have tried to put the prices as moderate as possible to you. The whole sum would be 70 ducats for all my works. I understand no other currency but the Vienna ducat; how many thalers of your money that will make I know not, since I am a wretched negociant and accountant. If the sour business were only settled! I call it so, because I wish it might be different in the world. There ought to be a magazine of Art, where the artist would only have to hand in his works of art, to take what he needs. But as it is, one has to be half merchant, and how ill at home one feels in it! Good God! that is what I call sour."

In a letter to Hofmeister, 22d April, 1801, Beethoven excused his long silence on the ground of his sickness and his excess of business. He writes: "It was scarcely possible even to think what I had to send to you. It is perhaps the only genius-like thing about me, that my things are not always in the best order; yet no one but myself can help the matter. Thus, for instance, in the score of the Concerto, the piano part, according to my custom, was not written, and I have but just now written it out, so that you have it in my own, not indeed very legible handwriting."

In this same letter he wrote: "The arrangement of the Mozart Sonata as a Quartet will do you honor, and will certainly remunerate. I could wish that I were able to contribute more myself on such occasions here, but I am an irregular man, and with the best will I forget everything. But I have here and there spoken of it, and find the best inclination towards it. It would be a nice thing, if the Herr Bruder, besides publishing the Septet, would also arrange the same for flute, for example, as Quintet. That would help the flute amateurs, who have already assailed me on the subject, and they would swarm around it and feed on it like insects. F— has presented us with a production, which does not correspond with the ideas the newspapers gave us of him. He seems to have made Casperle* his ideal, but without reaching him. Fine prospects these, under which we poor children of men here have to grow up!"

In a later letter, June, 1801, Beethoven, not without feeling, vindicated himself against a groundless accusation, which had cast an ambiguous light upon his thoroughly upright character. "I am a little astonished," he writes to Hofmeister, "at the message you have sent me through your business agent here. I might almost feel offended that you hold me capable of such a shabby trick. It would be another thing, if I had only sold my works to money-making traders, and had then made secretly another good speculation. But between artist and artist, it is rather severe to impute such a thing to me. The whole thing seems to me either entirely an invention, to try me, or else a mere suspicion. At all events I hereby inform you, that, before you had the Septet of me, I sent it to Herr Salomon in London, to play at his concert, purely out of friendship, cautioning him at the same time not to let it go into other hands, because I intended to have it printed in Germany; you can ask Salomon himself, if you think it necessary. But to give you one more proof of my integrity, I hereby assure you that I have sold the Septet, the Concerto, the Symphony and the Sonata to no one in the world but you, and that you can formally regard them as your own exclusive property, for which I pledge my honor. You can make use of this assurance in any way you will. Moreover, I believe Salomon was as little capable of the shabby trick of getting the Septet printed, as I was of selling it to him. I am so conscientious, that I have refused to several publishers the piano arrangement of the Septet, for which you had asked me. I have also written to Salomon. But since I esteem your charge a mere report, which you caught up a little too credulously, I cannot close this letter otherwise than with some coldness towards so credulous a friend."

* Jack-Pudding.

A humorous letter was received by the friend, with whom Beethoven was soon reconciled, on the 8th November 1802. "Does the devil ride you altogether?" wrote Beethoven. "To propose to me to make such a Sonata! In the time of the revolutionary fever that might have been something! But now, when everything seeks to shove itself upon the track again, when Buonaparte has concluded the Concordat with the Pope—such a Sonata now! If it were a Missa pro Sancta Maria, a tre voce, or a Vesper, &c., why then I would take at once my pencil in hand, and with great pound notes write away at a Credo in unum. But, good God, such a Sonata in these newly commencing Christian times! Ho! ho! There, let me off, there can nothing come of it! Now for my answer in the quickest tempo! The lady can have a Sonata of me; also in an æsthetic regard in general I will follow her plan. For the price of five ducats she can keep the same for herself, for her own enjoyment, and neither she nor I shall publish the Sonata. After the expiration of a year it becomes mine again; i. e. I can and shall publish it, and the lady can, if she thinks she can find any honor in it, be asked to let me dedicate the work to her. How gladly would I give many things away! But only consider, friend, everything about me here is established, and knows precisely what it lives upon. But, good God, where will one establish such a parvum talentum com ego at the imperial court?"

The humor which prevails in this letter of Beethoven, gave way again not seldom to a high degree of irritability, which had its chief ground in his oft returning physical sufferings. It was about this time (1802), that he had completed, at Heiligenstadt, a village a mile and a half out of Vienna, his third Symphony, known under the title of Sinfonia Eroica. He often in his compositions thought of a definite object, although he used to laugh and scold about musical painting, especially the minuter sort. Even acknowledged masterpieces, such as Haydn's "Creation," and his "Seasons," were not spared in his censure; while at the same time he did not deny the great talent of Haydn, and gave him the deserved praise in his choruses. In the third Symphony he had in mind Buonaparte, while he was yet first Consul. He had an excellent idea of him then, and compared him with the greatest Roman Consuls. The Symphony lay written out in score upon his table. At the top of the title page stood the word "Buonaparte," and at the bottom "Luigi van Beethoven," but not a word more. Whether the intervening space was to have been filled out, and how, was quite unknown to Beethoven's friends. of them brought him the news that Buonaparte had allowed himself to be proclaimed Emperor. Then Beethoven became furious and exclaimed: "Is he, too, nothing but an ordinary man? Now he, too, will trample all human rights under his feet, and be the slave of his ambition; he will seek now to place himself higher than all others, and will become a tyrant." With these words Beethoven seized the title leaf of his Symphony, which lay upon the table, tore it asunder, and threw it on the floor. The first page was re-written and received the title: Sinfonia Eroica. Some time afterwards the Prince Lichnowsky in Vienna bought this Symphony of the composer, for his own use for some years. It was performed several times in his palace. It was there that Beethoven, who himself directed, once in the second part of the first Allegro, where there occur so many half notes, brought the whole orchestra so out of time, that they were obliged to commence the Symphony anew.

On the same evening Beethoven played a Piano Quintet, composed by him, with accompaniment of wind instruments. The celebrated oboist, Ram, from Munich, took part in it, and accompanied Beethoven's playing. In the last Allegro, at a pause before the theme commenced again, he took it into his head suddenly to improvise. He took the Rondo for a theme, and entertained himself and the listeners for a considerable time. But not so those who accompanied the piano-playing. They were in great perplexity. It was a ludicrous sight, when they, expecting every moment that he would begin again, put their instruments to their mouths, and then quietly took them away again. At length Beethoven was satisfied. He fell into the Rondo again. The whole company were in raptures.

When the Russian imperial kapellmeister Steibelt, who died at St. Petersburg in 1823, came after a somewhat lengthy stay in Paris to Vienna, Beethoven's friends were anxious lest that then highly celebrated composer might damage the reputation he had acquired. Steibelt did not visit him. They met for the first time one evening at the house of Count Fries, where Beethoven produced a new Trio in B flat major for piano, clarinet and violoncello. Steibelt listened to it with a sort of condescension, and paid the composer a few compliments. Thereupon he played a Quintet of his own composition, improvised, and produced particularly a great effect by his tremulandos, which at that time were something quite new. Beethoven could no longer be induced to play. With equal success Steibelt a week later performed a Quintet in a concert at Count Fries's. He had studied out a brilliant Fantasia, and had chosen for a theme Beethoven's Trio. That excited his admirers and himself. He had now to go to the piano, and to improvise. As he passed along he took with him the violoncello part of Steibelt's Quartet, placed it bottom upwards on the desk, and with one finger drummed out a theme for himself from the first bars. Wounded and excited, he improvised so, that Steibelt, before he had ended, left the hall, and would never meet him afterwards; indeed, he made it a condition, before going anywhere, that Beethoven should not be invited.

Nothing crossed Beethoven more, than to have something go wrong in the performance of his works. Then he gave himself up to an irritability that knew no bounds. In a grand concert in the theatre at Vienna, where, besides his "Pastoral Symphony," a Fantasia of his for piano, orchestra and chorus was performed, the clarinetist in the variations of the concluding theme made by mistake a repetition of eight bars. Beethoven sprang up in a rage, and covered the members of the orchestra with loud invectives. Finally he cried out: "From the beginning!" The theme began again. They all fell in rightly, and the result was brilliant. But when the concert was over, the artists remembered the honorable titles which Beethoven had given them, and swore that they would never play again, if he was in the orchestra. But this lasted only until he again came forward with a new composition, when the curiosity of the musicians got the better of their anger.

How easily offended Beethoven was, was shown by his relations to a man to whom he owed a great part of his musical education. Mozart, Handel and Bach were his favorites. If anything lay upon his desk, it was sure to be compositions of one of these masters. On the contrary, he had always something to object to Haydn's music. It was for the most part a private grudge against that artist, dating from an earlier period. Beethoven's first attempt in composition was the three Trios before mentioned. They were to have been produced in a soirée at Prince Lichnowsky's, and several artists and dilettanti had been invited, among them Haydn, on whose judgment all depended. The trios were played, and produced a remarkable sensation. Haydn said some flattering things to the composer, but advised him not to publish the third Trio, in C minor. Beethoven had regarded this Trio as his best. Haydn's words, therefore, made a very unpleasant impression on him. He thought that Haydn was envious, and jealous of his reputation, and that he was not candid with him. In this he was mistaken. Haydn had dissuaded him from the publication of this Trio merely because he thought it was not so easy, and would not be so quickly understood as the others.

In spite of all the representations of his friends, Beethoven was so unalterable in his dislike to Haydn, that he one day said he had learned nothing from him. From Albrechtsberger, as we have before said, he had received instruction in Counterpoint, and from Salieri in dramatic composition. Both agreed that he was often wilful and ill-humored. They maintained that he had had to learn many things through his own bitter experience, which he had formerly held of small account as matters of instruction. The introduction to dramatic composition, which Salieri gave him, after the taste of the Italian school, could not of course satisfy him.

[To be continued.]

Vivier.

[Concluded from p. 155.]

But let us endeavor to make Vivier better understood by a slight description of his personal appearance and character.

He is of the middle size, with a high and expansive forehead, and marked features. The regularity of the latter would entitle him to pass for a "joli garçon," were not his physiognomy manly and energetic. His complexion denotes strength, while the peculiar texture of his skin announces unusual susceptibility. But to balance this nervous organization he has great muscular power. He can, therefore, feel deeply without being enervated; hence his extraordinary sang-froid.

His vision is weak, although he is quick at perceiving details. He takes no interest in painting, but the fine susceptibility of his ear is remarkable. He knows every sound and its slightest variation. He protests, indeed, that the gradations of sounds represent to his mind colors and their various tints. He can hear from a long distance, and frequently astonishes by repeating every word of a conversation maintained a long way off. His musical memory, in so far as it regards his own works, is prodigious, but in respect to those of others mediocre. His vocal organ is wonderfully supple, and, as he has the faculty of imitation to an extraordinary degree, nothing is easier for him than to make you believe that he speaks and sings in German, Italian, English, modern Greek, Arabic, etc., etc.

Intellectually, Vivier's perceptive (artistic) faculties carry him on to the reflective (philosophical). Thus he loves to view life as it presents itself at the moment. He feels the desire to extract from every stone on the roadside the electric spark. Rarely does his imagination bury itself in the past or wander into the future.

Like many rich in their own resources and gifted with great spontaneity, Vivier reads but little. He is not learned, but he has an instinct for most things. With his delicate, susceptible and peculiar organization, he feels most deeply. He is unapproachable as an improvisator. Melodies, dramatic scenes, caricatures, flow from him as water from a spring.

Thus, when he is among those who can appreciate him, he becomes brilliant as a diamond, and shines pre-eminently. He attracts as if by enchantment, with melodies serious and melancholy, elegant and dramatic, ideal and real, at the same time fresh and tender, comic and terrible, which, sung with perfect expression, make happy hours pass quickly away, although the recollection of them is retained for ever.

It is only in such moments of inspiration that we can obtain anything like a complete idea of his rich and powerful artistic mind.

Vivier has composed a great deal, but much of what he has written is not only unpublished and unknown to the public, but even unwritten. It bubbles in his head by the side of a thousand precious seeds that favorable circumstances alone can germinate (!) But where is the Shakspeare, to write a poem for such a strange musician? Vivier would require a plot as eccentric and complex as himself—the fanciful and the dramatic, the real and the ideal, mingled together at random, so as to give free vent to all his imagination. If Vivier would, he could write both the music and the libretto of an opera. It is, indeed, a pity that the light of such a genius should remain for ever hidden. In vain Rossini, who loves him for his gaiety, esprit, and talent, which the grand maestro appreciates better than any one—in vain Rossini says to him, "Take your place, it is waiting for you—en avant!" Perhaps the fruit is not yet ripe. We must believe so, for Vivier has in him a store of melodies, original, fine, expressive, and tender, and a mine of harmony hitherto unknown. If it was not necessary to spoil so much paper in the composition of an opera—if it could only be improvised!

Vivier, we have said, is gifted with the faculty of perception. Nevertheless, his reflective faculty tempers his energetic activity, so that the excessive delicacy of his nature is equalized by his physical power. (Literal translation!) He would otherwise be less strong, less profound, and comprehend less accurately so many various subjects.

In his double capacity of artist and philosopher, Vivier has a horror of the ordinary cares of life, of those miserable pettinesses that take away from the poetry of existence. This feeling is so strong in him, that he often passes whole days in bed with nothing to trouble him, in order that he may pursue his reflections at his ease. Thus he has twenty portmanteaus which he never opens, but makes use of as chairs or tables in the absence of such necessary articles. The ordinary pursuits of life have no value in his eyes, since he sees too clearly their emptiness. To be provident, to have a motive, to dull his spirits, enslave his intellect, and gain nothing but meagre and uncertain rewards, is not for Vivier, but for fools (sic). Men, and the incidents of their lives, affect him much in the same way as the atoms that dance in the rays of the sun. He knows them all—from the highest to the lowest, from the cottage to the palace; with every link in the social system he is familiar: great and small, handsome and ugly, strong and weak; kings and porters, high-born ladies and lowly maidens—what are they but dust!

Against reflections of this gloomy kind, he has but one refuge—melody! Vivier composes music for his own pleasure, listens to it, studies, invents, sings to himself all night in the solitude of his garret.

But no—he has, at least, one live companion—a pigeon, a game cock, or some bird that he has tamed wonderfully, and taught to be strange, amusing, and sentimental. Being little contemplative, he absolutely requires something living to be always about him. Thus, his nervous system becomes soothed, and he can resign himself to thought.

One day he took it into his head that it would be more agreeable, and at the same time instructive, to have a rattlesnake for a companion. Death on a journey from the bite of a serpent appeared to this singular nature a climax sufficiently eccentric; but I am bound to add that he gave up both the idea and the rattlesnake, which is now the property of the Jardin des Plantes.

Although Vivier does not think much of the value of life, of which he knows the hollowness, although he does not hold poor humanity in much esteem, he is nevertheless no misanthrope. On the contrary, he loves his family, is always thinking of its welfare, and has often rendered great services to those who have solicited his aid. He writes letters and transacts business to oblige others, although on his own account he dislikes attending to such uninteresting matters. For those who know him, this is a strong proof of the excellence of his heart. He is very susceptible to kindness, and this feeling has more power over him than he is inclined to confess.

To sum up, Vivier is morally of a nature quite Shakspearian. He possesses at the same time, in a high degree, the sentiment of the real and the ideal. That is the secret of the peculiarity of his compositions, where melancholy, elegance, and tenderness are united to thoughts both serious and profound; and also of his marvellous eccentricities, in which nature seems suddenly seized at its most salient and showy point (sic). There is in Vivier something both of Beethoven and Rabelais. He is a composer of the highest rank, and yet on the other hand he must be called l'Empereur des Farces, as was quaintly said of him by a domestic, whom he was continually making die with laughter or with fear.

Every body knows the spirit, the verve, the extraordinary imagination of Vivier; but few are aware that if he would only take the trouble, he might soon gain the reputation of a charming, spirituel, humorous, and philosophical writer. In a corner of one of his numerous portmanteaus (to Vivier, life is really a journey; he is always ready to set out) are to be found pages of manuscripts written while travelling in England, pages that recall Sterne, and would very strongly, we think, throw in shade even the Sentimental Journey of the English humorist. Will Vivier ever publish this little volume? "What would be the use of it?" he says. A retort which appears to us an example of indifference on his part, of which we did not think him capable. Let us, however, not despair.

We were about to forget an essential feature in Vivier's character—his perfect independence. Neither glory, fortune, nor woman, can make a slave of him. It is not that he is insensible to the charms of women, to the delights of hearing delicate and merited praise, even to the pleasure of having money in his pocket; nor, above all, to shine in social life, and exhibit his wonderful gifts to advantage. On the contrary; but Vivier is so full of life that he passes through it like a stream that flows beneath the canopy of heaven (sic), and feels so intense a luxury in liberty, that the slightest restraint becomes odious in his eyes.

Another characteristic feature in Vivier is that he possesses the "gift" of familiarity—not of that silly and impertinent familiarity which is always disagreeable, but of a familiarity which is delightful because it is attractive. He makes himself at home immediately, and with equal grace with a child and a king, M. Prudhomme, Rossini, or Lamartine—a high-born lady or a peasant girl—a cat or a bird—these, so different in character from each other, feel themselves directly at ease with him. It is because he understands and sympathizes with them all—thanks to his universal and brilliant nature; it is because he is always master of himself—thanks to the happy balance of his faculties.

To conclude, Vivier is so gifted by nature, that he should be called a magician. He pleases, he amuses, he raises you from the earth and transports you to the regions of imagination; he makes you happy; his witchcraft is so perfect that he influences in the same degree the man of genius and the child,—the weak and the strong. It is sufficient to have eyes and ears, and Vivier is sure to have you at some point.

We expect that some of our readers will say, "This is all enthusiasm and blind prejudice." To such we answer—"You must see to believe." We shall be greatly deceived if any who have ever been in company with Vivier, say we have exaggerated or passed the bounds of a just appreciation.

I own that I admire Vivier—that I like him immensely; but I like truth still more, and would not willingly wrong one or the other.

EDWARD DE POMPERY.

Mozart's Autograph Manuscripts.

(Extract from a letter addressed to "La France Musicale.")

The autograph manuscripts of Mozart are in possession of the brothers André, one of whom is an editor of music at Offenbach, another a manufacturer of pianos at Frankfort, and the third professor and composer at Berlin.* The collection of manuscripts formerly at Offenbach is at present at Frankfort, in the possession of the manufacturer. A descriptive and thematic catalogue has been printed, and I have now before me a copy given me by the brothers André, with particulars of 280 manuscripts. This, however, does not contain all that Mozart wrote. Neither the score of the Nozze di Figaro, nor that of the Entführung aus dem Serail, nor that of the Requiem, is included. The last is preserved in the imperial library of Vienna. Nor do we find the symphony in E flat, the finest of the quartets, nor any of the quintets for two violins, two tenors, and violoncello, except the one in C, in which the violoncello begins the motivo. The six quartets, dedicated to Haydn, besides some others, were at the beginning of this century in possession of Mr. Stumpf, harp manufacturer, of London. After his death, they were sold by auction, and the quartets, inscribed to the Father of the Symphony, were knocked down for the moderate sum of £6 sterling.

Beneath is the list of the operas, the scores of which are comprised in M. André's collection. I give both the titles and the notes, which are in the hand-writing of Mozart's father:

No. 29 of the Catalogue. Apollo and Hyacinthus—a Comedy in Latin (with music), for the University of Salzburg. On the title page of the score, in Mozart's handwriting, is "Di Wolfgang Mozart, producta 13 May, 1767." He was then eleven years old.

No. 30.—Bastien et Bastienne—a German opera in one act. On the manuscript, in the handwriting of Mozart's father—"Di Wolfgang Mozart, 1768, nel suo 12° anno."

No. 31.—La Finta Semplice—an Italian opera in three acts. On the manuscript Mozart has written—"Di Wolfgang Mozart, 1768."

No. 32.—Mitridate—an opera in three acts, composed for the Milan Theatre. The Manuscript of this opera is incomplete, and just as it was found after the death of Mozart.

No. 33.—Ascanio in Alba—action théâtrale. On the first page of the manuscript Mozart has written, "Del Signor Cavaliere Amadeo Wlfg. Mozart."

No. 34.—Il Sogno di Scipione—action théâtrale de

* Mr. Gustav André, of the music-publishing firm of G. André & Co., Philadelphia, is also one of the brothers.—ED.

Métastase. Written in March, 1772, at Salzburg, for the nomination of the Archbishop Jérôme.

No. 35.—Lucio Silla—an opera in three acts, composed at Milan for the Carnival of 1773. Mozart has written on the title—"Lucio Silla, dramma per musica del Signor Cavaliere Amadeo Wolfgang Mozart. Academico di Bologna e di Verona, nel carnovale, 1773 (Milano)."

No. 36.—La Finta Giardiniera—an opera in three acts. The first act is wanting. The author has written on the title page of the second act, "La Finta Giardiniera, atto 2, del Signor Amadeo Wolsf. Mozart." It is noticed that under the Italian words of all the airs, Mozart has added a German translation.

No. 37.—Il Re Pastore—a dramatic cantata in two acts. On the title page, in Mozart's writing, "Del Signor Cavaliere Amadeo Wolfgang Mozart, a Salisburgo, 1775."

No. 38.—Zaide—a melodramatic opera in two acts.

No. 39.—Idomeneo—an opera in three acts.

No. 40.—Airs de Ballets pour Idomeneo. These airs have remained unpublished to this day. M. André intends to publish them immediately, arranged as duets for the pianoforte.

No. 41.—Lo Sposo Deluso, ossia la Rivalita di tre Donne per un solo amante—an opera in two acts, left unfinished by Mozart.

No. 42.—L'Oca del Cairo—a comic opera, of which only the first act remains. The opera has eight characters (four sopranis, two tenors, and two basses), and was, as well as the one preceding, written by Mozart, at Salzburg, in 1783.

No. 43.—Der Schauspieler Director—a comedy with music for the palace of Schönbrunn. Mozart has written on the title page—"Di Wolfgang Amadeo Mozart."

No. 44.—Don Giovanni—an opera in two acts.

No. 45.—Così fan tutte—an opera in two acts.

No. 46.—Zauberflöte—an opera in two acts.

No. 47.—La Clemenza di Tito—an opera in two acts. Several pieces of this score were wanting, when M. André obtained the manuscripts of Mozart.

About the year 1800, the father of the Messrs. André, a music publisher and composer, bought this important collection of Mozart's widow. Since that period they remained intact in the family; but a short time ago M. Streicher, of Vienna, who had married a daughter of Antoine André, by whom he had children, asserted his right to a part of the manuscripts, and chose for his share the score of Don Giovanni, and some other works of less importance. M. Pauer, a relation of the Streichers, about a year since, brought the score of Mozart's chef-d'œuvre to London; and successively offered it to the Queen of England, and the British Museum, but without success. An eminent artiste (Mme. Viardot Garcia) showed a better appreciation of its value, and purchased it for £200.

The catalogue of autograph manuscripts possessed by M. André contains 28 masses, litanies, etc. Nearly all these compositions are dated. The oldest is dated 1776. Mozart was then ten years of age. Several are dated 1776. One, and that is the latest, 1783, viz., the Mass of which Mozart afterwards took several pieces for his cantata of Davidde Penitente. I did not find the well-known Ave Verum; but we can see by a thematic catalogue in Mozart's handwriting, which includes all his compositions from the year 1784 to his death, that this was one of his latest productions. Independent of the operas of which I have given the names, the catalogue comprises about forty scenes, arias, duos, trios, quatuors, and choruses—the greater part of which were intended by Mozart to be interpolated in his own operas, or in those of other composers. For example, the quatuor and the trio, composed at Vienna, in 1785, for the Villanella Rapita, an opera in which the famous Céleste Coltellini sang—the prima donna for whom Paisiello wrote the part of Nina. Several of these morceaux bear the names of the singers for whom they were composed in the handwriting of Mozart. Among them are Fortini, Palmiini; the tenors, Raff and Adamberger; Signora Storace; the basso, Fischer; and on two arias (Nos. 74 and 76 of the catalogue), Signora Weber, Mozart's wife's sister. The first of these is dated Mannheim, the 24th February, 1778; the second, Munich, the 8th January, 1779. Another aria (No. 58 of the catalogue) contains the following, in Mozart's writing—"Il Curioso indiscreto, atto primo; per la Signora Lange. Vienna, il 20 di Giugno, 1783." Thus we find Mlle. Weber, sister of Constance Weber, the wife of Mozart, became Madame Lange—under which name she gained great celebrity as a singer. No. 87 in the catalogue, is another soprano aria, written at Vienna, in 1788, for the same Signora Lange.

Numbers 102 to 130 of the catalogue of Mozart's autograph manuscripts, consist of twenty-eight symphonies and one overture. The greatest number were written in the early youth of the composer. No. 102 is dated London, without naming the year, but it is known that Mozart was about eight when, after first visiting Paris with his father and sister, he repaired to the capital of England. No. 103 is dated La Haye, in the month of December 1765. I have already stated that the symphony in E flat was not in the catalogue; but the symphonies in G minor and in C with the fugue (Jupiter) are both there, as well as the symphony in D, which Mozart wrote at Paris in 1778 for the Concerts Spirituels. I shall not go into details about all the pieces in this interesting catalogue, but confine myself to those upon which the great musician has himself commented.

The first is 205, a concerto for the piano in G. The manuscript tells us that Mozart completed this at Vienna on the 12th April 1784, and that it was composed for the Signora Barbara Hoyer, no doubt an artist, or, at least, an amateur, of distinction. No. 226 is a sonata in C, for piano and violin, which is well known. This, Mozart informs us, was composed at Mannheim, and finished March 11th, 1778, for Mademoiselle Thérèse Pierron. No. 253 is an andante in C, for flute, with an accompaniment for two violins, alto, basso, two hautbois, and two horns, a copy of which I procured from Germany some years ago for M. Dorus, who introduced it at the Société des Concerts of the Conservatoire. I recollect that at the time a few wisacres in the orchestra denied that this morceau was composed by the author of Don Juan, or that it was written for the flute at all.

Nor 265 is a concerto for the horn, with orchestral accompaniments. The virtuoso who first attempted to play this composition must have been anything but a good player, since he seems to have excited the anger of Mozart, who has written a number of significant remarks on the manuscript. For example, at the beginning of the solo "A lei signor asino," "Animo," "Presto, su via," "da bravo," "Coraggio," and at the end "Grazia al Ciel! basti."

No. 257 is another concerto for the horn. On the manuscript is written "Wolfgang Amadé." Mozart has taken compassion on Leitgab, as, ox (ochs) and madman, at Vienna, 27th May, 1783. No. 259 is a concerto for harp and flute, with an accompaniment for two violins, two altos, two hautbois, and two horns, composed by Mozart during his sojourn in Paris (1778), for the Duc de Guines and his daughter.

The valuable collection of MM. André is shut up in a press divided into two compartments, and the manuscripts are in two species of portfolios. I examined with religious attention that of the opera of Idomeneo. It is on paper in the Italian fashion, of a rather large size, and consists of three volumes, stitched in boards, covered with variegated red paper. The whole work is in a fine hand, and there are but few notes erased or interlineated. The whole had been to all appearances thoroughly elaborated in Mozart's head, and afterwards put down on paper without the slightest hesitation. It is well known that anciently, on the Italian stage, the simple recitative was accompanied by a harpsichord, a violoncello, and a double bass, the performers upon which lead off from the score; it was to render this accompaniment the more easy that Mozart has throughout the whole opera written the bass part in larger notes.

Among the manuscripts which, at my request, M. André was good enough to show me, I will again refer to that of the famous symphony in G minor. It is on Italian paper, and the writing presents the signs of great rapidity of execution. The bars which run up and down the page are made without the slightest regard to the perpendicular. Mozart does not seem to have taken the trouble to mend his pen, for the notes are much less elegant in form than in other manuscripts, and the strokes of the tails are somewhat thick. One might suppose that this chef-d'œuvre had been extemporized. The learned professor Schnyder von Wartensee, whose reception of me was most amiable, was kind enough to communicate two important observations to me on the manuscript of this admirable symphony, and I was able to convince myself of their exactitude by examining, with my own eyes, the autograph of Mozart.

Here is a long affair about a catalogue, you will perhaps observe, and with reason; but you will agree that one has not always a Mozart to do with, and all that relates to so great a man is fraught with interest. One loves to follow him in the smallest details of his artist's life, and even in the details of his private life, which may sometimes assist in comprehending so rare an organization.

The Organ.

BY HECTOR BERLIOZ.

The organ seems able—like the pianoforte, and even still better—to present itself in the instrumental hierarchy, under two aspects—as an instrument belonging to the orchestra, or as being in itself a complete and independent orchestra. It is doubtless possible to blend the organ with the divers constituent elements of the orchestra; and it has even been many times done; but it is strangely derogatory to this majestic instrument, to reduce it to this secondary condition. Moreover, it should be felt that its smooth, equal, and uniform sonorousness never entirely melts into the variously characterized sounds of the orchestra, and that there seems to exist between these two musical powers a secret antipathy. The organ and the orchestra are both kings; or rather one is emperor, the other pope; their mission is not the same, their interests are too vast, and too diverse, to be confounded together. Therefore, on almost all these occasions, where this singular connection is attempted, either the organ much predominates over the orchestra, or the orchestra, having been raised to an immoderate degree of influence, almost eclipses its adversary. The soft stops of the organ seem alone suitable for accompanying the voice. In general, the organ is formed for absolute dominion; it is a jealous and intolerant instrument. In one case only, it seems to me, the organ can, without derogation, mingle with the choir and orchestra; and even then, it would be on condition of itself remaining in its solemn isolation. For example, if a mass of voices placed in the choir of a church, at a great distance from the organ, interrupted its chants from time to time, that they might be repeated on the organ, in part, or entirely; if the same choir, in a rite of some sad character, were accompanied by a lament from the orchestra and from the organ, issuing thus from the two extreme points of the temple, the organ succeeding to the orchestra, like the mysterious echo of its lamentation—this would be a mode of instrumentation susceptible of grand and sublime effects. But, even in this case, the organ would not really mingle with the other instruments; it would answer them, it would interrogate them; and the alliance between the two rival powers would only be the more sincere, that neither the one nor the other would lose anything of their respective dignity. Whenever I have heard the organ playing at the same time with the orchestra, it has seemed to me to produce a detestable effect, and to impair that of the orchestra instead of augmenting it.

DEATH OF ROBERT SCHUMANN.—Recent foreign papers report the death of Robert Schumann, by many considered the greatest of living German composers, as he was undoubtedly one of the most original, at Bonn, at the comparatively early age of forty-six. From a notice of the deceased in the New York Evening Post, we learn that he was born in Zwickau, Saxony, and at the commencement of his career was distinguished as a musical critic, the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, established by him in Leipzig, being one of the most able and successful musical journals of the day.

His musical tastes being of a very decided character, he soon forsook the editorial profession for the study of composition, which he prosecuted with extraordinary zeal. He modelled his style successively upon that of Haydn, Mozart, Moscheles and Ries, but soon struck into a path of his own, in which he exhibited great individuality, and a boldness and eccentricity which startled the critics, and brought down upon him denunciations and ridicule without stint. He had, however, a circle of enthusiastic admirers, who as warmly upheld him, and whose numbers constantly increased.

In 1840 he married the celebrated Clara Wieck, now, as then, a charming pianist, and most estimable woman. His married life was very happy, and with a fecundity of genius quite remarkable, he composed during this period a vast number of pianoforte pieces, many of them novel and fantastic in form, and almost all of exceeding beauty, besides quintets for string instruments, some remarkable symphonies, various large vocal works, cantatas, &c., and a multitude of charming little songs.

Some of his symphonies and many of his songs are familiar to our audiences, and have created genuine admiration of Schumann's great merit as a composer. About two years ago he began to exhibit symptoms of insanity; the disease rapidly gathered strength, and for the last two years he has been a confirmed lunatic. Under such melancholy circumstances, has this distinguished man left the world.

Music Abroad.

London.

Both Italian Operas brought their season to a close on the 2d inst., and both rejoiced in crowded houses during the last month. We extract from the Times's summing up:

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The tenth season of the Royal Italian Opera came to a termination on Saturday night with a very fine performance of Donizetti's Favorita, the principal characters being sustained, as before, by Madame Grisi, Signors Mario, Graziani, Soldi and Zelger. The opera was followed by "God save the Queen," in which the solo verses were delivered with great warmth and earnestness of manner by Madame Grisi.

This season has been the briefest on record (owing chiefly to the burning of Covent Garden Theatre in March). . . . The programme was inevitably a modest one, including chiefly the names of familiar works, dispensing altogether with the grand and costly operas by Meyerbeer and the French school of lyric melodrama, and only holding out the promise of a single novelty. But, on the other hand, it must be borne in mind that everything had to be done afresh, and that the production of each successive opera entailed the united and unremitting labor of scene-painter, costumier, decorator, machinist, and music-copyist. It was then a wonder that so many of the works announced were actually presented; and on this head we think subscribers have no very strong cause for complaint. Out of a list of 17, 10 were forthcoming—viz., Il Conte Ory, Il Trovatore, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, I Puritani, Norma, Don Giovanni, L'Elisir d'Amore, Lucrezia Borgia, Rigoletto, and La Favorita—all of which were placed upon the stage in a style of elegance and completeness the more praiseworthy when the peculiar difficulties of the situation are considered. The other seven advertised in the prospectus, though not performed, were La Gazza Ladra, Otello, Il Matrimonio Segreto, Lucia di Lammermoor, Fidelio, Don Pasquale, and La Traviata.

If seven out of 17 operas were postponed until a more favorable occasion, one only was missing from the promised list of artists. That one, nevertheless, was almost equal to seven of ordinary weight; we mean LABLACHE. "Dov'è Lablache?" might form the appropriate burden of a cavatina, so often has the question been asked during the last three months within the precincts of the Royal Italian Opera. Lablache, however, like the rest of us, must submit to his share of the ills that flesh is heir to; and if we have been rightly informed, the great basso has been suffering from a malady which deprived him for a time of the use of his legs, and rendered a season of repose absolutely indispensable.

While we have no new fact upon which to dwell, no new opera, successful or unsuccessful, to refer to, it is at least pleasant to be able to bestow a few words of well-merited compliment upon artists who, having long enjoyed public favor to the fullest extent, never perhaps before proved themselves so entirely worthy of it. Without being invidious, we may at once name Signor MARIO as an honorable instance. Mario's singing this year has surprised and delighted subscribers almost in an equal measure. His first appearance—when his voice failed him after the prologue of Lucrezia Borgia, and dispelled the expectations raised by his exquisite delivery of "Di pescatore ignobile"—was ominous of future disasters. But the omen proved delusive; from that night to the end of the season Mario was never once found wanting. As the Barbieri, Rigoletto, and the Favorita were alternately produced, he sang better and better, maintaining besides his reputation as one of the most consummate actors that Italy has sent to England. He further did good service in assuming the part of Manrico, when, after the departure for Rio Janeiro of the popular Signor Tamberlik, at an early part of the season, Il Trovatore, but for Mario, must have been withdrawn from the bills—to the detriment of the treasury. Manrico has been universally pronounced one of his most admirable performances. We must not separate from Mario the ever eager and indomitable GRISI, who came out as Norma with renewed energy and vigor, appeared frequently as Leonora (La Favorita) and Lucrezia Borgia, in both of which she is still incomparable, and resumed her famous part of Elvira (I Puritani) with eminent success. It was a pity that to these could not have been added Semiramide, Desdemona and Anna Bolena—since, as was hinted last year, to confine her eternally to "the sickle, the cloister, and the cup of poison," is as unkind to Grisi as it is unfair to her admirers.

It is scarcely polite, and, indeed, not exactly just, to allude to the continued "improvement" of Madame BOSIO, who at the present time is neither more nor less than one of the most accomplished vocalists living, second alone in the execution of florid music of the Italian school to ALBONI, and enjoying at the same time the evident advantage of a soprano voice—which is queen to the regal tenor. Nevertheless, Madame Bosio has improved since last season, and the mere fact that she is always progressing leads to the conviction that she is always studying—a practice from which no honest counsellor would endeavor to dissuade her. Madame Bosio has sung this season with unvarying success in six operas: Rigoletto (Gilda), the Barbieri (Rosina), Don Giovanni (Zerlina), the Conte Ory (Countess), the Elisir (Adina), and Il Trovatore. The part of Leonora in the last—Verdi's best—was allotted to her after the expiration of Madame JENNY NEY's engagement. That Madame Bosio would execute the music brilliantly no one doubted for a moment; but few anticipated that in the dramatic realization she was not merely to equal but to eclipse her Teutonic predecessor. The passing allusion to Don Giovanni brings Signor RONCONI to mind, and while we find no reason to change our opinion of his unfitness for the representation of Mozart's profligate hero, we have only to record his legitimate triumph in every other character he attempted. A bare catalogue of his assumptions will suffice to conjure up their surpassing merit to the minds of those among our readers who are in the habit of attending the Italian Opera:—Rigoletto, Figaro, Duke Alphonso, Dulcamara. Extremes meet here, and no mistake; but Ronconi's aptitude to represent high tragedy and low comedy, or farce, with equal felicity, is notorious, and a proof of the versatility of his genius.

Signor GARDONI, an excellent artist, and a favorite in the bargain, has proved himself this year extremely useful, since, in addition to his admired performance in the Conte Ory, he lightened the responsibilities of Signor Mario by assuming with great talent that gentleman's favorite part of Arturo in the Puritani, and atoned for the loss of Signor Tamberlik by undertaking that of Don Ottavio, in which he acquitted himself scarcely less to the satisfaction of subscribers.

Signor GRAZIANI, the barytone, confirmed the good impression produced last season, and his beautiful voice always conferred pleasure in the air, "Il balen," of the Trovatore, and the romance of the King of Castille, "A tanto amor," in La Favorita. Madame NANTIER DIDIÉ, by the united force of ability and perseverance, has rendered herself invaluable to this establishment, and so won upon the good graces of the public that it would be dangerous to think of replacing her by any other contralto. Her performances as Ragonda in the Conte Ory, Magdalen in Rigoletto, &c., need only to be mentioned; but her highly successful portraiture of the Gipsy Azucena brought her at once in contact with the Viardots and Albonis, and materially enhanced her reputation as an artist of higher pretensions. Madame Didié, although she has acquired great professional experience, has, moreover, the eminent advantage of being young; a flattering prospect therefore lies before her. Mademoiselle MARAI, a comprimaria "hors ligne," admirable in Adalgisa and characters still more difficult from a musical point of view—like Isoliero, the page in the Conte Ory—is also quite equal to undertake "first business" on an emergency, with credit to herself and satisfaction to the audience. This was placed beyond a doubt on the first night of L'Elisir d'Amore, when, Madame Bosio being ill, Mademoiselle Marai played Adina with remarkable talent and success. Such a seconda donna is precious. The appearances of Herr FORMES, owing to the operas of Meyerbeer being unavoidably laid aside for a period, have been rare. His parts of Orvoso and Baldassare (in Norma and La Favorita) were transferred—why we are unable to explain—to M. ZELGER. The Puritani, Don Giovanni, and Il Barbiere, if we are not mistaken, are the only operas in which the German basso has sung this year. His Basilio can never fail to strike as a characteristic piece of dry humor, while his Leporello for histrionic conception has yet to be surpassed. Of Signors TAG-LIAPICO and POLONINI we have only to record what has been recorded season after season in the annual resumé. Whatever these gentlemen have to do, be it small or great, they take the utmost pains with, and this, added to their thorough competence, makes their value to the theatre inestimable. Two new comers—Mademoiselle ROSA DEVRIES and Signor NERI BR-ALDI—were both favorably received, but we must hear more than the Donna Anna of the soprano and the Nemorino of the tenor to enable us to judge of their respective merits as dramatic singers. The band and chorus, though reduced to meet the proportions of the Lyceum, have been in no way less effective than what we have been accustomed to at the Royal Italian Opera; but this was pretty sure to be the case with Mr. COSTA as musical director, and therefore astonished nobody.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Saturday night, the last of the subscription, perfectly reflected the enthusiasm with which the season commenced. Notwithstanding the oppressive heat of the weather, every part of the house was closely packed, and Mlle. PICCOLOMINI, at the end of La Traviata, was thrice called to be pelted with bouquets. It was really a marvellous sight, that quantity of floral gifts flung from all directions—some safely reaching the place of their destination, others bursting into a thousand fragments, and defying the young idol to collect together the whole of her treasure. She never sang better than on Saturday; her execution was faultless, and into the last scene she infused that peculiar intensity of expression in which she is without a rival, and which especially stamps her as the vocalist of emotion, as distinguished from the vocalist in the abstract. There could not have been a greater triumph of histrionic singing.

The ceremony of smothering Mlle. Piccolomini with flowers having been duly performed, with shouts of delight on one side and the most gracious smiles on the other, the National Anthem was executed. MM. REICHARDT, BELLETTI and BRAHAM sang the first verse, Mlle. Piccolomini showed her powers of articulation in the second (a solo), and the third was sung by Mlle. Piccolomini, Mlle. FINOLI, M. CALZOLARI and M. BENEVENTANO. When first the theatre opened in May, everybody hurried to revive his memory of the "old institution." Hence, when the long-locked portals were thrown open it was a natural consequence that the public rushed into boxes, stalls, pit, and gallery, just as air rushes into a vacuum. The delightful singing of Madame ALBONI in Cenerentola, and the successful début of four new danseuses, caused an audience that had come to be pleased, to depart in high satisfaction. The season had started well. Next came the brilliant début of Mlle. PICCOLOMINI in La Traviata. La Figlia del Reggimento followed La Traviata, and was succeeded in its turn by Don Pasquale, and still the Piccolomini sentiment went on augmenting. Those who had seen her laugh for a very little while in Verdi's lugubrious production, loved to see her smile more permanently as the playful Maria or the arch Norina; and all the terms of praise that were invented for her special account had in them something of affection. She was called the "pet of the public," the "spoilt child," and the "cara bambina;" and, like a little despot, she ruled the entire season.

The début of Mlle. WAGNER as Romeo in I Montecchi ed i Capuletti was another grand event. The lady had caused such a deal of talk that everybody was anxious to see her, and when she first came forward, with her nodding plume and glittering armor, great was the effect produced by the largeness of her acting and the power and compass of her voice. But still we must consider that Mlle. Wagner rather gave evidence of her genius than thoroughly exhibited it in the course of the present season, and certainly she never became so prominent a figure in the minds of the habitués as the younger débütante.

The re-opening of Her Majesty's Theatre would not have been complete without the revival of ballet on that large scale which used to delight the patrons of former times. Not only, therefore, did Mademoiselle Marie Taglioni, coming as an addition to the four younger danseuses, raise the divertissements to a high degree of brilliancy, but Le Corsaire, the great Terpsichorean novelty of Paris, was brought out with the same première and the same scenic effects that had caused such a lasting impression in Paris. The graces of Rosati and the grandeur of the concluding tableau must still be fresh in the minds of all who witnessed them.

To note the lustre of the season in terms composed of its brightest elements, we should set down in chronological order the names of Alboni, Piccolomini, Wagner, and Rosati; but it would be wrong to pass over such excellent and well established artists as MM. Belletti, Reichardt, and Calzolari, the favorable impression left by Madame Albertini, the respectable performance of M. Beneventano, the highly creditable début of M. Rossi, and the universal esteem gained by the conductor, M. Bonetti. In fact, the whole season has been a "lucky" season, in the fullest sense of the word.—Times, Aug. 4.

JOHANNA WAGNER's performances came to a close with Tancredi, and she left England for Berlin, "without having had the opportunity of really displaying her unquestionably great powers in a German Opera."

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUG. 23, 1856.

Organ Concerts—Mr. Morgan.

The first of the two Grand Organ Concerts at Tremont Temple, given, in connection with the Musical Convention now in session, by Mr. G. W. MORGAN, organist of Grace Church in New York, took place on Wednesday afternoon. In spite of the menacing easterly storm, it was gratifying to see what a large and eagerly attentive audience it drew; of course there was a pretty large nucleus of an audience already in attendance on the daily exercises of the Convention—teachers and country singing school teachers, who had come to spend a week in town, in brushing up their notions of the art of teaching, by putting themselves in the position of pupils under such experienced teachers as Messrs. JOHNSON and FROST. These, of course, were all ears, and whether it was Fugue of Bach, or a pretty variation on "The Last Rose," whether the noble instrument spake out in full, in language of its own, (as seized and written down by Bachs and Handels), and so stood upon its dignity, or whether it stooped down to play with little children and to imitate a hand-organ,—all was rapturously applauded. Naturally enough, the oddest, most grotesque, uncharacteristic, questionable things—those in which the organ spoke not for itself, but stooped to imitate, and, as the boys say, "cut up monkey shins," excited the most rapture. But on the other hand two long fugues, and two movements of a symphony, failed not to make a genuine impression. It was perhaps well that they should hear both kinds; many came to be amused as well as to learn, and possibly, on Jullien's principle, it was, that by tickling their more childish senses, they were charmed into listening to what touched their souls. Then again, it is not every day that one hears a great organ; the instrument (the chef d'œuvre of the Messrs. Hook, the largest in America, with its 77 stops, four banks of finger keys, and pedal,) was one of the lions, which they came for, and they wished to see and hear it put through all its paces. Deep thundering sub-bass contrasted with highest slender whistle, (a combination of extremes, by the way, of which the player in his improvisations appeared rather fond); they wanted to discriminate its various registers or qualities of tone, and hear it "do" the orchestra, from double bass to piccolo; and therefore ingenious variations and combinations of stops, however trivial the music, served them for a lesson on the many-sided capabilities of the great tone-structure.

All this was well enough once, and more than once—only let it not stop here. For, after all, the organ is a poor thing, and quite superfluous, if it only seek to imitate an orchestra, and do the smaller work of other instruments. There is music which belongs to it, which needs it, and which is of the most sublime and soul-satisfying of music. The programme contained some of this too—perhaps as much, or nearly as much as it would have been prudent to venture upon such occasions, considering their infrequency. We only wish that public opportunities of hearing organ music could be made more common, so that curiosity about the instrument, the stops, and so forth, might soon give way to interest in the real organ music, and these quasi-orchestral and fire-work exhibitions become exceptional, (as child's play after sermon and brain-work), the solid, glorious fugues and choruses and chorales being the staple of each entertainment.

The programme included two solid pieces in the strictly organ style of composition; and these plainly did not suffer under the masterly hands (and feet) of Mr. Morgan; for he is a thoroughbred organist of the English school, familiar with the grand old music, and master of his art, more so (mechanically at least) than any we have heard. Whether he is quite as greatly master of his Art, as he is master of his instrument, however, is what it becomes us, before hearing more of the best European, and particularly German organists, to be cautious about deciding. We can only say, we do enjoy it greatly when he plays a good fugue.

He commenced with a "Grand Prelude and Fugue in D," by HESSE, of which we regretted to lose all but the last workings of the subject. Next came the Slow Movement, Minuet and Trio from a Symphony in C, by MOZART. This was the least objectionable kind of orchestral music for the organ: for in a symphony (at all events by Mozart) subjects are developed after the deeper laws of musical form, which, whether strictly fugue or not, has always the fugue principle latent in it, and thus it is congenial with the organ. It was exquisitely played, the alternation of stops being highly suggestive. Next came Bach's celebrated Fugue in G minor; full of life and grandeur and of infinite suggestion as the ocean. The soul feels glad and strong while it keeps on; and you saw every face was animated; there was no need of clap-trap to enlist attention. The "Wedding-March" (MENDELSSOHN) closed the first part. This was an example of the fullest, loudest strength of the organ; crowded harmonies, rushing together through all the pipes, diapasons, trumpets, mixtures, solos, astounding the new listeners. It was made remarkably distinct, crisp and orchestra-like; but for such a great roaring mass of sound, one felt the need of a larger place in which to hear it; the sub-bass of the organ, down to the 32-feet C, appears round and substantial, but it seems to need more space to speak in, a longer beach to roll its waves upon. Then again, do not the necessary dissonances involved in the use of the full organ, with the mixtures drawn, on the principle of increasing the éclat and lustre of the mass of tone, require a vaster space in which to let the cross vibrations work themselves out clear?

The second part was all outside of organ music proper. The overture to "William Tell" was very skilfully played, and more effective than one would suppose it could be on the organ. The "Theme with Variations (extempore)" was "The Last Rose of Summer," much of it more ingenious than edifying, yet not without some beautiful effects. The "Turkish March," from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," was a pretty trifle, Turkish enough, and short. Mr. Morgan closed with "God save the King," wrought up a la Fantasia, with variations, after his own fancy. There was some astonishing pedal work in it. What a furor! hand-clappings and hurrahs mingle themselves with the deafening roar of the big pipes long ere their "hurly-burly's done."

Mlle. Piccolomini in "La Traviata."

The more serious portion of the London press is greatly stirred up about the morality of the stage representations, which have recently created such a furor in Her Majesty's Theatre—not, however, countenanced, it would seem, by Her Majesty. The taste of the Verdi music, as well as of the modern French plays and novels, is that it resorts to cheap, coarse, sensual stimulus for inspiration. All its dishes must be terribly seasoned with mustard and red pepper. All its plots are harrowing and bloody—a mingling of voluptuousness and terror. The unnatural and monstrous attitudes and complications of human life and passion are sought out for exciting subjects, as if what is simple, natural and harmonious were tame. They have lost faith, these eager strivers for effect, in daylight and clear, common air, in natural skies and green fields. It is refreshing to see any signs of a wholesome reaction against it. Not the most effective always is the most true; every false school in literature and art has had its turn in running away with the crowd, and for the time being finds it easy to put out the stars with its own noisy blaze of rockets and blue lights.

The following extracts show the state of feeling among sober London critics. The Spectator discourses thus:

THEATRICAL MORALITIES.—It has never been thought unfair to apply to the taste and morals of a people the touchstone of their public amusements. These form the sphere in which a nation is least controlled by circumstances independent of its choice, and in which its real sympathies and tendencies may be expected most freely to show themselves. How happens it, if this is true, that the class of amusements which ought most vividly to reflect national character, and which at other periods of our social development has done so, should be gradually assuming among us here in London a more exotic and certainly more immoral tone? The favorite opera of the season has been La Traviata, the favorite play has been Retribution. The highest society in England has thronged the opera-house night after night, to see a very young and innocent-looking lady personate the heroine of an infamous modern French novel, who varies her prostitution by a frantic passion suddenly conceived for one of her numerous lovers, and is brought up to the modern standard of intense interest by dying of consumption on the stage. If the music had been instinct with genius, something might have been said on the score of artistic beauty, though morality would have barred the appeal. But Verdi's music, which generally descends below his subjects, can in this case claim the ambiguous merit of being quite worthy of the subject. If the attraction was—as no doubt it mainly was—in Piccolomini's grace and pathos, surely grace and pathos are to be found anywhere rather than in Parisian lorettes; and we are finally reduced to seek for some at least of the charm in the contrast between the actress and the part she was called on to sustain,—just the sort of attraction which the fine gentlemen of the Caroline era felt in hearing the broadest indecencies put into the mouths of young and pretty women in the prologues and epilogues of the comedies of that reprobate age. We should have thought the production of La Traviata an outrage on the ladies of the aristocracy who support the theatre, if they had not by crowding their boxes every night shown that they did not notice the underlying vice of the opera. But these ladies are not exempt from the weakness of slavery to fashion. No one of them likes to be the first to pronounce authoritatively that a thing is improper, no one chooses to be more particular or prudish than her neighbor; and so familiarity with evil gradually grows, and the very instinct which would in most cases warn women against such exhibitions as these becomes dulled, and ceases soon to retain any vitality. The fashionable world acts like all corporate bodies, and tolerates collectively what the majority individually disapproves. The corrective would be that morality should become corporate, and that exhibitions under the patronage of the female aristocracy should be submitted beforehand to a committee of patronesses. If the ladies objected to act by themselves in so difficult and delicate a matter, let a "dowager bishop" or two—of whom there will in future be an ample supply—be added to the committee. When Vice becomes brazen, it is time for Virtue to call mundane influences to her aid. Then why should that charming little Olympic—so well managed, too, in many important respects—be given up for a whole season to the representation of a story which has nothing but its wickedness to recommend it? It is not true that murder and adultery are the most interesting subjects of dramatic art, for it is not true that the persons guilty of these crimes present the most interesting contrasts of character or the most powerful conflicts of passion. Nothing can be a more vulgar prejudice than that vicious persons are less tiresome, less monotonous, than virtuous persons. The very violence of the sensations in which they indulge takes from them all elasticity and freshness of mind and character. They are moral drunkards, stupid when they are not mad, and disgusting when their fury-fits are on them. Surely Mr. Wigan's subtle sense of shades of feeling would easily find better scope among the innocent and noble diversities of human nature than in portraying the frenzy of revenge and the fiend-like deliberation of hatred; and an English audience at a theatre must be very unlike the same English audience at their own firesides, or the same English audience in their choice of books and pictures, if they need this demoniacal stimulus to jaded sensibilities. Let us borrow from the Italians their mellifluous voices, and from the French their neatness of plot and smartness of dialogue, but let us leave alone that hankering after prurient sentiment and melo-dramatic situation which must be the bane of art, as it certainly is damaging to the moral purity and strength which we value more than art, but which lie at the root of all good art.

Our second extract is from a letter to the Manchester Guardian:

The production of Verdi's "Traviata" is represented as the cause of the royal displeasure with Mr. Lumley. When an attempt was made to bring out a translation of the "Dame aux Camelias" at Drury Lane, the Lord Chamberlain interposed and refused his license. That a woman of abandoned life should be capable of entertaining a great passion, and of sacrificing her own happiness for that of the man she loves, may be conceded as possible; but that such a woman, fresh from the purifying and refining influences of a real attachment, should again throw herself into the haunts of vice, from which her love had withdrawn her, is a story so mischievous, so unnatural, and so impure, that it cannot be doubted the Lord Chamberlain exercised a laudable discretion in preventing the performance in the English language, of a drama, which surrounds an abandoned woman with a halo of false sympathy and misplaced admiration. Her majesty refused to enter the theatre at which this plot formed the subject of an opera. Once, and once only, has the Queen visited Her Majesty's Theatre during the season just ended; and, as her majesty and her prince were then accompanied by her royal Belgian visitors, it may safely be assumed that they only went on that occasion in deference to the wish expressed by their relatives, to see Wagner, in the opera of "Romeo and Juliet." I regret to say, that the aristocratic frequenters of Her Majesty's Theatre have not imitated the example of their sovereign. They have indeed found a hideous piquancy in the spectacle of a young lady of stainless life and noble family personating the rôle of a shameless and abandoned woman. Mlle. Piccolomini's fresh girlish voice, her arch looks and pretty, wilful, spoiled ways might excite sympathy for a youthful lady who resembles the fair Sabrina surrounded by Comus and his "rabble rout." But her youth and beauty and seeming innocence are but the sauce piquante of the dish devoured with such gluttonous appetite by the frequenters of the orchestra stalls and omnibus boxes; and a hundred powerful glasses were turned upon Maria Piccolomini's features as she sang the bacchanalian Libiamo, libiamo, in the attempt to discover the reflex action of that which she pretends to be upon that which she is.

That young and nobly-born English maidens should lend the sanction of their presence to such an exhibition does not say much for the tone of morality in high life. The music of the "Traviata" is, with one or two exceptions, poor and common-place; yet the opera has filled the house, and has put into Mr. Lumley's pocket whatever surplus he may find there, after paying high salaries to Alboni, Wagner and Piccolomini.

The Times says:

The composition in which she made her debut was little worth, and the libretto with which it was connected was almost repulsive from the physical and phthisical nature of the woes which it illustrated. This did not matter a jot. The appearance of a young, fresh talent, adorned with innate grace, and free from everything like convention, at once vanquished every heart without an effort on the part of the fair victrix. No vocal actress ever succeeded more perfectly in making her song go to the hearts of her hearers than Mademoiselle Piccolomini. The song belonged not only to the voice, but to the face, the manner, to the gesticulation. The little artist dashed off her reckless champagne-lyric, and occupants of the stalls wagged their heads in accordance with the time; she gave a heartbroken shriek when parting from her lover, and, lo! the hearts of forty old habitués were rent in twain; she coughed herself to death before their eyes, and nothing was so fascinating as the last agony. "Come in and die, Ralph!" says the old citizen's wife in Beaumont and Fletcher's Knight of the Burning Pestle, when she wants to see the apprentice act the closing scene of a tragedy. "Come in and die, Piccolomini" was the mental ejaculation of many a staunch habitué; but it was that he might revive her with potent lungs and a ponderous bouquet. Never was so complete a sympathy established between artist and audience.

We could speak very strongly on the subject of this same Traviata, but in some cases figures of speech must succumb to figures of arithmetic; and it can, we believe, be proved by statistical returns that this particular opera, thanks to Mademoiselle Piccolomini, has been played for a greater number of nights than any other modern work within the same period.

THE LIFE OF BEETHOVEN.—Certainly all our readers will be interested in the following communication, from one whose frequent and well-appreciated favors in our columns have earned him the right to address them familiarly:

CAMBRIDGE, AUG. 18, 1856.

MY DEAR DWIGHT:—I have been so long known to the readers of your Journal as rather an industrious contributor to your columns, that possibly it may not appear to exhibit a want of proper modesty if I answer in this manner a few questions, which are put to me continually, both by friends and strangers, in relation to the work so long since announced by you as in preparation. I refer to a Life of Beethoven, by an American, for the American public.

During the years I have spent abroad, I have heard of but one person beside myself, who has made any extensive researches for such a work. That gentleman is Professor Otto Jahn, of Bonn. Prof. Jahn is a well known philologist, who devotes his leisure to music and musical literature, and has undertaken the great task of writing the biographies of Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven. The first volume of his life of Mozart you have already made known to your readers, in extracts from its pages. The object of the professor is to give not only the history of these men, but also a critical discussion of their works, with the position they occupy, and the influence they exert and are exerting upon the history of their art. These works will be very extensive and hardly of a popular character. It may not be out of place to notice here a work upon Handel, of a similar character, now in preparation by a Dr. Crysanther, and which, I have every reason to believe from what I know of that gentleman's indefatigable industry and profound knowledge of music, will prove a veritable masterpiece.

My object, on the other hand, is to give a full, exact and reliable history of Beethoven the man, with such remarks upon his works and mission as will naturally arise from a somewhat extensive study of the subject during the last ten years, avoiding, however, those endless scientific discussions of which no man, save some profound and learned contrapantist, like Dehn, for instance, is capable. Had it been in my power to devote myself exclusively to this work, it would long since have been in the reader's hands. The first draft of the first half of the work has already been completed, and a few months of uninterrupted devotion to the subject in Vienna, the scene of all the important years of Beethoven's life, will enable me to make the final researches now necessary, and to fill up, revise and complete the sketch already drawn. The materials already collected are large in quantity, but there are still many gaps to be filled, omissions to be supplied, points to be elucidated, and facts to be verified. My undertaking has proved no holiday task. I can say with great satisfaction, however, that at length its extent is visible, and that the hope of soon giving my countrymen the means of judging for themselves of the character of that great man, whose music stirs them as that of no other composer does, lends me new courage and zeal in the work. Yours Truly, A. W. T.

Musical Chat-Chat.

Our accomplished singer, Mrs. J. H. LONG, gives a vocal concert at Nahant this evening, with the assistance of Mr. J. Q. WETHERBEE, basso, and Mr. T. Hinton, as accompanist. Her programme is light, short and choice—just the thing for a summer evening of the gay crowd at the sea-side. She is to sing herself the beautiful Romanza from "William Tell," the Cavatina, Non fu Sogno, of Verdi, and two English songs: "The Normandy Maid" and "Cherry Ripe." Mr. Wetherbee will sing the comic bass song of the Harem Keeper, from Mozart's Seraglio, which we have heard him do with great gusto. The duets are: La ci darem ("Don Juan") and Dunque io sono, from "The Barber." . . . Miss Phillips's concert at the same place last week was, we are told, quite successful. . . . At Newport they have Mme. LAGRANGE, GOTTSCHALK, BRIGNOLI, &c., and have enjoyed various concerts, besides the bewitching promenade and dance music of a goodly number of the old "Germanians," re-assembled for an orchestra.

If Psalm Tunes by their multitude can save the country, we are safe. Five new collections are now on the eve of publication. These are: The "Sabbath Bell," edited by Lowell Mason and Geo. F. Root; the "Keystone Collection," by A. N. Johnson and E. H. Frost; the "Hosanna," by Leonard Marshall, the "Selah," by T. Hastings; and the "Dulcimer," by I. B. Woodbury.

L' Eco di Italia announces the arrival in New York of a new tenor, Sig. TIBERINI, who has just had a brilliant career at the Tacon theatre in Havana, where he sung in Norma, Favorita, Lucia, I due Foscari, Trovatore, L'Elisir, Rigoletto, I Martiri, and other difficult pieces, always "con felicissimo successo," as he had before done in the theatres of Naples, Rome and Palermo. . . . VESTALI has engaged for her Mexican Opera a prima donna assoluta (name not mentioned), the baritone OTTAVIANI and the tenor STEFANI. . . . Sig. ARDITI, the well-known conductor, and composer of La Spia, has arrived in London, where we have now two Spie. . . . Mmes. BOSIO, MARAT; Signors LABLACHE, RONCONI, CALZOLARI, and TAGLIAFICO, together with CERITO, the beautiful danseuse, are engaged to appear during the coronation fêtes at Moscow. . . . Mlle. PICCOLOMINI, Signors GARDONI, GRAZIANI, BENEVENTANO and NERI BERALDI are engaged for the winter at Paris.

The London Musical World contains the following letter addressed by the poet, LONGFELLOW, to the composer, BALFE, whose musical settings of certain beautiful lyrics of the former have obtained wide popularity in England:—

MY DEAR SIR,—I feel very much flattered by your friendly note, and the precious volume of music which came with it; and I should not be so tardy in my thanks, had I not been laid up on my sofa with a lame knee for the last month. Finally, I have crept from Cambridge to this sea-side place, and am well enough to sit at a table and write.

One of my first letters is to acknowledge your beautiful gift, and to say how successful this musical translation of my poems seems to me. You have sung them better than I did; for, after all, music reproduces the mood of mind in which a piece is written better than words can.

For all these various and beautiful melodies, these interpretations of my thoughts, I very sincerely thank you; and beg to assure you that I truly appreciate this token of your regard for what I have written, and all the friendly expressions of your letter. Believe me, my dear sir, yours very faithfully.

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

Nahant, near Boston, July 12, 1856.

"A more graceful tribute," adds the World, "was never paid by poet to musician—by one man of genius to another." The songs referred to are, "Good night, beloved!" Serenade; "The reaper and the flowers;" "This is the place, stand still, my steed;" "The green trees whispered wild and low;" "Annie of Tharaw;" "The day is done," and "Trust her not." Duet. They are published by Messrs. Boosey & Sons, 28 Holles street, London. . . . The same journal informs us that there is no truth in the report that WILLIAM V. WALLACE had become blind.

Advertisements.

TO PIANO-FORTE PLAYERS.

THE undersigned would call the attention of all who desire to possess the works for piano-forte solo by the greatest masters, to a new, correct, and elegant stereotype edition now issuing from the press in Germany. Depending upon a very extensive sale of this edition, the publisher has put his prices so low that no one who really desires to carry the practice of the instrument beyond the performance of a few songs, polkas, quicksteps, and the like, need be deprived of complete sets of the grandest and most beautiful works yet composed for the Piano-Forte.

The edition already extends to the following works, which are ready for delivery:—

THE PIANO-FORTE SONATAS OF BEETHOVEN, 32 in number, in two volumes, comprising over 450 pages of music.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF MOZART, for two and four hands, in two volumes: Vol. I. containing 19 Sonatas for two hands; Vol. II. containing 23 pieces, consisting of Rondos, Fantasia, Adagio, Minuet, Variations and the like, for two hands, together with four Sonatas and several other pieces for four hands.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF JOSEPH HAYDN are in course of publication, also in two volumes, consisting of 84 Sonatas, four books of Variations, a Fantasia, a Capriccio and an Adagio.

An Additional Volume of BEETHOVEN'S PIANO-FORTE WORKS for two hands, is also in preparation, which is to contain his Variations, and smaller works generally, not included among the thirty-two Sonatas.

The undersigned proposes to visit Germany again in the course of the ensuing autumn, and would be happy to receive orders for any or all of the above works. The publisher of this Journal has kindly consented to receive and forward to him all such orders, and also to receive and distribute the volumes when forwarded from Germany. It is possible to import these works at the prices given below, only upon the plan of a subscription; nor can any be ordered until a sufficient number of subscribers are obtained to bring the expenses arising from transportation, duties, exchange, &c., within reasonable limits. The works will be delivered at the publishing office of this Journal, on the following terms—provided that a sufficient number be ordered:—

Beethoven's 32 Sonatas, (over 450 pages of music,) 2 vols...$6
" additional volume of smaller works.....$8
Mozart's Piano-forte Works, 2 vols.....$6
Haydn's " " 2 vols.....$6

A set of the Beethoven Sonatas, as a specimen, may be seen at this office. ALEX' W. THAYER.

THE EIGHTH GREAT EXHIBITION

....OF....

AMERICAN MANUFACTURES AND MECHANICAL ART,

UNDER THE DIRECTION OF

THE MASSACHUSETTS CHARITABLE MECHANIC ASSOCIATION,

WILL COMMENCE AT

PANEULL AND QUINCY HALLS,

....ON....

Wednesday, Sept. 10th.

JOSEPH L. BATES,
Secretary.

J. C. D. PARKER,

Instructor of the Piano-forte, Organ & Harmony,
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

CALCOTT'S MUSICAL GRAMMAR.

JUST PUBLISHED. A Musical Grammar, in four parts. I. Notation. II. Melody. III. Harmony. IV. Rhythm. By Dr. CALCOTT.

The design of this work is to compress into a small volume the leading principles of practical music. From the analogy which exists between music and language, the author has adopted the classification first suggested by German theorists. He has endeavored by examples selected from the best authors to render the instructions more satisfactory than if they were merely verbal. By due attention to this volume, it is believed the student may obtain all that is necessary to discriminate between false and correct harmony, and to compose conformably to established rules. Price 75 cents.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

WANTED, a situation in a Boston Manufactory or Music Store, to learn the art of Tuning, by a person who has some theoretical knowledge of music.
Address "Stanhope," Charlestown, Mass.

C. BREUSING,

IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,

(Imported from England)

389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY

FOR THE DIFFUSION OF

MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY:

VOLUME 7.

Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration,

Containing an exact table of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $3.

VOLUME 8.

Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,

With the musical examples properly combined with the text.

The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering.—

(Former price $5.25) In paper wrappers, $1.18. By mail, $1.20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue.....$1 68
- " 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.....1 68
- " 3. Fétils on Choir and Chorus Singing.....38
- " 4. Mozart's Sencilnet Thorough Bass School.....21
- " 5. Catel's Treatise on Harmony.....68
- " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected Writings on Thorough Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-instruction. Vol. 1. Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents. Vols. 2 and 3. Guide to Composition, 88c each. Three vols. bound in one complete, cloth boards.....2 68

J. A. NOVELLO,

Sacred Music Store, No. 389 Broadway, New York,
And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
ORGANIST OF ST. PAUL'S CHURCH,
ALBANY, N. Y.

Garcia's Complete School of Singing.

JUST PUBLISHED:—A Complete School of Singing, in which the Art is clearly developed in a series of Instructions and appropriate Examples, to which are added Exercises, written and composed by MANUEL GARCIA.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART,

BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.

Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,

MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

Apr 29

MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THIS beautiful Art novel, by Mme. GEORGE SAND, just completed in the Journal of Music, for which it was expressly translated, has been reprinted in a neat pamphlet, and may be had at this office, and at the periodical and bookstores. Price 15 cents. Copies sent by mail post-paid, for 18 cents.

JOB PRINTING

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF

EDWARD L. BALCH,

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

SIG. AUGUSTO BENDELARI,
RESIDENCE, No. 86 PINCKNEY ST.

CARL HAUSE

OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.

Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
365 Washington Street, Boston.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S
Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.

A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.

Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (126 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
do each subsequent.....$6 00
Special notices (loaded), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 230.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 30, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 22.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 282 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
"A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
"C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
"SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
"GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
"G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
"JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
"MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
"W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
"W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
"HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Translated from the German for this Journal.]

The Life and Characteristics of Beethoven.

BY DR. HEINRICH DÖRING.

(Continued from page 162.)

The fame which Beethoven had already acquired did not betray him into vanity or an exaggerated self-esteem. The experience of many years had taught him that with the multitude the mere name is sufficient for them to find everything in a work beautiful and excellent, or mediocre and poor. It chanced one evening, at Count Browne's, in Baden, near Vienna, that Beethoven's pupil, Ferdinand Ries, who had been recommended to the Count as a pianist, and who usually performed his master's compositions to him in the evening, played a march that just then occurred to him. The circle at the Count's consisted of outright enthusiastic admirers of Beethoven. An old Countess, whose devout adherence had become annoying to the composer, went into raptures at that march. She supposed it something new by Beethoven, and Ries waggishly confessed it. Unfortunately, the next day Beethoven himself came to Baden. He had scarcely stepped into the Count's saloon, when the old lady began to speak of the exceedingly ingenious and splendid march. Ries was in no little of a quandary. He knew that Beethoven could not endure the old Countess. So he drew him rapidly aside, and whispered to him that he had merely amused himself with her silliness. Beethoven took it well; but the embarrassment of the pupil increased when he was obliged to repeat the march, which this time turned out much worse, since Beethoven stood beside him. The latter was overwhelmed with praises, to which he listened in confusion and with inward rage. "You see, dear Ries," said he to his young friend afterwards, "these are the great connoisseurs, who judge every sort of music so correctly and so sharply. Only give them the name of their favorite; that's all they need."

It was not always that Beethoven's excitable nature had such self-control. Soon afterwards he played with Ries a Sonata for four hands, composed by him. During the performance the young Count P. talked so loud with a young lady in the door-way of the ante-room, that Beethoven, after several fruitless efforts to obtain silence, suddenly, in the midst of their playing, pulled away his pupil's hands from the piano, sprang up quickly, and in a loud voice said: "I do not play for such swine!" All attempts to bring him back to the piano were in vain. He would not even permit Ries to go on with the Sonata. The consequence was that the music was resolved into a general chagrin.

In the opposite mood Beethoven took a slight reproof of his own musical performance for just what it was, a harmless joke, conscious, as teacher, of having committed a like fault with his scholar. "One evening," Ries related, "I had to play at Count Browne's a Sonata of Beethoven. It was the Sonata in A minor. As Beethoven was present, and I had never practised that Sonata with him, I begged that I might play any other, but not that one. They turned to Beethoven, who finally said: 'Come, you surely will not play it so badly that I cannot listen to it.' So I had to submit. Beethoven, as usual, turned the leaves. At a leap with the left hand, where one note should be made quite prominent, I came full on the neighbor note. Beethoven tapped me with one finger on the head, which the Princess Lichnowsky, who sat opposite me leaning upon the piano, remarked and smiled. After the playing was over Beethoven said: 'Right bravely done! You have no need first to learn the Sonata with me. The finger was merely to show you my attention.' Afterwards Beethoven had to play. He chose his D minor Sonata, which had then just appeared. The Princess may have expected that Beethoven might make some mistake. She placed herself behind his stool, and I turned the leaves. At the 53d and 54th bars Beethoven missed the beginning, and instead of going down with two and two notes, he struck every quarter with the full hand, three or four notes at once, descending. It sounded as if the key-board were being dusted. The Princess Lichnowsky gave him some not very soft blows on the head, with the remark that: 'If the pupil gets a finger for one false note, then the master, who commits greater blunders, must be punished with full hands.' They all laughed, especially Beethoven. He began anew, and played with wonderful beauty. The Adagio, especially, he rendered in an inimitable manner.

Ries ascribed the carefulness and patience which Beethoven showed in his instruction, to his love for his father, with whom Beethoven had stood in the friendliest relations formerly at Bonn. He had to repeat many things ten times over, and oftener. If it happened that he missed aught in a passage, or that he struck certain notes wrong, which Beethoven wanted to have made quite prominent, he seldom said a word. But he was stirred up if his pupil missed the expression in a Crescendo, for instance, and thereby perverted the character of the whole piece. The first, he would say, was mere accident, but the other betrayed want of knowledge, of feeling or attention.

His hardness of hearing, before mentioned, gave him a high degree of sensitiveness. This affliction, although suspended for some time, always returned again. Those about him had to be very careful not to make him sensible of this infirmity by talking loud to him. If he did not understand anything, he commonly put it off upon absent-mindedness, from which he was not free. How much his hearing had diminished, was shown in 1802, during a walk in the country. His companion, Ries, called his attention to a shepherd, who played quite prettily in the woods upon a flute carved out of elder wood. For half an hour Beethoven could hear nothing. But notwithstanding Ries assured him that he too heard nothing more, (which was not the case,) Beethoven sank into a melancholy mood. He grew monosyllabic, and stared straight before him with a gloomy look. On the way home he kept on muttering to himself, emitting inarticulate sounds, without singing any definite notes. There had occurred to him, he said, a theme for the last Allegro of one of his Sonatas. When he had entered his chamber with his companion, he ran with his hat on his head to the piano, and busied himself for almost an hour with the finale of his Sonata in F minor. When he rose from the piano, he was surprised to see his young friend still there, who had seated himself the meanwhile in a corner of the room. Beethoven said to him shortly: "I can give you no lesson to-day; I must still work."

The comfortless condition in which Beethoven found himself placed by his deafness, is described by one of his earliest friends, Stephen von Breuning, in a letter dated 18th Nov. 1806, to Dr. Wegeler, in Coblenz. "You cannot believe," he writes, "what an indescribable, I might say terrible impression, the decay of his hearing has produced on Beethoven. Imagine what the feeling of unhappiness must be, with his earnest character; to which add reserve, mistrust, frequently towards his best friends, in many things irresolution. For the most part, with but few exceptions, where his original feeling expresses itself quite freely, intercourse with him is an actual exertion, since one never can abandon himself. From May to the beginning of this month we have lived in the same house, and during the first days I took him into my room. He was scarcely with me, when he fell into a severe illness, almost dangerous, which passed at length into an obstinate intermittent fever. Care and nursing have debilitated me considerably. He is now well again. He lives upon the ramparts, I in a house newly built by Prince Esterhazy before the Alster-Caserne, and as I manage my own house-keeping, Beethoven eats every day with me."

Some years before, in July 1804, Beethoven had had a falling out with this friend of his youth, which threatened a complete rupture of their relations. The immediate occasion of this violent altercation between them was, that Stephen von Breuning had delayed or omitted the usual notice to quit from Beethoven's former lodgings in the theatre building upon the Wieden. Breuning, a hot-head like Beethoven, was the more provoked at his conduct, since it had not been all among themselves. Beethoven wrote to his pupil, Ries, in the beginning of July 1804: "Since Breuning has not scrupled to represent my character to you, by his behavior, in such a light that I appear a wretched, pitiable, small man, I must select you to bear my answer to him orally, but only to the first point of his letter, which I answer simply to vindicate my character with you. Tell him, then, that I never thought of reproaching him for the delay of the notice, and that, had it really been Breuning's fault, every harmonious relation in the world was far too dear to me, to suffer me for a few hundreds, or even more, to inflict mortifications upon one of my friends. You know yourself, that I have charged you jokingly with the fault of the quit-notice having arrived too late through you. I am sure you will remember this; on my part the whole matter was forgotten. And then my brother began at the table, and said that he believed that it was Breuning's fault. I denied it on the spot and said: 'It was your fault.' That, I think, was clear enough, that I did not impute the fault to Breuning. But he sprang up like a mad man and said he would call up the master of the house. This to me unusual conduct before all the men with whom I associate, quite discomposed me. I too sprang up, upset my chair, went off and did not return. This behavior moved Breuning to place me in such a beautiful light with you and the keeper of the house, and to send me a letter, which I answered only by silence. To Breuning I have no more to say. His mode of thinking and of action in regard to mine, shows that a friendly relation never should have been formed between us, and certainly cannot continue."

A similar mood prevails in a later letter of Beethoven's to Ries, written July 24th, 1804, at Baden, near Vienna. This letter contributes essentially to an understanding of his friend's and of his own character. Here Beethoven frankly confesses his own weaknesses, but does not acquit his friend entirely of all faults. In relation to the affair just mentioned he wrote to Ries: "Believe me, my flying into a passion was only an outbreak of many past unpleasant occurrences. I have the faculty of concealing and repressing my sensibility in a great many matters; but if I happen to get excited at a time when I am more susceptible to anger, I explode more vehemently than anybody else. Breuning has certainly very excellent peculiarities; but he thinks himself free from all faults, and for the most part has those in the strongest degree which he believes he finds in other men. He has a spirit of littleness, which I have despised from childhood. My judgment almost prophesied the turn things have taken with Breuning, since our ways of thinking, acting and feeling were too different. But I had believed that even these difficulties might be overcome. Experience has convinced me of the contrary. And now no friendship more! I have had but two friends in the world, with whom I never had a misunderstanding; but what men! One is dead, the other lives yet. Although for six long years we neither of us have known anything of the other, yet I know that I hold in his heart the first place, as he does in mine. The ground of friendship is the greatest similarity in the souls and hearts of men. I wish nothing but that you read my letter, and his to me. No, no longer will he maintain the place he did have in my heart. He who can attribute to his friend such a low way of thinking, and who can allow himself so low a way of acting towards him, is not worthy of my friendship."

Scarcely a few months had passed after this letter, when Beethoven accidentally met Breuning. A full reconciliation took place instantly. Every hostile intention, however strongly he had expressed himself about it in the above letter, was entirely forgotten. Beethoven dedicated to him one of his Sonatas, and dined with him daily in his before-mentioned lodgings in front of the Alster-Caserne.

Beethoven's irritability was frequently increased by an easily-excited suspiciousness, which had its foundation in his hardness of hearing. His most tried friends might be calumniated before him through any unknown person, for he was extremely credulous. To the suspected party he made no accusation. He asked no explanation of him, but he showed the deepest contempt for him upon the spot. Frequently one knew not how he stood with him, until the affair, for the most part accidental, cleared itself up. But then he sought to make good the wrong he had done as quickly as possible.

To his friends, so long as he had no suspicions against them, he was unalterably true. They could reckon in all trials upon his sympathy and aid. This amiable side of his character showed itself towards his friend and pupil, Ries, through a magnanimous intercession.

Soon after the march of the French army into Vienna, in the year 1805, Ries, who was born on the left bank of the Rhine, was summoned back by the French laws as a conscript. Whereupon Beethoven wrote a petition to the Princess von Lichtenstein, which, however, to his great indignation, was not delivered. This petition read: "Pardon me, most gracious Princess, should you be disagreeably surprised, perchance, through the bearer of this. Poor Ries, my pupil, must in this unhappy war take the musket on his shoulder, and must as a foreigner in a few days go far from here. He has nothing, actually nothing, and must make a long journey. Under these circumstances the opportunity of giving a concert is entirely cut off for him. He must take refuge in the beneficence of others. I commend him to you. I know you will pardon me this step. Only in the extremest need can a noble man resort to such means. In this confidence I send the poor fellow to you, hoping that you may in some way ease his circumstances."

Even from this friend, for whom Beethoven interfered so actively, he was some years after separated by a misunderstanding fortunately soon healed. It was in the year 1809, that Beethoven received from Napoleon's brother Jerome, then King of Westphalia, a call as kapellmeister at Cassel. His situation had become so unfavorable through the pressure of the war, that a place, which would yield a definite income, must have been desirable to him. In the contract there was offered him a salary of 600 ducats, beside free equipage. Nothing but his signature was wanting. By this call the arch-duke Rudolph and the Princes Lobkowitz and Kinsky were led to secure to the renowned composer a life annuity, on the sole condition that he remained in the imperial states.

Unexpectedly Ries received a visit from the kapellmeister Reichardt, who told him that Beethoven had definitely declined the place of kapellmeister in Cassel; the question was, therefore, whether he, as Beethoven's pupil, would not perhaps go to Cassel for a smaller salary. Ries went straight to Beethoven to get more exact information about the matter, and to ask his advice. For three weeks long he was repulsed; even his letters were not answered. At length he met Beethoven upon a redoubt. He went up to him and made him acquainted with his business. "Do you think," said Beethoven, in a cutting tone, "that you can fill a place which has been offered to me?" He remained cold and repulsive. The next morning Ries went to Beethoven's dwelling, hoping to come to an understanding with him. His servant said he was not at home. But Ries heard him singing and playing in an adjoining room. He resolved, as the servant would not announce him, to go right in, but was pushed back before the door. Exceedingly provoked, Ries knocked the servant down. There Beethoven found him, as, disturbed by the noise, he rushed out of the room. Overwhelmed with reproaches by Ries, he could not find words for amazement. He stood motionless and staring. When the matter was explained Beethoven said quietly: "I did not know that; I had been told that you sought to get the place behind my back." Ries assured him that he had not yet given any answer. And now Beethoven sought to repair the wrong. He took every pains to procure the place in question for his pupil, but without success, because it was too late.

It would have been advantageous for Ries, if the plan proposed by Beethoven of a common journey had been executed. Ries on that journey was to perform Beethoven's pianoforte Concertos, as well as other compositions. Beethoven himself would direct and only improvise. In that way his performance was the most extraordinary that could be heard, particularly when he was in a good humor, or found himself in an excited mood. Few artists have reached the height at which he stood in this branch of the art. The wealth of his ideas, his variety of treatment, his mastery of difficulties which presented themselves or which he introduced, were inexhaustible. It was remarkable how his inspiration made him utterly insensible to outward impressions. "One day," related Ries in his later years, "after the lesson was finished, we were talking about themes for fugues; I was at the piano, and Beethoven sat near me; while I played the first fugue theme out of Graun's Tod Jesu, Beethoven began with the left hand to play it over after me, then he brought in the right also, and now he worked it up, without the slightest interruption, for about half an hour. It was incomprehensible to me, how he was able to hold out so long in that extremely inconvenient position." With an expression all his own he played the Rondo of his first Concerto in C major, in which he brought in several doubled notes, to make it more brilliant. In general he played his own compositions with a good deal of moodiness, but yet adhered for the most part to strict time, and took only occasionally, but seldom, a more rapid tempo. Sometimes in his crescendo he held back with a ritardando, and thus produced a very beautiful and striking effect. In playing he gave now with the right, and now with the left hand, some beautiful and quite inimitable expression. But very rarely did he add notes or ornaments.

[To be continued.]

The Science of Sound applied to Public Buildings.

A paper on this subject was read last week, by Prof. JOSEPH HENRY, of the Smithsonian Institution, before the "American Association for the Advancement of Science," in session at Albany, N. Y. The substance of the paper is thus reported in the N. Y. Tribune:

At the meeting of the American Association in 1854 I gave a verbal account of a plan for a lecture-room in the Smithsonian Institution. Since then the room has been employed two Winters, for courses of lectures to large audiences, and I believe it is the universal opinion of those who have been present, that the arrangement for seeing and hearing, considering the size of the apartment, is entirely unexceptionable. The origin of this plan was as follows: The President of the United States directed Capt. Meigs to confer with Prof. Bache and myself in regard to the acoustics of the new rooms in the extension of the Capitol. We had first studied the peculiarities of the present hall of the House of Representatives, allowed by experience to be one of the worst possible apartments for public speaking. To discover the cause of the confusion of sounds which exists there during debate, is of considerable importance in suggesting improvements in new rooms. We afterward examined the principal halls and churches in Philadelphia, New York and Boston, to investigate their peculiarities. It is an easy matter in a small room for a speaker to be heard distinctly at every point; but in a large room, unless provision has been made from the first for a suitable form on acoustic principles, it is usually impossible to produce the desired effect. The same remark may be applied to lighting, heating and ventilation, and to all the special purposes to which a particular building is to be applied.

In the erection of a building, the uses to which it is to be applied should be clearly understood, and provision definitely made in the original plan for every desired object. Modern architecture is not a fine art; modern buildings are made for other purposes than artistic effect, and in them the æsthetic must be subordinate to the useful, though the two may coexist. The buildings of a country and an age should be an ethnological expression of the wants, habits, arts, and sentiments of the time in which they were erected.

Architecture was with the Greek architect a fine art. He was trammelled by no necessity for doors and windows, heating and ventilation. His buildings, though objects of great beauty, and fully realizing the architect's intention, cannot be copied in our day without violating the principles which should govern in architectural adaptation. It is only when a building expresses the dominant sentiment of the age in which it is built, and is adapted to its use, that it is entitled to our admiration. Architecture should also adapt itself to the material employed; the tenacity and strength of iron points to different forms from those of buildings reared from the quarries or the brick-yard.

But, to return to acoustics as applied to halls for public speaking, while sound has been investigated within the last fifty years with a rich harvest of results, few attempts have been successfully made to apply these results to practical purposes. The science of acoustics as applied to buildings requires, perhaps more than any other subject, the union of scientific principles with experimental deductions. The human voice in speaking gives us a series of irregular sounds of short duration; each syllable being a separate sound, having a pitch, and therefore somewhat of a musical tone; and it is wonderful that the ear can so accurately recognize and distinguish such a very great variety of sounds coming in so short a time as in the case of rapidly articulated speech. No sound is ever perfectly instantaneous, and the impression on the ear lasts a small fraction of a second—which increases the wonder. The impulse from an explosion of a bubble of gases in open air is propagated equally in all directions, but the noise of a cannon, though heard in every direction, is much louder in the direction before and behind the cannon. Many experiments at Washington have been made to test how far the voice of a reader in the open air is heard in different directions around him. Other experiments were made to determine the distance at which an echo blends with the original sound. Sound requires time for its transmission, and it is reflected according to the laws of the reflection of light, or approximately so. When the sound of a speaker's voice strikes the opposite wall it is reflected back. If the wall is distant, it comes to the neighborhood of the speaker so long after he has spoken, as to make a distinct echo. By clapping the hands in front of a wall, at the distance of a hundred feet you get an echo, but approaching nearer you lose the echo when you approach within 35 feet. The difference in time between the sound and the echo is then but the sixteenth of a second, and the ear hears them but as the one louder sound. This explains the distinctness of the echo from the edge of a forest. All points within 35 feet of the edge would return an echo at practically the same instant, and the echo from points farther in the forest would be too faint to affect the character of the sound. The echo from the wall behind the speaker should be loud, because it will but strengthen the sound of the voice. Draperies behind the pulpit are a waste of the preacher's voice—hard walls in front of him, at a greater distance than forty feet, an interference with it.

A more serious evil is reverberation—that is, repeated echoes bandied back and forth between parallel walls. If the voice chances to be on the same pitch as the reverberation, a resonance of great force will be produced, to the annoyance of the hearer. The reverberation will depend chiefly on the size of the room, the loudness of the sound, the position of the walls, and the nature of their materials. The larger the room, the less number of times per second will the sound strike the walls, and therefore the less rapidly be lost. The louder the sound, the more there is to be destroyed by transference of motion to the walls, and therefore the longer will the reverberation continue. And if the reflecting surfaces are not parallel, and the sound is not sent entirely across the room, the more frequently will it strike the walls, and the sooner be absorbed. Here also is the value of paneling and other variation of surface, not to destroy direct echo, but to check reverberation. The material of the wall will also affect the duration of a resonance. A wall of nitrogen would scarcely reflect any sound; a wall of steel would send back the echo nearly as loud as the original impulse. To test the nature of substances in this respect, a series of experiments was tried with a tuning fork, first to show that the motions excited by setting the fork on the back of a solid body are similar to those excited by the impulses of sound coming through the air against that body; and next to discover what those motions are. A fork suspended by a cambric thread vibrated for 252 seconds, as was determined by holding under it a cavity, which would resound in unison with the fork, and listening to it with an ear trumpet. Placed on a thin pine board, the fork gave a loud sound, which continued less than 10 seconds, the motive power of the fork being communicated to so large a mass of wood, and through that rapidly to the air. Placed on a slab of marble, the sound was feeble, but lasted 115 seconds. The fork was now placed upon a cube of India rubber lying on the marble slab. The sound was very feeble, but continued less than 40 seconds. The question what became of the motive power in this case, as it produced so little sound, was answered by a set of experiments, proving that the sound was (so to speak) converted into heat. The amount of heat evolved in the rubber, was so small as to be detected only by a delicate galvanometer. Jule has, however, shown that the mechanical energy generated by a pound weight, falling through 750 feet, would, when converted into heat, elevate the temperature of a pound of water only one degree. On a brick wall the duration of the vibration was 88 seconds; on lath and plaster there was a louder sound of only 18 seconds.

A series of different experiments was devised upon the reflection of sound. Parabolic mirrors were tested by lights placed in the focus, and a watch being substituted for the light, the reflected sound and the position of its focus examined by means of an ear trumpet. Tissue paper, flannel, and felt were introduced between the watch and the mirror, to try the effect of curtains upon sound. The experiments on these mirrors showed the confusion in the House of Representatives to arise from the interior of the dome. There is another principle of acoustics which guided experiments upon the effect of heated currents—the refrangibility of sound. But the experiments confirmed the deductions of science, and showed that these heated currents produce no confusion in the hearing of a speaker's voice. The ear is a very poor judge of the direction in which a sound comes, and the difference in the lengths of a direct and a refracted path can never reach the length of 70 feet, which it must do before it produces any doubling of the sound. These researches open a field of investigation, equally interesting to the lover of abstract science, and to the practical builder, and I hope to pursue them further, and give you further facts at another meeting.

The new lecture room at the Smithsonian Institution is in the second story, 100 feet in length; and by occupying part of the towers a width has been secured of 75 feet. The ceiling is 25 feet high, smooth and unbroken. With the exception of an oval opening to admit light on the platform. It thus powerfully reflects the sound of the speaker's voice to the hearers, and being so low, the reflection blends with the original sound and simply reinforces it. The general form of the room is fan-shaped, the speaker being near the handle of the fan, on one side of the room. The walls behind and near him are smooth lath and plaster, giving a powerful but short resonance, which simply strengthens his voice. Not being parallel, they produce no reverberation, but send the sound out from the speaker to increase the volume of his voice until it reaches the farthest part of the gallery. The multitude of surfaces directly in front of the speaker—gallery, pillars, stair screens, and the seats, or the audience—utterly prevent reverberation there. The seats are curved, so that each spectator faces the platform; and the floor is also curved, so that the back seats rise above the front—not quite so much as we wished, and as is required by the panoptic curve of Prof. Bache, but as much as the size of the room would allow. The gallery, it will be seen, is in the form of a horse-shoe. The architecture of this room is due to Capt. Alexander, of the corps of Topographical Engineers. He fully appreciated all the principles of sound which I have given, and varied his plans until the required conditions were as nearly as possible fulfilled. This is the true work of an architect, for he who works by rules instead of by principles is not worthy of that name.

THE MARSEILLAISE HYMN.—"It was," said Lamartine, "the fire-water of the Revolution, which instilled into the senses and the soul of the people the intoxication of battle." "The Marseillaise Hymn" is the French Revolution set to music, and although there may be some sacrifice of sense to sound in the sentence, it is in the main true.

Its author, Rouget de Lisle, was an officer in a corps of French Engineers, stationed at Strasbourg in 1792. He was born amid the mountains that hem in Sons le Salnier in the Paza, and amused himself and his soldier companions by composing and singing love ditties during the leisure of garrison life. He is said to have composed quite a number of songs, but the fame of the Marseillaise has entirely obscured his other productions.

It is quite clear that no musical composition of any age has had so much influence over the minds of men as this hymn of De Lisle. In a week it had spread throughout France, kindling the most intense enthusiasm in every heart. The political clubs of Marseillaise, by resolution adopted it to be sung at the opening and close of their sessions, and named it after their city. Its author became obnoxious to the government, and was obliged to escape in disguise from the land of his birth. France was jubilant with the soul-stirring anthem. It is like criticising sunlight to criticise this famous hymn. Musically, its proportions are faultless as its words are glowing and spirited. It has fullness, rotundity, rhythm, accent, progress, culmination, all in perfection.

NEW WORK BY RUBINSTEIN.—This young pianist and composer, who has attracted so much attention both abroad and here of late, and who seems to try his hand at every kind of composition, has attempted some of the old forms of Bach and Handel in an "Album," which is reviewed by CHORLEY of the London Athenæum after this fashion:

Album, 1856.—Suite pour le Piano. Composée par A. Rubinstein. Op. 81. (Schott & Co.)—This suite, caricaturing the fashion of similar collections by Bach and Handel, contains a Prélude, Menuet, Gigue, Sarabande, Gavotte, Pas-sacaille, Allemande, Courante, Passepied, and Bourrée.—Such enumeration will of itself acquaint the reader that M. Rubinstein has aspired, in his 'Album for 1856,' to write music of the past,—belonging to a period when much of the melody which instrumental music possessed was still associated with dancing measures, the recurring rhythms of which precluded the possibility of an unbroken recourse to the fugato style. Yet, seeing that all real musical idea, if it deserve the name, may be defined, with rare exceptions, as melodious, it is fair to guard the ancients against the accusation of dryness of thought, which many have associated with their stiffness of form. In nothing are they more distinct from the moderns than in the vivacity and variety of their first ideas. Being themselves pilferers of tunes and phrases to an extent which, were it fully exposed, would make the hair of the purists stand on end, their works offer a positive mine of fancies, humors and phrases to the pilferers,—real jewels, which need only some change in the setting to amaze the world as so many novelties. Let us return from this digression to M. Rubinstein, who has, in some degree, caught the forms of the Past, but who is less imbued with its spirit than might be wished. The suavity of Handel, serene, or fresh, or pompous, but never sickly—the pertinence of Bach, quaint, clear, or nervous, but never ugly—are wanted to his dancing themes. As movements, the separate items of his suite are all of them conducted with such ease and decorum as bespeak the well-educated writer. Among the ten movements, the Prélude seems to be the best; the Menuet is a polonoise rather than a menuet; the rusticity of the Gigue is spoiled by too many devices of counterpoint; the Allemande wants simplicity; the Courante is flowing, and, as a study, in 9-8 tempo, of that legato style of playing which the taste for modern thumb-melody has gone far to destroy, is commendable. But the want throughout is want of idea; and to want of idea, however regular (or irregular) be the structure, no talk of old worlds or new worlds—of the style scientific or the style transcendental—of technical learning or poetical expression—will ever reconcile us. M. Rubinstein is, obviously, well skilled in the grammar of his art; but art implies fancy, as well as orthography, syntax, and prosody; and there is too much chance of this threadbare truth being forgotten.

THE SURREY GARDENS FESTIVAL.—The new Concert Hall in these Gardens, which was inaugurated this week with a series of grand musical performances, conducted by M. Jullien, sets propriety at defiance, more pleasantly than most buildings that have been built. Every rule is broken by the architecture. The hall is a tall and narrow oblong structure, having a steeply-curved roof, built in pale brick, with four corner pavilions of rich red brick, profusely flounced and festooned with stone-work,—these last connected by verandahs, balconies, &c., so contrived as to link the world of hearers inside and outside the building into one audience. Though there be proportions and decorations which, we doubt not, will throw lecturers into fits, there is a fantastic, festive, summer-garden air about the building, entirely distinct from lath-and-plaster flimsiness which, to our eyes, harmonizes all that is opposed to just principles. Within, the ear was no less astonished on Tuesday. The hall has two tiers of galleries all round it,—even above the orchestra,—and the orchestra, the space excepted which is devoted to the principal singers, is, without metaphor, almost thrust back into a cavity. In consequence of a larger number of executants being assembled than the building provides space for, a part of the chorus on Tuesday was placed in the gallery above the orchestra.—other sections being distributed in the lateral galleries planned for the spectators. Choral power might be lost, but the general sonority was excellent:—it was evident that all the solo singers were singing at their utmost ease. That the most delicate sound or the smallest word penetrated to every corner of the building, "up-stairs," "down-stairs," within, and without, we can assert from personal experience. No one, we repeat, could have predicated that a building without as floridly decorated as if it had been only intended for Mr. Dodgson to draw in water-colors, and within so unpractically arranged, should turn out so capital as a music-room:—but the fact is as stated, and we leave it to be examined and explained by those who have discoursed on "waves of sound," acoustic curves, and other scientific postulates and data connected with the subject.

As regards the Inauguration Festival, conceiving such a room in such a site likely to prove a boon to Southern London, and knowing M. Jullien's ways by heart, we would not be too exigent. A little "essence of Barnum" might be allowed to mingle with the ink of the programme; but we were treated to it, not in drops, but in quart-measures. There was a large chorus, collected from all parts of England, and a good orchestra, and the solis were the best obtainable,—but the assistants were set out in an array too solemn to be overlooked:—e.g., the following list of Conductors for the Festival week:—"Mr. Balfe, Mr. Benedict, Dr. Wesley, Dr. Wylde, Mr. Amott (organist of the Cathedral, and conductor of the Festival, Gloucester), Mr. Done (organist of the Cathedral, and conductor of the Festival, Worcester), Mr. T. Smith (organist of the Cathedral, and conductor of the Triennial Music Festival, Hereford), Mr. Stimpson (conductor of the Birmingham Festival Society), Mr. Mellon, (leader and conductor of the Ballet, Italian Opera, London), and M. Jullien." Now, every musical child must know that so far as music is concerned such a concourse of bâtons must make a Babel, and not an Eden, of this enchanted garden. This was to be felt in the very outset of the first morning performance, when a version of the Hundreth Psalm ("agonized," not "harmonized," to quote a listener in our neighborhood) opened the building, with the outcries of pedantry, not the "one consent" of praise. Let the new Concert Hall be accepted as a theatre for popular music, and the doings there should not be searched and sifted too narrowly;—but if "commemorations" and "festivals," and other classical doings, are to be promised as about to take the lead in a city where great oratorio performances are "the rule," not the exception, the puff must be less extensive, or the execution superior to that of 'The Messiah,' on Monday. If the Philharmonic Concert, and Her Majesty's Theatre, and Drury Lane must be tried each by its own pretensions,—so must, also, the Surrey Gardens—and the highest possible claims are advanced on their behalf.

Refinement presides there—elegance is to be enforced. Where curassows formerly cackled, where cassowaries stepped out, where elephants did vulgar tricks in the sociable hopes of buns, where hungry lions roared—a simple bear or two, just to please juvenile visitors, are, we believe, all the beasts that now remain,

Like brotherless hermits the last of their race,
To mark where "the Garden" has been.

The Surrey bears, we apprehend, like Goldsmith's immortal quadruped, will only dance to the genteelst of tunes,—'Water parted from the Sea,' and the minuet from 'Ariadne.' But we forget; dancing is to have no place in the Surrey Gardens. The smokers, further, are to be exclusively confined to one of the Kiosques hard by Mr. Danson's capitol-painted Bosphorus, by way of giving "the weed" an air à la chibouque. Base beer is banned in favor of more dainty drinks, since what saith the official programme!—

"Encouraged by the improving taste of the masses for more refined, in place of stronger, beverages, the Directors despatched an agent to Epernay, in Champagne, who has concluded an arrangement with the highly-reputed firm of —, Propriétaires Vignerons et Marchands de Vin, at Epernay, to supply Champagne from their own vineyards at 6d. a glass, or 5s. 6d. a bottle. The Directors are, therefore, able to guarantee the patrons of the Royal Surrey Gardens a genuine Champagne, of the best growth and the highest quality, at a moderate price."

We have small fear of being numbered among those who ridicule any attempts to raise the tone of public amusements, and who disbelieve in the increased and increasing intelligence and courtesy of "the many." But wishing sincerely well, as we do, to the success of every enterprise undertaken in this spirit, let us point out, that exaggerated gentility and stupendous promises will be felt in no class sooner, or more widely, than in that very portion of the public which alone they can be designed to assemble and seduce.

London Athenæum, July 19.

CHEAP EDITION OF BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS.—Our friend, Mr. A. W. THAYER, the able "Diarist" of Dwight's Journal of Music, has laid upon our table a copy of a new and very cheap German edition of Beethoven's Sonatas, for which he proposes to receive subscriptions at the very low rate of six dollars per copy. The musical student cannot make a better investment. We have been much pleased with the edition; the print is good, correct, and very legible, on white and firm paper; and the Biography which precedes, although perhaps containing nothing new, is well worth reading. Mr. Thayer deserves the thanks of every lover of music for arranging to supply the work so cheaply, and we trust it will be bought and studied by many of our amateurs. It will be worth cart-loads of Waltzes, Polkas, Fantasias, etc. Beethoven's Sonatas are an inexhaustible source of delight and instruction to all advanced pianoforte players, who have not as yet by the practice of trash, lost the power of thought and reflection. These Sonatas are the life of the master; his youth and his manhood. Whoever desires to read and study him in the original language, so to speak, should buy these Sonatas. They will give him a better insight into the merits and grandeur of the master, as well as into the history of the development of modern music, than the perusal of any number of literary works upon the subject can ever impart.

An improvement in the labors of the editorial department of these Sonatas we cannot refrain from suggesting. We refer to a more rational and philosophic arrangement of the Sonatas, which would prove of great assistance to the student. Would it not have been better to have commenced the series with the easier and more intelligible of the Sonatas, progressing to the end, and closing with those of the greatest difficulty of execution and comprehension, prefixing to each a few words in regard to the date and circumstances under which it was composed, referring also to the new and original steps taken by the author as he grew old in years and genius? But this refers to the question already discussed—Whether our whole pianoforte literature should not be revised for the purpose of assisting in imparting a spiritual as well as mechanical education on the pianoforte. We know of no existing method for advanced students, which does not aim too exclusively to the education of the fingers merely, without reference to the history and spirit of the music played.

Editions of the works of Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, and others, edited carefully, with reference to such a spirit, would advance musical art to the same extent, as the early appeal to the heart and reason of a child will be found the best guide in the difficult circumstances of after life. For this reason we shall always come back to this grand question.—Musical Review and Gazette.

Music Abroad.

London.

THE ITALIAN OPERAS.—The Athenæum also has its summary—curt and characteristic—of the season closed last month. It says:

Never was season, in our recollection, so full of stir, so void of creditable novelty. Mr. Lumley has produced only three artists—Madame Alboni, Signor Belletti, and Calzolari—worth hearing. The exhibition of these, the production of 'La Traviata,' the triumphs of Mdlles. Piccolomini and Wagner, and the unaccounted-for disappearance of Madame Albertini, after a début apparently as triumphant as theirs, make up the tale of the Haymarket—a tale of musical dearth and imperfection, let the appearance of popularity be what it may.

Had the dearth and imperfection been owned as such—had the engagements been apologized for as the best which could be presented under difficulties, the curtain might have been allowed to fall over Her Majesty's Theatre. But the song of triumph was never louder in misrepresentation of its misdeeds, even in the days that are gone. Never was the abuse of fine language, in mystification of the public, more unscrupulously accompanied with private abuse of those who have been unable to dispense with music in a musical theatre, and who have declined to join the chorus of praise that has been vented in honor of artists (so called) who have never mastered the alphabet of their art. In defence of what is good and true, then, and in instruction of distant readers, it is necessary to restate the case.

When 'style' and 'vocalization' are talked of as so many antiquities belonging to a past time, the talkers forget their logic. What is vocalization but command of the voice?—the same command that gives the violinist his power to play, or him of the trombone to shake on double D, if M. Meyerbeer exacts it. Let composers write plainly or ornately, the singer who cannot sing what good vocal composers have written, is no more a singer than the violinist would be a violinist who simplified the winding-up of Cherubini's 'Anacreon' Overture, and who, on being requested to shake, declined it, as a concession to obsolete prejudice. Tried by this law, neither Mdlle. Piccolomini, as Italian, nor Mdlle. Wagner, as German, deserves the name of singer. These ladies have given the public something else, we know; but that has been something apart from music, not in addition to it. Mdlle. Piccolomini has true instincts as an actress; and, as we have said, if not "hampered by music," might go far, especially in comedy. She might, too, it is possible, by study, improve the management and accomplishment of her voice, late though it be for one already enthroned as a goddess. Of amendment in Mdlle. Wagner we have less hope, since she has become famous in Germany during a period of contempt for the singer's art; and though theoretically she may not share the scorn, since she dashes at all the difficulties and brilliancies which other prime donne have mastered, her want of practical study, just knowledge, or due public appreciation, permit her to present the flashing for the deed; and this with a courage which will be proof to reproof so long as hands are clapped and bouquets rain from the Opera Olympus. We have already spoken of 'La Traviata' as an opera.

The Lyceum Theatre has been, perforce, on provisional allowance—small novelty having been possible there. Under circumstances, it is much to say that the excellence of the Royal Italian Opera performances has not deteriorated owing to the diminution of scale on which they have been given. It is pleasant to record, in honor of our connoisseurs, that this completeness has been well recognized. That Mesdames Bosio and Nautier Didie have advanced in favor—that Madame Grisi and Signor Mario have had fewer "bad nights" than they must have had in a larger theatre, and in M. Meyerbeer's operas—that Madame Devries has appeared—and that Signor Neri-Beraldi has been tried—are the facts which complete the record. On the whole, Mr. Gye, well supported by his artists, has so far weathered his difficulties sensibly and courageously, without make-shift or complaint, or appeal in formid pauperis; and we think this will not be forgotten by the public.

M. JULLIEN'S MONSTER CONCERTS.—The Surrey Garden Music has subsided to the habitual flow of M. Jullien's Concerts, which, as having a form and color of their own, matching well with their locality, please us far better than attempts at 'The Messiah,' 'Elijah,' and such grave works, demanding a public graver than a monstrous assemblage curious to taste the new champagne, and looking restlessly forward to the rockets, Catherine wheels, and bouquets of golden fire, which shall be discharged after the "Amen" has been hurried to its close. It is pleasant to see how heartily the music is enjoyed—the classical overtures and fragments by many; the pot-pourris and polkas by all. The orchestra is good, and sounds well in its new abode. Madame Gassier, too, is the nightingale of nightingales for a Surrey cage. A little more finish would make her a really brilliant singer—as it is, (to illustrate by a metaphor) her electro-plated ornaments are so gay and profuse in taste, and shine so little less brightly than the real metal, that they attract a vast and restless audience almost as well as brocade and festoon-work, finer in taste, sharper in finish, and more delicately precious in material might do. When it is lit up and peopled at night, the Concert Hall looks very gay. The somewhat disproportionate effect of height, narrowness, and tight enclosure which the interior presents may at any time be corrected, by the judicious introduction of color, let this only take the form of a tint richer than white in the coved ceiling and on the walls.—Athenæum.

Paris.

ITALIAN OPERA.—The prospects of the Italian Opera are very gloomy. Calzolari, the manager, knows little or nothing about the business, and he has been advised by M. Fould to resign after the season. He has engaged several stars, but there is no ensemble. The following is a list of his company:

Prime Donne—Alboni, Frezzolini, Piccolomini, Fiorentini, and Pozzi.

Tenors—Gardoni, Carrion, Balestra, Solari, and Lucchesi.

Baritons and Bassi—Graziani, Corsi, Cuturi, Nerini, Angiolini, and Zucchini.

Conductors—Bottesini and Alary.

The expenses of last year were,	754,322 fr
Receipts,	523,060
Subvention,	100,000
	623,060

Loss,	131,262 fr
-------	-------------------

In the list of expenses of last year are the following items:

Salaries of artists, six months,	345,000 fr
Chorus and orchestra, six months,	60,000 fr
Rent, six months,	84,000 fr
Ten per cent. hospital duty,	52,360 fr

The expenses of this year are much higher, although the company is inferior:

Alboni gets, for five months,	60,000 fr
Frezzolini gets	40,000 fr
Piccolomini gets	36,000 fr
Gardoni gets	50,000 fr
Carrion gets	25,000 fr
Corsi gets	24,000 fr
Graziani gets	20,000 fr

BERLIN.—At the Royal Opera House, Mme. Köster has taken leave of the public, for a time, in anticipation of her congé as Valentine in Les Huguenots. She was enthusiastically applauded, and recalled several times. Mlle. LERMAN, from the German theatre at Amsterdam, made her début recently as Donna Anna, but was not very successful.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUG. 30, 1856.

Robert Schumann.

A great musician, a man of real genius, and in earnest with his art, has left the world. His works will now be re-examined and more justly appreciated than they have been. He has been over-admired by a few, no doubt, but underestimated by the many. As a creator in the field of musical ideas, who has there been in Germany since MENDELSSOHN, who in all Europe, that could be called his equal? With all his faults, in spite of all the prejudices which his faults or his virtues, which the bugbear of "innovation," "New School," "Music of the Future," &c., have raised against him, it is vain to deny that Robert Schumann has given to the world some of the most remarkable and valuable compositions of the last twenty years, many of which bid fair to live and become classical. Such moderate opportunities as we here have had, to make acquaintance with his music, have abundantly sufficed to make us smile as we have read the wholesale abuse of all he ever wrote, upon the part of his most virulent opponents, the critics of the English press. Those exquisite songs which have found some circulation here; those genial, piquant, sometimes grotesque, sometimes lovely compositions and sketches for the piano, which the best pianists have let us hear; that Symphony in B flat, which has made such impression upon audiences accustomed to and staunch believers in Beethoven; and those quartets and quintets for piano and string-instruments, which have been admired in the same series of concerts in which the chamber music of Mozart, Mendelssohn and Beethoven have set the tone, are proof to us that there is something more and finer in the works of Schumann than could be apprehended by the London critic, who could only speak of it as "ugly" music;—or more properly, than he was willing to perceive.

We copied a brief notice of the life and character of Schumann last week. A German correspondent of the New York Musical Review adds the following facts:

Schumann's father was a bookseller and publisher at Zittau in Saxony. Robert studied the law, but his whole heart was with art. At the death of his father he inherited considerable property, removed to Leipzig and founded the well known Neue Leipziger Musikalische Zeitung, (now Brendel's.) He was a first-rate pianist, in the fullest sense of the word, and the most conscientious musician, aiming only at that which to him seemed great and noble in the art. He was of so reserved and taciturn a temperament that it baffles description. A friend visiting him might be for hours there and get only a few monosyllables for an answer; almost entirely absent in thought, he would still not let his friends depart. At the wine or beer houses, where in Germany all classes meet for general intercourse and conversation, he would sit the whole of the night through, thinking and plodding, but almost looking lifeless, except for the frequent involuntary raising of the goblet. When he spoke, however, there was great intensity of thought and clear judgment always to be expected. Totally unacquainted with business, nor caring for it, he had spent all his fortune when a brother died and left him his share. There was even a considerable thread made on this second portion, when he met with Clara Wieck, who became his wife, his bookkeeper, the manager of his affairs, who arranged his scores for the piano-forte, gave lessons, played at concerts, yet with exemplary maternal anxiety educated at the same time a numerous young family. A more united and loving couple never existed. They were revered at Leipzig, where they lived in close friendship with Mendelssohn. The veneration for this eminent "Trio" drove the good Leipzigers to the affectation of never speaking of them but as Felix, Robert and Clara.

When called to Düsseldorf as "Musik-director," poor Robert was out of his element; he could not conduct—he was too absent, and strange as it may seem, he went so far as to forget where the instruments were placed, and soon was quite incapacitated by the illness which preceded his death. He had been attacked on former occasions by delirium tremens, and became quite insane, and although there had been hopes held out of his ultimate recovery at the beginning, it soon proved incurable. Clara Schumann was the most devoted and affectionate wife and nurse to him. Both had become spoiled children by the almost idolizing adulation of the Leipzig public. Mendelssohn had his share of it, and showed it too when not meeting with similar incense elsewhere. We cannot but bewail the unfortunate end of so great a musician and critic, who meant honestly with the art, and who, more than any one else, rejoiced at finding anything worthy of praise.

A full and true account of Schumann, of his genius and his services to Art, is yet to be written. Perhaps we shall soon have it from one of the able writers of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. It is for a man like LISZT to render him that justice which he has done to CHOPIN and ROBERT FRANZ. His warmest admirers have not been blind to the faults, particularly of his earlier efforts. For the present we translate some passages from a critique upon his Piano compositions which appeared in the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, in January, 1844. It gives a good idea of the influences and circumstances under which Schumann first took his peculiar direction, and characterizes truly both his excellences and faults as a composer.

"In music, as in every art, the superficial, the external, gains a general recognition, long before what is sterling and original. * * * Recall, for instance, the inconclusive, utterly unfavorable reception at first of the Iphigenia or the Zauberflöte, of Don Juan, Figaro, or the doubtful and by no means general success of Beethoven's Fidelio, the Symphonies, Von Weber's Euryanthe, &c.

"But by degrees this uncertainty is dissipated in the public. To all that is truly excellent, however hidden and unknown, its day will surely come. * * * This may be prophesied, without any special seer's gift, of the piano-forte compositions of Schumann. They, too, in spite of their distinguished and important musical worth, have been known and recognized in only a small and select circle of those who have a feeling for Art; the great public, properly so called, remains but slightly moved by them; they have not yet succeeded in penetrating to the people, to the masses; while at the same time so many an empty, outwardly propped mediocrity has been trumpeted in good Jericho fashion as a paragon of excellence, and has thus acquired a certain transient celebrity. * * *

"Casting our eyes back, for a right critical and historical standpoint, over the state of music for the last ten or fifteen years, we find the following result. On the one hand, an excessive regard paid to mechanical facility, a partiality for executive, for practical ability, an over-cultivated virtuosity, a bravura that defies all limits and flies far above all hitherto known difficulties; in a word, a disposition to work wonders in a mere technical point of view.

"On the other hand: A more or less significant ebb of real intellectual, spiritual production; a gradual retreating and sinking away of the stream of thought that once rolled in so full and strong; of the peculiarly creative element; in short, the want of genial, original natures, the disappearance of self-relying, original minds."

The writer of course recognizes the manifold advantages of an enlarged and perfected technique. It is the excess of which he complains. The modern virtuosity seeks to reverse the true relation; hence the multitude of compositions, full of dazzling difficulties, which contain "an infinite deal of nothing." Of course there have been noble exceptions to this tendency; but these have not had pregnant individuality enough to turn the tide.

"Under such circumstances it is a great thing, not only to have kept oneself up, but to have floated steadfastly in one's own current.

"This merit must be thoroughly and in an unusual degree acknowledged in the piano compositions of Robert Schumann. Although for the most part contemporary with the over-practical and external tendency just mentioned—which threatens more and more to degenerate into the superficial, the humdrum and blasé—they have yet been unaffected by the influences of that luxurious, soul-and-thought-killing virtuosity; you would rather charge them with the opposite fault, although this is only half a fault, seeing that it springs from an excellence. * * * Certain it is that subaltern heads can never fall into such faults.

* * *
"In all the piano compositions of Schumann one remarks a constant striving after peculiarity, after originality in form and matter; although the former seems not to have been attended uniformly with success, and the latter often can be called in no wise edifying. It is impossible, too, to mistake in Schumann the strong and lasting impressions of the study of classical models, such as Bach and Beethoven; even more modern influences are sometimes clearly heard in his music; for instance, Franz Schubert, Mendelssohn, Chopin, &c.

"We do not speak, of course, of special reminiscences, of pains-taking, slavish imitation, so much as of something created in a like tone and a kindred spirit—a distinction too often overlooked by partial, narrow and one-sided critics.

"This striving for originality in Schumann sometimes disturbs us greatly; the wish to be always new and striking, and always produce something extraordinary, is too clearly prominent. Still more does it put us out of tune when this striving degenerates at times into a mere search for strange, unheard of turns and effects, into utterly unenjoyable bizzarrerie. In the first place the god-given spiritual spontaneity, the happy unconsciousness, in short that inexpressible naïveté, in which the highest charm of every genuine work of Art resides, is wholly lost by such a prepared and calculated style; and in the second place, pure, quiet, artistic beauty is continually violated.

"This is especially the case with the pieces belonging to an earlier period, which almost all suffer from confusion and overloading; and if, as Novalis says, these latter peculiarities almost always indicate with certainty a fulness of ideas, a considerable, if for the time being unarranged spiritual wealth, yet the same poet elsewhere says that the artificial is commonly better understood than the natural, and that the simple requires more genius than the complicated, although less talent.

"Now we may presume, that Schumann perhaps, for the very sake of a more decisive reaction against the every-day Philisterei, and in the spirit of opposition and of triumph or of hatred against dry, frivolous virtuosity in general, frequently gave too much of a good thing, crowded his works too full of solid, compact matter, so that one had difficulty in toiling through them, as through a thick and tangled forest. * * * But there is another explanation, which we would here indicate in passing.

"After Beethoven's mighty and Titanic apparition; after the soul-ful and characteristic strains of Weber, which soon followed; and after the noble, super-earthly, magically gleaming images of the sublimely gifted Schubert, and the truly poetic and intellectual overtures of Mendelssohn, had risen like meteors on the musical horizon, it became the fashion among Art-critics and writers upon musical æsthetics, to speak of a 'Romantic Music par excellence,' as of a field first won and to be cultivated in modern times. Musical Romanticism! People wondered what strange fish had been caught there out of the pool of musical terminology, while it was nothing but a strange and high-sounding name for something which we possessed long ago, substantially, although predominating less in some composers than in others. Or do not Sebastian Bach's two 'Passions,' his Mass in B minor, Piano compositions, &c., or Handel's Oratorios—not to speak of Don Juan and the Zauberflöte—breathe for us that wonderful and super-earthly charm, that musical-romantic spirit, which we have since felt in the mighty symphonies, in the Freyschütz and Euryanthe, as well as in the songs, so full of thought and feeling, and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" and "Fingal's Cave" of the above-named masters?

"Be that as it may: in consequence of that one-sided, exclusive and therefore erroneous view, by which the idea of 'Musical Romanticism' seems to have been at once screwed up to the extremest point of what is wilful, formless and eccentric, the most important and most promising young talents bound themselves together in a formal league, in which they pledged themselves faithfully and as exuberantly as possible to further all that had been kept back in the 'romantic' tendency to wilful lawlessness and extravagance. They took a mutual vow that they would always be as bizarre, as strange, as mystically deep and as redolent of genius, as it was possible to be.

"Accordingly, at all hours when they pleased they overflowed with the strangest perceptions, with the noblest and most precious feelings; they had in petto at every moment the deepest things, the most far-fetched maxims and artistic verities, and were always interchanging the most fine and subtle transcendentalisms, for which they scooped about them as with money-rakes. Care too, of course, was taken that all these splendors should have due publicity.

"This they called the New Romanticism, and themselves the discoverers, prophets and diffusers of the new light, the romantically privileged Neo-Romanticists by the grace of God!

"Our author also must be charged with a strong, although but passing inclination towards this so-called 'New Romantic School,' and we return to the pieces of the early period, before mentioned, for support of the assertion. As compositions which especially betray that influence, we name the following:

Allegro in B. Op. 8. Leipzig: Friese.
Etudes Symphoniques. Op. 13. Vienna: Haslinger.
Concert sans Orchestre. Op. 14. Ditto.
Piano-Forte Sonata. Op. 15. Leipzig: Friese.
Fantasia. Op. 17. Leipzig: Breitkopf & Härtel."

We must reserve the remainder of these extracts till next week.

A Portrait of Rossini.

A capital photographic likeness of ROSSINI was placed in our hands a few days since by the publishers, Messrs. Masury, Silsbee & Case, daguerrotypists, of this city. It is a copy of one taken from life, and represents the genial old man as he now appears. It is a fine, speaking countenance; just the face one would expect to see, who knows his music and has read much of his life and character. To enjoy it with a relish, one should, besides knowing the music of "The Barber" and of "William Tell," look back to those numbers of our Journal (Vol. viii. pp. 57-138), which contain Ferdinand Hiller's narrative of conversations with the old man last summer at a watering place near Havre. Every lover of those sparkling, exhaustless melodies, will like to trace them to their sunny source, and ought to have a copy of this picture. It gives one cheerful views of life to look upon it.

We have all seen portraits of Rossini a much younger man. Making allowance for the effects of age, the identity is easily perceived between the best of them and this. And yet the ravages of time appear far less than the accounts of his shattered condition had prepared us to expect. The jovial composer seems in an admirable state of preservation. Something may be owing to the wig of glossy black hair, contrasting with the grey whiskers; but there was no counterfeiting the vivacity and youthfulness of spirit that beams out through all.

Organ Concerts.

In consequence of the storm on Wednesday of last week, Mr. MORGAN repeated the same programme on Friday evening before a much larger audience. The Bach Fugue in G minor was again rapturously applauded, and encored. Was it not a mistake, seeing that the people wanted to hear that again, to throw away so good an opportunity of expounding Bach to eager listeners, and play a lighter piece, the Pastorale by Kullak, in its place?

For the third concert (Saturday afternoon) the programme was much better than before. It included:

PART I.
1—Fantasia, Organ, from Mendelssohn's Athalie, Dr. Steggall.
2—Andante and Variations in A, for the Organ.Hesse.
3—Organ Fugue (B minor).Bach.
4—Movement from the Lessons.Handel.
5—Introduction and Fugue.Mendelssohn.

PART II.
1—Overture (Oberon).Weber.
2—Fantasia, extempore, (introducing an imitation of a Thunder Storm).Morgan.
3—March, from the Prophète, (by desire).Meyerbeer.
4—Grand Fugue and Chorus, from Israel in Egypt.Handel.

The Fantasia upon Athalie was very rich, impressive music, with a well-connected progress of ideas. Hesse's Andante, a sweet and gentle melody, with variations in good organ style, was greatly admired. The fugues by BACH and MENDELSSOHN were noble specimens of their respective authors, and grandly played. The piece by HANDEL was that well-known movement from one of the Suites de Pièces, which has somehow got the name of the "Harmonious Blacksmith,"—always charming when so well played. The overture to Oberon appeared to more advantage on the organ than most overtures; indeed, many of the effects were exquisite; there were fine contrasts of coloring, and fine harmony and progress in the whole. It had to be repeated. The old stereotyped exploit of organists, the imitation of a thunder storm, was achieved to a marvel, with such an organ and with such a—Morgan. The "rolling billows" chorus from "Israel in Egypt" was sublime, as the March from the Prophète was stunning.

On Thursday evening a Complimentary Concert was given to Mr. Morgan by the members of the "Musical Convention," to whose meetings he had added so much éclat. The programme was as follows:

PART I.
1—Sonata in F.Mendelssohn.
2—Kullak's Pastorale.Bach.
3—Fugue in D Minor.Bach.

PART II.
Selections from Stabat Mater and Moses in Egypt, sung by Miss Whitehouse and Mr. Frost.
Songs, "Come unto me," from the Messiah, and "Tell me, my heart," by Bishop, sung by Mrs. C. A. Drew.

PART III.
1—Overture to Oberon.Weber.
2—Extempore.Morgan.

The "Sonata in F" means the one in F minor, the first of the set of six, recently noticed in this Journal, as published by Novello. It was indeed a treat to hear. The solemn, full, complaining chords of the opening movement (Allegro moderato e serioso), with those answering "angel voices," and the tide of harmony swelling fuller and stronger, with that bold and rapid pedal passage, to the close, were deeply interesting. The Adagio is lovely and full of consolation, and was exquisitely played. Then the recitative fragments, answered by grand chords of the full organ, is excitingly dramatic. The Finale, in the major of the key, is full of life and spirit; but those constant running and arpeggio figures seemed too rapid for distinct hearing on the organ; they are more like piano music. Kullak's Pastorale is a graceful, pretty thing in its way, and never fails of an encore. Still a third fugue by Bach! Mr. Morgan surely is entitled to the gratitude of all who love great organ music. Of the singing, so much as we heard (by the two ladies), we cannot say much. Its style was painfully mechanical.

Musical Chit-Chat.

Preparations for the new German Opera in New York appear to be going forward hopefully. Mr. VAN BERKEL is the impresario, whose agent in Germany has engaged several artists. "They are," says the Musical Review, "a baritone, a prima donna for tragic rôles, and a lyric tenor. The first performance of this new troupe will be on the sixteenth of next month at Niblo's. Arrangements have been made with the popular Ravel troupe to fill the ballet portions of the operas. We hear with much satisfaction, that many wealthy German merchants have already evinced their sympathy for this undertaking by liberal subscriptions for reserved seats; the number of these set apart for subscribers, we are informed, are nearly all taken. The rehearsals under CARL BERGMANN commenced some two weeks since, and have proved very satisfactory with regard to all engaged in them. The chorus especially is said to be better than any which has preceded it in America. Success to the new German Opera Company!" MARETZEK's announcements are out for a short season of Italian opera at the Academy, commencing next week with the everlasting Trovalore. . . . The "Thayer Female Sax-Horn Band" is the name of a concert-giving company in Illinois. They should make Calliope (who sings by steam) their patron muse.

The N. Y. Tribune notices a company of musicians, who, if their merits be not overstated, ought not to be neglected. They might form just the desirable nucleus for an orchestra in some music-loving city, which lacks the means of bringing out the symphonies and overtures of the great masters. The notice is as follows:

A company of young musicians of Belgium, forming a small but very superior orchestra, was recently induced by the promises of profitable employment in this country offered them by an irresponsible speculator, to come over here to give concerts at the watering places. But on arrival they found they had been deceived, and were left by the speculator at Saratoga in very straightened circumstances. Mr. Gottschalk bore testimony to their great ability as artists, and gave a concert there for their benefit. Mr. Gottschalk having highly recommended them to Mr. Maillard, that gentleman has given them temporary employment until they can obtain situations in the opera or theatre worthy of their merits. They will give performances for the present every evening from 9 till 11 1-2 o'clock, at Maillard's saloon, where managers or leaders desiring to engage superior performers would do well to go and hear them."

The New Yorker says: "We can fully endorse the account of the talent displayed by these young men. The obœ especially is an admirable performer. They form the nucleus of an excellent orchestra."

The great piano-forte manufactory of the Messrs. BROADWOOD, in London, an establishment of thirty years standing, was consumed by fire on the night of the 12th inst. It covered two acres of ground, and consisted of five distinct ranges of building, of three stories each, employing 420 workmen. About one thousand pianos in various stages of progress were destroyed. Also the workmen's tools, valued at from £50 to £70 per man. The total loss is estimated at from £100,000 to £150,000.

It is impossible to decide what JOHANNA WAGNER is, from the criticisms of the London Press. We have quoted some, decidedly unfavorable, in our abstract of "Music Abroad." Others on the contrary say of her Tancredi, that it was the only satisfactory interpretation since Pasta and Malibran:—"her beautiful person, expressive features, noble and graceful aspect, presenting a fine picture of the ideal hero of romantic fiction," whilst, the music being entirely suited to the compass and quality of her voice, "she entered completely into its heroic and chivalrous character, and executed its softest and most delicate passages with Italian grace, smoothness and finish."

A good joke is made of JULIEN's speech at the private festivity that preceded the public opening of the Surrey Gardens, London. He said that he intended to make the shilling concerts equal in every respect to the best Ancient Concerts—or Philharmonic class of concerts to be had in Europe—and continued:—"I would say—no—de programme shall be arl good—de classique—de fin moosike. No. Ari-ways, from de time I give de farst concert in Paris—it vas ven I vas seventeen—I put in de programme de fin—classique—moosike. But also, de frivole—de populaire moosike. Some tings I have write good. But I write for de many—de frivole. De frivole make dem comb. Ven dey comb I give dem better. I offer shinsheerbread, and ven dey comb I give dem r-r-r-oast-beef!"

Advertisements.

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THIS beautiful Art novel, by MME. GEORGE SAND, just completed in the Journal of Music, for which it was expressly translated, has been reprinted in a neat pamphlet, and may be had at this office, and at the periodical and bookstores. Price 15 cents. Copies sent by mail post-paid, for 18 cents.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIO,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.

CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.

Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

CALLOTT'S MUSICAL GRAMMAR.

JUST PUBLISHED. A Musical Grammar, in four parts. I. Notation. II. Melody. III. Harmony. IV. Rhythm. By Dr. CALLOTT. Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 231.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 23.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2.50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 232 Washington St. "
GEORGE P. REED & CO., 18 Tremont Row, "
A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 769 Broadway, "
GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.
G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Translated from the German for this Journal.]

The Life and Characteristics of Beethoven.

BY DR. HEINRICH DÖRING.

(Continued from page 171.)

Without over-valuing himself, Beethoven was so little free from artist pride, that he easily lent a willing ear to a friend's suggestion, that the celebrated CLEMENTI, who had been but a short time in Vienna, ought to pay him the first visit. So they only learned to know each other by sight, without coming into closer contact. It frequently happened that Clementi, with his pupil, KLENGEL, and Beethoven with Ries, sat at one and the same table at dinner at the Swan. They all knew one another, but neither spoke with the other or so much as greeted him. The two pupils had to imitate their masters, since each was probably threatened with the loss of lessons. Ries at all events would have suffered that loss, since Beethoven never knew a middle course.

A deeper and more painful impression than this constraint, to which he had been obliged to submit himself, was left in Ries's memory by an incident in which the often-mentioned sensitiveness in Beethoven's character was manifested in a high degree. One day when he played to his scholar his Sonata in C major, the latter was so delighted with the great Andante in F major, then included in it, but which Beethoven afterwards separated from that Sonata and published as an independent piece, that he urged his teacher until he repeated it. On his way home, which led him past the house of Prince Lichnowsky, Ries went in to tell him of the new and splendid composition of Beethoven. He was earnestly entreated to play over all he recollected of the piece. As more and more of it recurred to him, the Prince compelled him to repeat it once more, and the result was, that he also learned a part of it. In order to surprise Beethoven, the Prince went to him the next morning, and said he had composed something, which he thought was not so bad. In spite of Beethoven's distinct avowal that he did not wish to hear it, the Prince sat down at the piano and played, to Beethoven's astonishment, a large part of the Andante. Whereupon the composer was so angry that he declared he would never play again if his pupil Ries were present. Many times he desired him to leave the room. One day, when a little company, to which Beethoven and Ries belonged, breakfasted with Prince Lichnowsky at eight o'clock in the morning, after a concert in the Angarten, it was proposed to go over to Beethoven's house, to hear his as yet unperformed opera, Leonora. Arrived there, Beethoven in the most decided way demanded that his scholar, Ries, should withdraw; Ries, with tears in his eyes, since the most pressing entreaties of all present were of no avail, complied. Prince Lichnowsky went after him, and begged him to wait in the ante-room, which the young man's wounded sense of honor would not permit. As he afterwards learned, the Prince had been provoked at Beethoven's conduct, had reproached him most severely, and reminded him that nothing but enthusiasm for his works had given occasion to the whole affair, and consequently to his wrath. But the representation had no effect, but to prevent Beethoven playing any more in company at all.

He was seized with a very melancholy mood at the thought of the cold reception of one of his master works, the opera Fidelio. He charged it to the cabals of the not small number of his enemies. But the time chosen for its production was exceedingly unfavorable, since the French troops had just then occupied (1805) the imperial city. All the friends of music and the more wealthy portion of the population had fled from Vienna. The theatre was filled mainly with French officers. What Beethoven's friend, Stephen von Breuning, said of the opera itself and its production, in a letter from Vienna, June 2, 1806, to his brother-in-law Dr. Wegeler in Coblenz, deserves a place here.

"I promised you," he writes, "so far as I remember, to tell you something of Beethoven's opera, and I will keep my promise. The music is the most beautiful and perfect one can hear. The subject is interesting. It represents the deliverance of a prisoner through the fidelity and courage of his wife. But in spite of all that, nothing has caused Beethoven so much vexation as this work, whose worth the future only will appreciate. In the first place, the opera was given seven days after the entrance of the French troops, a most unfavorable moment. Naturally the theatres were empty, and Beethoven, who at once remarked some imperfections in the handling of the text, withdrew the pieces after the third performance. When things had got back to their old order, he and I took it up again. I recast the entire libretto for him, so that the action became more lively and more rapid. Beethoven shortened many pieces, and it was then brought out three times with the greatest applause. But now his enemies were active in the theatre, and since he had offended several persons, particularly in the second representation, they prevailed so far that the opera has not since been given. Already they had placed many difficulties in his way, and this one circumstance may serve as a proof of the rest: that at the second representation he did not succeed in getting the opera announced with the title changed to Fidelio, as it is called in the French original, and as it has been printed since the alterations were made. Contrary to every promise, the first title, "Leonora," stood upon the show bills. The cabal is the more unpleasant for Beethoven, since through the non-performance of the opera, out of whose receipts he was to be paid a percentage, he will recover himself the more slowly; the treatment he has suffered has destroyed a great part of his taste and love for the work. I perhaps have given him more joy than anybody, since, without his knowing it, both in November and in the performance at the end of March, I had a little poem printed and distributed through the theatre."

Beethoven's friends thought his opera would gain by curtailments. The progress of the action was too slow and dragging. Before the renewed performance in the year 1807, a meeting was held to take counsel on that matter. The circle was composed, besides the Prince and Princess Lichnowsky, who was a distinguished pianist, of the poet von Collin and Stephen von Breuning, both of whom had already spoken about shortening the opera, the tenor Röck, the basso Meyer, and lastly Beethoven himself, who at the outset defended every bar. With his excitable nature his rage knew no bounds, when a general opinion was expressed that whole pieces must come out. The aria of Pizarro had its peculiar difficulties for the singer, which Beethoven felt himself finally, and promised to compose a new aria. Prince Lichnowsky at length carried him so far that he consented to have several single pieces left out, but only by way of experiment, in the next performance, since they had failed once to produce effect; they could afterwards be re-inserted or used elsewhere. Beethoven yielded after long persuasion; but the crossed out pieces, among which were a duet in 9-8 time for two sopranos, and a terzet in 3-4 time, were never sung again upon the stage.

Greatly occupied and in often changing humor, Beethoven had for a long time discontinued his correspondence with his early friend, Dr. Wegeler, in Coblenz. It was the 2d of May, 1810, when he again gave him some account of his situation. In the opening of his letter, written in no cheerful mood, he excused himself for his long silence. "My good old friend," wrote Beethoven, "I can almost think my lines will cause you some astonishment. And yet, although you have had no proofs in writing, I still hold you always in the liveliest remembrance. For a couple of years past all still and quiet life has ceased with me. And yet I have formed no conclusion therefor, perhaps rather the contrary. Who can escape the influence of the outward storms? Yet I were happy, perhaps one of the happiest of men, had not the demon taken up his abode in my ears. Had I not read somewhere that a man ought not voluntarily to depart from this life so long as he can yet do one good deed, I long since should have been no more, and that through myself. O how beautiful is life! For me, however, it is forever poisoned!"

The motive of the request contained in this letter, to send him his certificate of baptism, is obscure. "Whatever expenses there may be," he wrote, "as Stephen von Breuning has an account with you, you can be made good at once, since I will pay him all here immediately. Should you yourself think it worth the pains to investigate the matter, and should you be pleased to make the journey to Bonn, charge all to me. One thing is to be considered, namely, that there was still a brother of earlier birth before me, who likewise was called Ludwig, but with the addition of Maria, but who is dead. To determine my precise age, this also must be found, since I know well enough that an error in regard to it has arisen through others, they making me out older than I was. Alas! I have lived a good while without knowing how old I am. I had a strangers' register, but it is lost. Do not be offended if I commend this matter to you very warmly, namely, to find out the Ludwig Maria and the present Ludwig, who came after him. The sooner you send me the baptismal certificate, the greater my obligation."

In striking contrast with this letter, in which Beethoven's discontent and weariness of life had risen to a purpose of self-murder, from which only his moral sentiment restrained him, was one written about three months later (Aug. 11, 1810.) With enthusiasm Beethoven described in this letter the impression of a visit, with which BETTINA, the sister of the poet, Clemens Brentano, and afterwards wife of the writer Achim von Arnim, had not long before surprised him.

"No Spring was ever fairer than this year's," wrote Beethoven. "That say I, dearest Bettina, and I feel it too, since I have made your acquaintance. You must have seen that in company I am like a frog on the sand; he waltzes round and cannot get away, until some benevolent Galatea tosses him again into the great sea. Yes, I was really high and dry, dearest Bettina. I was surprised by you in a moment when despondency was wholly master of me. But verily, it vanished at the sight of you. I would have it, that you were of another world, and not of this absurd one, to which one cannot, with the best will, open his ears. I am a wretched man, and mourn over others! This you will pardon me with your good heart, which looks out of your eyes, and your understanding, which lies in your ears. At least, your ears know how to flatter when they listen. My ears, alas! are a partition wall, through which I cannot easily have any friendly communication with men. Otherwise perhaps I should have confided more to you. As it was, I could only understand the great wise look of your eyes, and that has assured me I shall never more forget it. Dear Bettina! Dearest girl! Art! Who understands it? with whom can one speak about this great goddess? How dear to me are the few days when we chatted together, or rather corresponded! I have kept all the little cards on which your clever, your dear, dearest answers stand. And so I have to thank my bad eyes, that the best part of those flying conversations were written down. Since you have been away, I have had painful hours, shadow hours, in which one can do nothing. I ran round indeed at three o'clock in the alley at Schönbrunn, and on the ramparts, after you were gone. But no angel met me there, who would have exorcised me like thee, angel. Pardon, dearest Bettina, this departure from the key. Such intervals I must have, to air my heart. And you have written to GOETHE about me—is it not true? O that I might stick my head into a bag, where I could hear and see nothing of all that is going on in the world, because, dearest angel, I shall not meet thee in it. But then I shall receive a letter from you? Hope nourishes me—she nourishes half the world, and I have had her for a neighbor all my life. Else what would have become of me! I send here, written with my own hand: Kennst du das Land, &c., as a memorial of the hour when I first learned to know you. I send also the other song, which I have composed since I took leave of thee, dear, dearest heart:

Herz, mein Herz, was soll das geben,
Was bedrängt dich so sehr?
Welch ein fremdes, neues Leben!
Ich erkenne dich nicht mehr.

"Yes, dear Bettina, you must answer me that. Write me what the matter is (was es geben soll) with me, since my heart has become such a rebel."

The impression which the talented Bettina had made upon Beethoven, and especially upon his heart, lasted a long time. On the 11th of February, 1811, he wrote: "I have now two letters from you, dear Bettina. Your first letter I have carried about with me the whole summer, and it has often made me happy. If I do not write to you so often, and you see nothing of me, yet I write you a thousand times a thousand letters in my thoughts. How you are situated there amongst the world's rabble in Berlin, I could not conceive if I had not read it from you. A great deal of twaddle about Art, without deeds! The best description of that is found in Schiller's epigram: 'The Rivers,' where the Spree speaks."

In congratulating his friend on her approaching marriage, Beethoven adds a reflection on his own condition. "You marry, dear Bettina, or it is already done. I have not seen you once before.

Then to you and to your husband flow all the happiness with which wedlock blesses the wedded! What shall I tell you of myself? 'Lament my fate!' I exclaim with Schiller's Joan. If I can only rescue a few more years of life, I will thank the Highest, the All-in-Himself-including, therefore, as for all weal or woe. If you write of me to Goethe, seek out all the words which can express to him my inmost reverence and admiration. I am just thinking of writing to him myself, on account of the Egmont, to which I have set music, and indeed purely out of love for his poems, which make me happy. Who can thank enough a great poet, the precious jewel of his nation? But no more now, dear, good Bettina. I came home this morning about four o'clock from a bacchanalian party, where I was forced to laugh a great deal, only to weep as much almost to-day. Intoxicating joy often drives me violently back upon myself. I kiss thee on thy forehead, dear Bettina, and impress therewith, as with a seal, all my thoughts for thee."

In a later letter to Bettina Beethoven placed artistic worth higher than rank, titles and other outward distinctions. He had been led to these reflections by his meeting with Goethe in Tep-litz. He wrote from there to Bettina in August 1812: "Kings and Princes can indeed make Professors and Privy Councillors, and hang about them titles and orders; but they cannot make great men, minds which stand out above the common rabble. That they must let alone, and they must hold us in respect when two such come together as I and Goethe. Then even Majesty must mark what can pass for great with one of us. Yesterday on the way home we met the whole imperial family. We saw them coming from a distance, and Goethe made himself free from my side, to place himself on the side of the walk. Say what I would, I could not bring him a step further! I pressed my hat upon my head, buttoned my overcoat, and went with arms down through the thickest of the crowd. Princes and courtiers opened to right and left. Duke Rudolph took off his hat; the lady Empress greeted me first. The dignitaries knew me. I saw, to my true amusement, the procession de-file past Goethe. He stood, hat in hand, profoundly bowing, at the side. Then I took him to task. I gave him no pardon, and I reproached him with all his sins, especially those against you, dearest Bettina! We had just been speaking of you. God! could I have had as much time with you as he, believe me, I would have produced more, much more, that is great. A musician is also a poet; he can feel himself suddenly transported by a pair of eyes into a fairer world, where grander spirits play with him, and moved to noble plans. What thoughts came into my head when I first learned to know thee, on the observatory here during the splendid May shower! It was a right fruitful one for me too; the most beautiful themes slipped from your looks into my heart, which were one day to ravish the world, when Beethoven should no more direct! God grant me yet a couple of years, for I must see thee again, dear, Bettina! So demands the voice which always carries the point in me. Spirits, too, can love one another; I shall always woo yours. Your approbation is the dearest thing in the world to me. I have told Goethe my opinion, how applause operates on one of us, and that one wants to be heard with the understanding by one's equals. Emotion is only fit for ladies—pardon me. With a man music must strike fire out of his soul. Ah, dearest child, how long it is already that we have been of one opinion about everything! Nothing is good but to have a beautiful, good soul, whom one recognizes in all things, and before whom one need not hide oneself. One must be something if one would appear something; the world must recognize a person; it is not always unjust. That to be sure is of no concern to me, since I have a higher aim. The Duke of Weimar and Goethe wished that I would perform some of my music. I refused both. I do not play to their perverse whims. I do not make absurd stuff at the common expense, with princely ones, who never discharge that sort of debts. Thy last letter, dear Bettina, lay a whole night on my heart, and there quickened me. Musicians take all liberties."

[To be continued.]

Clementi's Sonatas.

MUZIO CLEMENTI (born in 1752, died in 1832) composed over one hundred Sonatas for the piano-forte. They enjoyed great favor in their day, and have always been esteemed classical models in that form of composition. It was only the deeper and grander poetry, the inspiration of a Beethoven, that cast them in the shade. The London Athenæum, takes occasion, from the republication of some of them in London, to recall attention to their worth. As our own enterprising publisher in Boston, Mr. Nathan Richardson, also has a dozen of these sonatas now in course of publication, we have thought that it may help to awaken an interest in them to copy here the Athenæum's article:

Clementi's Sonatas. Nos. I. XXX. André's New Edition. Scheurmann & Co.

In one respect time takes as good care of musician as poet—giving him a better chance than he awards to painter or architect. "Wind and weather" cannot corrode the forms and features of a score once on paper. "Littera scripta manet" is a truth that applies to a Palestrina as well as to a Pindar; and we are disposed to cherish the comfortable fancy that in music there is little fear of that perishing which intrinsically deserved to live. The rude trials and venturings accomplished in the days before civilization and culture—the junction of science and imagination—had made the art an art; the manuscripts circulated ere printing was resorted to, are not comprehended, of course, in the above argument. Traditions, it must be owned, perish; but in all the relics of music which exist, the form, color and proportion are there, unaltered by time, and thus within the power of taste (if taste be catholic) to appreciate, however remote the ancient form be from the modern fashion. The disposition to revisit and bring to light the monuments of music is on the increase. We have lived to see the discoveries in which Mdlle. de Montpensier's marmiton, the Italian Lulli, conciliated his Southern instincts for melody with the French taste for dramatic pertinence, and thus laid the foundation of a noble school of opera, resuming their place in the admiration of collectors and connoisseurs, not as curiosities, but as pleasures by no means to be despised, even in our days of meretricious exaggeration and exhaustion. Less extreme is the example now to be noticed. Still it is significant, as appearing at the very time when the counters of foreign music-shops groan beneath violent and chaotic productions, professing to be new, but in reality, oldest of the old. A new edition of 'Clementi's Sonatas' is a real boon to the race of pianists.

Clementi was one of the dry pianists we have elsewhere pointed out—a composer to be ranged with Domenico Scarlatti, Cherubini, and Spontini. Such "dryness" as theirs, however, does not exclude beauty, but makes beauty auxiliary to thought. At the other extremity of the scale stand such composers as Correlli, Pergolesi, and (in our own day) Signor Rossini; men with whom the fascinations of symmetry, color, brilliancy without harshness, sweetness which should not cloy, stood first, and intellectual pertinence came second. Be our classification admitted or protested against, it is certain that any one having competent knowledge, who examines this series of Clementi's Sonatas, will be surprised, not merely by the science they display, but by a variety in form and invention, only paragoned by Beethoven's varieties. Let us illustrate this by specification. In No. 3 attention may be called to the capital animation of the opening Allegro. The second movement, un poco andante, is as fresh as if Haydn had sung and said it (for there is saying as well as singing in Haydn's andantes), the Finale is built on a theme alike graceful and important; and Clementi's were days when bustle, rather than such real consequence as belongs to grace, was sought for in finales (as, again, the works of Haydn exhibit.) In No. 5, page 69, we find the progression used by Beethoven in his B flat Symphony (referred to in the Athenæum some weeks since,) and, with it, an example of licence, which in Clementi's days must have seemed heterodox. The passage in question—bold and new enough to have made its inventor enamored of it—is not repeated at the second part of the Allegro, as canon law ordained. In its place we have a cadenza, far freer than most of the improvisations (so called) with which modern concerto players work up their concertos. No. 6 is the Zauberflöte Sonata. No. 7 (* originally the third of three dedicated to Miss Blake, the second of which in D minor, is remarkable for its force and passion) may be especially commended for the sake of its Adagio and Rondo. The former is not long drawn, but expressive, new, and bold (as the burden passage of its last five bars will suffice to prove); the latter is capital as a mixture of sparkling and strict composition. No. 9, a Sonata, in G minor, is of a higher order still—a composition superb alike in its poetry and in its science. There is nothing in being for the piano-forte finer than its opening Allegro con fuoco, with its intonations and its meltings of figures, rhythms, tempi, one into the other (see especially pp. 137, 138.) These are as felicitous and as free as the "breaking out" of the Allegro in Beethoven's Egmont Overture, and the general tone of impassioned melancholy sustained throughout. The slow movement, too, is suave and noble. In No. 11, F sharp minor,—excellent throughout as an example of wild music—the Presto strikes us as having furnished possible aliment to Mendelssohn (compare it with the Scherzo in his Pianoforte Quartet in B minor). No. 12, in F major, might have been characterized as alla Fantasia by its composer. In his notes on Schindler's 'Life of Beethoven,' Prof. Moscheles calls attention to the recurrence of a three-bar phrase in common tempo in the 'Choral Fantasia' as one of Beethoven's inventions; but, if Clementi's Sonata was an earlier work, here we find the peculiarity anticipated with an effect of symmetry and strangeness combined, alike felicitous and quaint. The grandeur of outline in the opening Allegro in No. 14—the grace of the final Rondo Vivace in No. 15—the contrasts in the Allegro con spirito (No. 17)—the grace of the Maestoso e Cantabile (No. 18) all claim notice.—No. 21, in E flat, is throughout full of interest; and as a study of brilliancy and expression combined ranks high. The Adagio is one of Clementi's most largely-developed slow movements. In No. 24 the

* We intrude the above parenthesis because we imagine that the numbers on the title-pages of this re-issue do not represent the original numbers in the list of Clementi's compositions. It would be well if, in all such cases, the modern publisher would be more explicit in notification; since the matter becomes of historical consequence in a case like this, which involves the disinterment of a writer who may be suspected to have furnished suggestion to his contemporaries so largely as Clementi.

Cadenza (pp. 135, 6, 7) may be pointed out as one of those flights of fancy spontaneous enough to silence those who have been used to complain of the ancient masters of science as hide-bound, pedantic, and rococo. So far from this, they could be free in proportion as they were learned. The 'Chromatic Fantasia' of Sebastian Bach is fuller of notions and varieties than any ten caprices of modern times that we could name,—and who is more charming in melody than he could be in Sarabanda, Gavotte, or Bourrée?

These selected Sonatas of Clementi—to return to our immediate subject—will astonish many by the versatility, and contrast, and experiment they disclose, if examined as a body of works. And the edition does not yet include the author's Cherubini Sonatas, the third of which—his 'Didone abbandonata'—will never be forgotten among pianists of the highest class,—while the second, a fiery and free composition in D minor, deserves to be restored to our chamber concerts. Whether these Sonatas be admitted to indicate that Clementi had the mine and quarry whence others have drawn ore, or the furnace in which he cast and refined the product of mine and quarry with mixtures and amalgams of his own, we repeat that, as a series of pianoforte poems, they stand next to Beethoven's. They are more various than Mozart's, more muscular, less mechanical than Dussek's, compositions of the same form. They cannot be played or relished without the student's ideas of style being enriched—his knowledge of the capacities of form extended—and his mechanical command over his instrument strengthened.

The Right Object and the Right Means.

By DR. A. B. MARX.

What is really the proper object of all musical education and employment?

Joy in the art—we declare as the first object. A joyless occupation is it—and how frequently do we meet it! how common is the observation, unfortunately, that in the learning and practising of music, the original delight is quickly extinguished, never to be felt again in its pristine vigor and productiveness!—is fatal to the artistic sense, and is, indeed, more injurious than total disoccupation, since it not only misapplies the time which might have been otherwise profitably employed, but also destroys our capacity of receiving satisfaction from art.

But the joy must be really artistic—not foreign; and still less must it be opposed to art. We would hereby deprecate the tickling vanity which loves to make a display of extraordinary technical facility, and plumes itself on difficulties overcome. Nothing is more foreign nor further than this littleness from true art, whose high calling it is to raise us from the narrow limits of personal feelings, into the region in common, of universal joy, love, and inspiration; nothing is more inimical and destructive to the true sense and enjoyment of art, than this poisonous mildew, which overlays artistic activity and its productions. Nothing more surely draws the mind from the purifying atmosphere of art, into the petty, narrow strivings and contentions of self-seeking vanity, than this eager ostentation of personal skill; and, in fine, nothing manifests more clearly to an intelligent mind, the wide gulf which separates vain from true art, than this exchange of its outward means, for its inward soul and object. How general, however, is this striving in our parties and concerts! How rarely is the joy of the listeners the object of our concert players and amateurs! How much nearer have they not at heart to astonish the less proficient, and to startle the unartistic crowd with newly-invented contrivances, with a technical composition of a Chopin, or a study of a Thalberg, or whatever the latest finger-artist may be called.* And how often is it not the teachers who urge their pupils to this pernicious composition, simply in order to obtain more scholars! The lowest, most unreflecting, merely corporeal pleasure of music, the most superficial enjoyment of a skipping dance, is more artistic, more productive and nobler, than this monstrosity, which is so widely diffused amongst us. The feeling performance of the most trivial song or the most simple waltz, is a stronger proof of the ability of the scholar and of the teacher, than those precocious and forced, though in reality cheap productions of vanity.

* Chopin a finger-artist!—Ed.

The corporeal pleasure caused by art, awakens by itself a spiritual participation; and this spiritual participation in art we regard as the highest object to which our employment therein is to be directed. If we do not close our heart and sensibilities, by caprice and ill-directed exertion,—if we do not ourselves destroy our feelings, and the natural operation of our minds, emotion will spring of itself from the corporeal apprehension of the artistic work; a more elevated life will flow through our nerves, and joy through our mind, such as the pure enjoyment of art alone can produce; the assurance of community, of well-being, will loosen the hard crust of egotism from our hearts, and bind us the more closely in sympathy and affection with the friends who participate in our pleasures. The heart opens itself willingly to new sensations and an altered state of mind occasioned by works of art, and receives them devotedly, pure, and free from all the dross and sharp asperities of real personality; it is a communion of one soul with others, full of the internal feelings of humanity, and yet exempt from all oppressive materiality, or other disturbing objects. And thus this shadowy being, invoked by the musician's art, waves its life of high significance before us; we live in it, in pleasure or in pain, as the spirit of the artist wills; with him, faultless and untouched, our personality becomes involved in a manifold spiritual existence, and we experience in ourselves the countless riches of this spiritual life, together with our narrowly-limited corporeal reality. Herein we behold long departed beings and circumstances—those pure forms which Gluck evoked from Greece and the enchanted East: the patriarchal simplicity and dignity of that people, out of whose darkness the light of the world was to come, in Handel's songs: the mad confusion of the Pharisees and their party, before the holiness of the new covenant, in Bach's immortal works. All these pass before us; ages long in oblivion, seem sensibly present.

Whatever can move the human heart in innocence, joy, delicacy, and childish humor, the most lovely play of the imagination, and the most mysterious sensations of our spiritual essence,—all that Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven could feel or imagine, is laid open to us, and becomes our own.

The real indwelling in art, and sincere devotion to it, are essential conditions in artistic education; without them we cannot participate in its inestimable gifts; they are absolutely indispensable.

It is not the possession of great artists, nor of great works of art, which insures to a nation or to its gifted individuals, a genuine artistic education, and thereby the full enjoyment, the highest pleasures of art. If such were the case, no nation could be more assured than ours* of the highest musical education; since, during the last century, at least, our musicians have produced the most lofty and most pregnant ideas that have ever been embodied in sound. We have, on the other hand, experienced within a single century, after three noble exaltations, in the days of Bach and Handel, of Gluck,—Haydn, and Mozart,—and of Beethoven, also three several depressions from our upward flight; nay, if we will believe the loudest and most numerous voices of the day, it would seem that in many minds even the remembrance were lost of what in former days were universally acknowledged to be our brightest landmarks to excellence.

Playing and hearing only, cannot be relied on as a sufficient means of education, although they must be the foundation and companions of all musical cultivation; for we hear bad music as well as good; and we know that the weak and spurious produces its effect (often quicker and to a greater extent) as well as the elevated and genuine. We must herein the more readily acknowledge the power of sound, that even in its perverted employment it still exerts a vast influence over the mind and senses,—apart, moreover, from the effect of secondary objects, of prejudice, and of fashion. Indeed, it is not to be denied, that the corporeal effect of sound acting in large masses, in conjunction with considerable talent, magnified, perhaps, by partiality into great superiority, in the performers, is capable of producing from very moderate or indifferent works an effect which may surprise artists of judgment; but the cause of that effect is not in the composition—it is the attribute of the large body or volume of sound, and of the influential partiality for the performers. Hence we may perceive how small the claims may be of many a vaunted work of art, whose pretensions have been estimated by its immediate consequences. Those persons, however, are acting very injudiciously, who, desirous of no further struggle, seem contented and satisfied with the good that exists. It will indeed endure without further exertion. It will be conveyed from artist to artist, and the magnificent structure of art will be completed, so far as may be permitted to humanity. But the communication, the participation of artistic, and therewith civilized elevation to our contemporaries, cannot be allowed to remain stationary. The history of the world is reckoned by centuries, and at wide intervals. The moments of improvement progress like stars in the heavens, and with them as they roll; but the limited space of human life cannot dispense with its portion of their beneficent illumination.

* The German.

In fine, the mere external, technical, mechanical, formal education, does not reach to the deep spring, where the life-stream of art is generated and preserved. It is but too often observable, unfortunately, how empty and unproductive this false external cultivation leaves the mind; how, in its pursuit, year after year, full of the noblest germs of life, and capable of the highest joys of art, are allowed to fade and wither away. It has been remarked but too frequently, that these disciples of technicality, these virtuosi, these amateur dilettanti, these thorough bass cognoscenti, and æsthetical critics, have the most unsatisfactory conception of art, that they have little sympathy with it, are utter strangers to its nature and operation.

True artistic education, like true art, is not concerned merely with the technicalities, which make only a handicraftsman, nor with mere outward considerations, which, instead of living art, produce nothing but dead abstractions. It is governed by the essential nature of its duties, and assumes for its object the bringing into life and action the highest and fullest conception of art in each individual, and in the greatest number of individuals in the whole nation. In the pupil, it searches for the germ of artistic susceptibility and capacity. This spark it cherishes and frees from obstructions, and nourishes and strengthens into the power of life. It then contemplates the region of art, and examines what has hitherto been produced. Of all this, and of that which is most worthy, it endeavors to convey as much as possible to the scholar, according to the power of each individual. This education does not move the hand and fill the ear alone, but penetrates by the senses into the soul; through the deeply moved sensibilities it awakens the inward consciousness. And now the waves of sound may surge and roll—what the inward consciousness has apprehended, that which has become a sentiment and property of the mind, can be safely preserved and extended.

This, in brief, is the object of true artistic education,—to elevate the capabilities, mental and corporeal, to the highest point. This is the indispensable process, without which, high attainment in art is not possible. This is more or less the enlightened struggle of all who either wholly or in part devote their life and powers to artistic employment; this, whether it be acknowledged or not, it is the absolutely undeniable and indispensable obligation of all teachers to produce.

Shall it be considered an empty dream to desire for our country, so deeply gifted in the art of sound, a general popular education in music, in that high and only true sense? Does not this want and right proclaim itself from the deep inborn feelings of the people, from the overflowing abundance of their conceptions, from our countless artists, from our display of the richest productions of art in advance of nations? Shall our festivals be never more joyous with our national songs, which are more abundant, more varied, more melodious, and more deeply touching than those of any people on earth? Shall the evangelical church be perpetually deprived of her own appropriate music, which centuries ago was created for her? Shall the catholic church, in whose sacred service music assumes so important a function, suffer in our country so deep a degradation as it has endured in Italy, where movements from Rossini's and Bellini's operas, and Auber's overtures, disgrace the most holy moments of the service? Or in Spain; where in recent times, church music is dumb, even to the psalmody of the priesthood? We fear it not, and those who with us have a higher trust, will labor incessantly with all their strength, and on all occasions, to attain the highest object. We, a laborious people, strong in body and mind, must strive for a higher elevation than tender nature has conferred on her southern children, to amuse their happy hours.

Musical Practice Among Birds.

Many people imagine that birds sing by instinct, and their songs come to them without any labor or practice. But ornithologists, who have made the habits of the feathered tribes a life-study, hold a different theory, and tell of long and laborious practice in species and individuals to acquire facility and compass of song. The following information from a practised observer will be new to many of our readers:

Birds all have their peculiar ways of singing. Some have a monotonous song, as the bay-winged sparrow. The yellow-bird has a continuous chatter without any particular form of song. The cat-bird is a mocker. The golden-robin has a song of its own; but each one may have a song of his own, though those of the same locality are apt to sing the same tune. The hermit-thrush has a round of variations, perhaps the sweetest singer of the feathered choir. But the song sparrow has the most remarkable characteristics of song of any bird that sings.

Every male song-sparrow has seven independent songs of its own, no two having the same notes throughout, though sometimes, as if by accident, they may hit upon one or more of the same.

Six years ago this spring I first made the discovery. A singer that had taken up his residence in my garden, attracted my attention by the sweet variations of its songs, so I commenced taking observations on the subject. I succeeded at last in remembering all his songs, which are to this day as fresh in my memory as any of our common airs that I am so fond of whistling. On one occasion I took note of the number of times he sang each song, and the order of singing. I copy from my journal, six years back:

No. 1, sung 27 times; No. 2, 36 times; No. 3, 23 times; No. 4, 19 times; No. 5, 21 times; No. 6, 32 times; No. 7, 18 times. Perhaps next he would sing No. 2; then, perhaps, No. 4, or 5, and so on.

Some males will sing each tune about fifty times, though seldom; some will only sing them from five to ten times. But, as far as I have observed, each male has his seven songs. I have applied the rule to as many as a dozen different birds, and the result has been the same. I would say that it requires a great degree of patience, and a good ear to come at the truth of the matter; but any one may watch a male bird while singing, and will find he will change his tune in a few minutes more.

The bird that I first mentioned came to the same vicinity five springs in succession, singing the same seven songs, always singing within a circle of about twenty rods. On the fifth spring he came a month later than usual; another sparrow had taken possession of his hunting-grounds, so he established himself a little one side. I noticed that he sang less frequently than of old, and in a few days his song was hushed forever. No doubt old age claimed him as a victim. In other cases I have known a singer to return to the same place two, three, and four years; but frequently not more than one. I think there is not a more interesting or remarkable fact in natural history than the one I have related, and it is a fact you may confidently believe.—New England Farmer.

HANDEL OUT OF TUNE—CONCORDIA DISCORDS.—This celebrated composer, though of a very robust and uncouth appearance, yet had such a remarkable irritability of nerves, that he could not bear to hear the tuning of instruments, and therefore this was always done before Handel arrived. A musical wag, who knew how to extract some mirth from his irascibility of temper, stole into an orchestra on a night when the late Prince of Wales (the first royal personage who ever succeeded in "composing" Handel,) was to be present at the performance of a new oratorio, and untuned all the instruments, some half a note, others a whole note lower than the organ. As soon as the Prince arrived, Handel gave the signal of beginning Con Spirito; but such was the horrible discord, that the enraged musician started up from his seat, and having overturned a double-bass which stood in his way, he seized a kettle-drum, which he threw with such violence at the head of the leader of the band, that he lost his full-bottomed wig by the effort. Without waiting to replace it, he advanced bearheaded to the front of the orchestra, breathing vengeance, but so much choked with passion, that utterance was denied him. In this ridiculous attitude he stood staring and stamping for some moments amidst a convulsion of laughter; nor could he be prevailed upon to resume his seat, till the prince went personally to appease his wrath, which he with great difficulty accomplished.

Political Magazine, 1786.

TENORS, BY A TENORE.—"La Spia" writes from Paris to the Transcript, among other things the following:

A new tenor ("Poiseau rare" as the journals say) is said to have been found in the person of M. RENARD. He has a fine organ but does not know how to use it yet. The days of DUPREZ, RUBINI, etc., are passed, and there is in the list of modern singers none to fill their vacant places. It may not be known that Rossini's "Wm. Tell" shared the fate at first of most operas—that is, it was performed but a very few times and then thrown by as a failure. The critics found as usual, some rather effective choruses and a fine trio only. It was written for NOURRIT, who sang with a sort of mixed falsetto voice. Duprez had then just arrived from Italy and was engaged at the Grand Opera. It was thought great presumption on his part to attempt to sing against the favorite Nourrit, who was so much admired by the public, that upon taking his farewell, he brought his children on the stage with him and took a sort of family adieu of his friends. Duprez said he did not wish to take away any rôle from Nourrit, but would accept any one for his début Nourrit might choose to give him. "William Tell" had then failed so decidedly that Nourrit said he might take the rôle of Arnold. Duprez accepted it, and the house was crowded with the friends of Nourrit, who felt sure of Duprez's fiasco. The articulation of Duprez was so perfect that for the first time on record every syllable and every letter even, was distinctly understood in the opening recitative. The audience stared at one another and waited, not knowing what to think of the tenor whose manner of declamation was always at full voice; and after the first act there were but little enthusiasm, every one saying it would be impossible for a singer to continue five acts with such a method.

Duprez himself, between the first and second acts, entered the private box where his wife was seated, and told her "that without doubt they would be obliged to return to Italy." In the trio of the second act, however, he created such enthusiasm, even among his enemies, as was never before or afterward known; and in the aria finale he stamped himself the greatest artist the world ever produced. He gives lessons now to his classes at the Conservatoire, and has written two or three operettas, which have been done with some success. He is not as rich as he ought to be, as, artist-like, he lived very fast, and artists were not paid in those days as liberally as they are now. He said a short time since to his class, "Allez! Allez!! Etudiez!! peut-être pourrez vous gagner vingt mille francs par mois! il est vrai que je ne les ai jamais gagné moi; mais cependant il y en a, qui gagnent autant que cela!" (referring to Tamberlik.)

M. GUEYMARD, the present tenor de force, has been indisposed for some time past, and on his account the performance of Wm. Tell has been delayed. It is announced, however, as soon as he is recovered, which from all accounts will not be at present. A week ago, his voice was despaired of entirely, he having broken it in endeavoring to reach not the famous "do," but the "re," de poitrine. ROGER, his rival, is doubtless one of the happiest of mortals at present, and will continue to warble in falsetto for many years to come. Last week, Mademoiselle Duprez, the daughter of the ex-tenor, who sings at the Opera Comique, was married, I hear, to a young professor of the piano, and has had allowed her a month's vacation in consequence. She is said to sing well with a tres-petite voix, and doubtless her husband will make himself useful in playing her accompaniments. * * * It is well known that Nourrit while at Naples, hearing of the continued success of Duprez in Paris, committed suicide by throwing himself from his chamber window into the street.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 6, 1856.

Music among the Blind.

The blind have certain advantages over the rest of us in the study of music. The very inconvenience of not seeing notes drives them into more immediate and direct dealings with the sounds themselves. They commune with music at first hand. They cannot see how high a note is, what the width of an interval, what the contents of a chord; they learn it by the ear, they hear it. Such aid as they may receive from the raised characters, employed in our modern system of education for the blind, cannot alter the case materially. The fingers can feel over but a few notes at a time, where the eye takes in the general course of a musical passage or a whole movement. Hence where the blind study music at all, they learn to deal with sounds and intervals as fixed and positive facts, with the thing signified, and not the mere sign. Notes for the eye are a great convenience: but they also tempt to laziness in the exercise of the power of conceiving of sounds as sounds.

The pupils in Blind Institutions therefore often make good organists. Their attention is so fastened upon the true relation of sounds and voices in polyphonic composition, the development of themes by innate laws, that they readily acquire a taste for the strict style of composition. Then there is something in their very abstraction from the outward world which favors that deeper absorption in music as a world by itself, which is a condition of all genuine musicianship, especially in the sphere of organ music.

Music is made an important branch in institutions for the education of the blind. The Royal Institution at Paris has supplied many of the churches with organists from its graduate pupils. All the older institutions of our own country have sent forth qualified musicians, who have become teachers of music, organists, &c. Some of these have evinced skill in composition.

We are led to these remarks from perusing some organ compositions sent us in MS. from Philadelphia. They are the production of a recent pupil and assistant teacher of the Pennsylvania Institution for the Instruction of the Blind, Mr. DAVID WOOD, a young man scarcely of age, who has been totally blind from birth. He performed with great credit in the recent organ concerts in that city, for the exhibition of the great organ built by Mr. KNAUFF. He has been for several years under the musical instruction of Mr. E. PFIEFFER, teacher in the institution, and also of Mr. GETZE, a distinguished organist in Philadelphia.

They consist of three short Preludes, and a Fugue with Choral: the last three with a third staff for the pedal. The preludes are slow movements in strict organ style; all is clear as it is complex, all well connected and symmetrical, the themes naturally developed, each of the four voices being always obligato, &c. The technical demands of musicianship are fully satisfied. They may not show creative genius, but they do show a decided turn for this sort of writing, and amount to something more than mere phrase work; they are not without sentiment and beauty. The fourth is a regular fugue, which is made a foundation for the introduction of a canto firmo, the old tune of "Nuremberg," line by line, with intervals between, while the fugue goes on. This too is clear, ingenious, effective. On the whole, these are compositions such as do not often make their appearance in our American schools of music, and they would do credit to the Conservatoires abroad. By the annual report of the Pennsylvania Institution, we learn that the musical department continues to give very satisfactory results under the skilful direction of Mr. Pfeiffer. Twelve of the pupils receive instruction on the organ, and forty-six on the piano. Several of them are already qualified as organists in the Episcopal or other service, and others to teach the piano or sing in church choirs. They have an Orchestra among themselves, composed of thirty-four members:

The orchestra is composed of the following instruments:—violins, 12; violas, 2; violoncellos, 2; contra basses, 2; flutes, 3; clarinets, 2; horns, 2; trumpets, 3; bass trombone, 1; ophicleide, 1; great drum, 1; military drum, 1; cymbals, 1; triangle, 1; total 34.

Among the celebrated and difficult pieces performed by the orchestra, are the following:—The overtures of "Midsummer Night's Dream," by Mendelssohn; "William Tell," by Rossini; and "Le Serment," by Auber; C minor Symphony, by Beethoven; Weber's Concerto, for piano and orchestra; and other remarkable compositions by these and other great masters.

Robert Schumann.

We conclude our extracts, commenced in our last, from a German critique on Schumann's earlier compositions for the piano-forte. As instances of his more extravagant manner when first infected by the fever of what was called the "New Romanticism" in Art, the following works were named: Allegro in B, Op. 8; Etudes Symphoniques, Op. 13; Concert sans Orchestre, Op. 14; Piano-forte Sonata, Op. 15; Fantasie, Op. 17. The writer proceeds:

"These youthful creations contain much that is individual, sterling, and deeply conceived; many beauties that betray uncommon gifts, and single passages that are excellent. Especially from the last two productions (Op. 15 and 17) there flashes many a noble gem; still it is not wrought out, not purified from the surrounding dross, and too much disfigured by baser earths and metals.

"Besides this heterogeneous overloading, we find on all sides difficulties of the most appalling calibre, heaped up unnecessarily, enough to frighten away the most skilful, practiced player, if he rank not with the virtuosos by profession, with the Liszt, Thalberg, &c.

"Unquestionably the Fantasie, inscribed to Liszt, affords the richest and yet most unquickening luxuriance of this neo-romantic hyper-geniality. The eccentric, the arbitrary, the vague and undetermined, could scarcely be pushed farther. The transcendentalism, so loved before all things, degenerates at times here into madness and utter unintelligibility, while the striving after originality loses itself in the unnatural and overstrained. The composer reminds us of a rich nobleman, who, to make himself inaccessible to all approach in his aristocratic superiority, selfishly fences himself in from the world, surrounds his grounds with deep pits, high, thorny hedges, spring-guns, and foot-snares, and so fortifies and palisades himself that people are discouraged from seeking nearer acquaintance with him. The Davidsbündlerdänze and the Carnival-scenen are refreshing exceptions." [Dances of the members of the "David's league" against the "Philistines," or Young Germany against old fogies. For an account of this and of the little musical fancies, called the "Carnival scenes," see vol. vii., page 5, and vol. viii. p. 17 of this Journal.] "The first, thrown off as sketches, rather than finished character-pieces, are nevertheless distinguished by variety and individuality in tone and keeping. So too are the latter, 'musical genre pictures,' so spirited and interesting in their treatment, from which gleams a certain je ne sais quoi of genuine French esprit, full of epigrammatic points and barbed witticisms. It goes on in grotesque medley; a downright fantastical masquerade, full of humors and intrigues. But out of the wild, chaotic whirl, amidst the sounds of mirth and exhilaration, rising like fleeting Champagne bubbles, there meets the ear at times, with unexpected pathos, a single, as it were stray tone of sweet, sincere tenderness, and humoristic contentedness and constancy.

"If we go through Schumann's piano compositions consecutively, it is interesting to remark how the composer gradually gains in simplicity and works himself out more and more to self-dependence. The peculiar naturel of the composer himself, his musical subjectivity comes out purer, sharper, more decided, while there is more facility and conscious certainty in the handling of the motives. That awkward and disturbing heaviness disappears, because the composer seeks to rid himself of all superfluous baggage, all chance accessories, and limits himself to the essential and the indispensable. Whereas at first he always wrote so hard that, to use Boerne's expression, 'the axle threatened to break under him'; but here already you can entrust yourself to him with less danger.

"We must here mention the 'Kinderscenen,' (Scenes of Childhood) Op. 15, which belong unquestionably to Schumann's best achievements in this kind. Here, by a half prophetic, half poetic intuition, and by that plastic quality of mind which is peculiar to the objective way of viewing things, the composer has succeeded in so merging himself in single moods, states, and salient moments of childhood's world, and in so mastering them musically, that a susceptible mind must feel itself most deeply penetrated and most vividly addressed by them. How is this remarkable effect produced? How is the hearer transported into so complete an illusion? By the truth of the delineation, by the fidelity to nature of the coloring; by the fact that the tone-poet is entirely absorbed in his subject, has lived and felt his way into it, or rather back to it; in a word, that he has most happily hit the charmingly naive, the sweetly, carelessly gushing, real childlike tone.

"These 'Kinderscenen' prove most clearly, that what is significant and characteristic admits of being compressed into a narrow space, into the limits of a determinate form; that it is not always necessary to give loose rein to wild and planless fancy, and throw oneself into the arms of chance. The greatest artists often feel a noble and a finer pride in the achievement of what is great and individual within and in spite of formal limits.

"The 'Arabeske,' Op. 18, and the 'Blumenstück,' (Flower piece) Op. 19, must also be commended, as works more distinguished by their melodious flow, their clearness and song-like keeping, than by any special originality. The latter bears an occasional family resemblance to Mendelssohn's 'Songs without Words,' and to John Field's Notturmos and Romanzas. The soft, dreamy, tender, lyrical, almost feminine character of Field's cantelina, sounds unmistakably in both pieces. But the resemblance does not affect you unpleasantly; quite the contrary, because Schumann knew how to join with it an excellence which is foreign to the Englishman, and which lifts him far above Field; to-wit, an altogether richer, fuller, and more various harmonic setting, a more artistic perfection of figures and forms of accompaniment, than is ever the case with Field, where so much is loose and dilettantish.

"More independent and significant are the 'Humoreske' and the G minor Sonata, which we venture to pronounce the gems of the whole collection, full as it is of sterling things. In the 'Humoreske' the interest is kept awake and increased from beginning to end by the great variety in matter and in form, by the constant, rapid, and yet always natural and easy alternation of the most diverse images, ideas and feelings, floating in and out fantastically and dreamily. * * *

"Novalis says: 'A work of Art is so much the more interesting and genuine an outflow of one's personality, the more sides it presents, the more the ways in which it can be understood and loved.' This seems to us to be the case with the composition in question. If then we confess that we felt a breath from it as of pure mountain air, an altogether peculiar, keen, but invigorating freshness; and then again fancied ourselves in the midst of the young, fresh, impetuous torrent of the forest brooks; if we add, that a strangely sweet, shuddering feeling of power, of intellectual health and fulness seems to dwell in this 'Humoreske,' which imparts itself by little and little to the hearer, and gradually fills him with that perfect, blissful satisfaction, which one only feels in strains that flow out from the deepest and most secret fountains of the soul, we think we shall come tolerably near to the truth.

"Still richer matter for discussion and for all sorts of adventurous interpretations is afforded by the G minor Sonata; of which we will merely say that the composer has here adhered strictly and consistently to the existing Sonata form. In these last two works the forms and dimensions are larger and more developed; everything in them is more thoroughly wrought out and finished than in the 'Kinderscenen,' which are fugitive and sketchy, although kept within certain limits.

"The 'Nackstücke,' (Night pieces) are to be mentioned as containing in their rhapsodical and arbitrary grouping something that is like improvisation, something taken from the chance humors of the moment.

"Then there is the 'Faschingschwank aus Wien,' (Carnival pranks in Vienna) a companion piece to the Carnival Scenes; at least you find in it the same shifting medley, the same over-foaming, sparkling humor. Humoristic heat-lightings on all sides; everywhere the rockets of wit and jubilant spirits shoot up the imps of roguish mockery and most unbridled whim hiss around us, for example, on page 7, 8 and 9, where among other things, the old-fashioned, right Philistinish and 'foggy' motive: Als der Grossvater die Grossmutter nahm, (which appears also in the Carnival) produces a grotesque contrast and a most comical rococo effect. The most musically rich of these fancy pictures doubtless is the Intermezzo, No. 4. How such a dark fellow, such a marplot and genuine Old Grumbler, looking out so threatening and repulsive from under his E flat minor visor, could happen into this jovial company, it is not easy to see. The harsh, serious and stern tone, before which all joy and cheerfulness must freeze to death, is hardly suited to such pranks. Once happily passed this Intermezzo, and we breathe freely again, as if we felt delivered from an evil charm, and could call after him, like Shakspeare's Orlando to Master Jacques: 'I am glad of your departure; adieu, good Monsieur Melancholy!'

The writer closes his review of these earlier works with the belief "that they are to be counted among the most significant productions of Art at the present day (1844), distinguished throughout by a high and noble striving, and containing in themselves many germs of a new era."

A Grave Professor.

Another of those incredible programmes has been placed before us, of the miraculous concerts by which the musical ideas of people in our country villages are continually lifted to the top-wave of sublimity and ecstasy. This was a concert at Sharon Springs. The hero thereof was a blind man, yeelp'd Prof. W. A. CARRS, "the lion bass of the world." The show-bill further states that Prof. C. is a young man of 21 years of age. "He pronounces distinctly words of two or more syllables on GG in the Bass, and up to BB in alt, making a compass of about four octaves and a half! He excels in instrumental music, performing upon the Melodeon and Piano with exquisite taste. He plays some of the most difficult opera music upon the Cornet, in connection with either of these instruments, at the same time. He also plays tunes upon a common wire, about three feet long, and imitates on these instruments a locomotive in full operation. He is also able to play the most difficult music upon two different instruments at the same time, and imitates a full brass band! Produces three different tones on one instrument, and gives a most perfect imitation of a locomotive, in motion, in times of danger, arriving and leaving stations, and imitates the steam, whistle, and bell, with wonderful precision." We have our own suspicions about this blind professor. There is a smell of sulphur about it. He surely cannot be of this world; or he is in league with powers below. Nor is our terror dissipated by the lugubrious, phantasmal, church-yard character of his "suitable selections for the evening's entertainment," which include the following "sentimental" pieces:—

Greeting: Introductory.
The Maniac: A Scene in a Lunatic Asylum.
The Old Sexton: A piece in which is represented a Sexton burying the dead, the falling of the dirt on the coffin, &c.
The Spell: A song of Love.
The Green Bay Tree: Disappointed Love.
Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep: Representing the waves of the ocean dashing and foaming.
The Phantom Chorus.
Death of Napoleon: Bass Solo.
Boyhood Days: Bass Solo.
Giant Song: Bass Solo.
I looked around.
My Mother and my Home.—These lines were suggested on the occasion of a mother watching by the death-bed of her son.
Would we'd never met.
Man the Life-Boat: A Song of Shipwreck.
I'm afloat: Pirate Song.
A Life on the Ocean Wave.
Grave of Bonaparte.
Wrongs and Woes: Bass Solo.
My Name in the Sand: Bass Solo.
N. B.—The Sleigh Ride: Pumpkin Pie: We're all dodging, &c.

Those cheerful pumpkins and sleigh-rides at the end, however, indicate a funny ghost. But the ceremonies conclude with three "overtures," entitled, "The Locomotive," "The Storm," and—"DEATH!"—after which this professor of the black art, redivivus, treats his appalled audience to feats of ventriloquism, "mysterious disappearances," &c.

"Father HEINRICH" is again meditating in his old age a return flight over the ocean to his German home; and the thought suggesting certain analogies with scenes in his hermit life in the Western forests, he has added another (the Opus 77) to that list of stupendous tone-works of his, which have always proved impracticable to our orchestras. He sends us the fantastic programme:

Programme of the 77th Work of A. P. H.

COLUMBÆ:

THE WILD OR PASSENGER PIGEONS.

- Grande Capriccio Volante.* A Characteristic American Tone-Picture, for full Orchestra.
- No. 1. The sitting of birds, and thunder-like flappings of a passing phalanx of American Wild Pigeons.
 2. The aerial armies alight on the primeval forest trees, which bend and crash beneath their weight.
 3. A twilight scene. The cooing of the doves, previous to their nightly repose.
 4. With Aurora comes the conflict for the beech-nuts.
 5. The vast conclave in grand council resolve to migrate elsewhere.
 6. Sudden rise and flight of the myriad winged emigrants.
 7. The presence of hunters startles the multitudinous array.
 8. The wounded and dying sink tumultuously earthward.
 9. In brooding agitation the Columbines continue their flight, darkening the welkin, as they utter their aerial requiem, but passing onward, ever onward to the goal of their nomadic wandering—

The green Savannas of the New World.

A recollection of a Hermit in his Log-house in Kentucky. ANTHONY PHILIP HEINRICH.

MOTTO.

In dark'ning clouds the westward pigeons fly,
And winged thunders shake the brooding sky;
The forest rocks—the waters surfeited rise,
With answering quake the echoing earth replies.

DUGANNE.

Musical Chat-Chat.

It is stated, on the authority of a private letter from London, that GRISI and MARIO have resolved to visit America again, and may be expected during the next winter. . . . The New York Musical World, (RICHARD STORRS WILLIS, editor,) in commencing a new volume this day, with "a weekly issue of 15,000 copies," announces an important accession to its editorial corps in "that Nestor of the musical profession," Dr. EDWARD HODGES, the learned organist of Trinity Church. We may expect some spicy criticisms. We congratulate friends WILLIS and MORAND on the remarkable success of their journal; we should be glad of half as much. The Musical Review (Messrs. MASON & BROTHERS) informs its readers regularly upon its title-page that its circulation is more than three times that of any other musical periodical:—45,000, then! Forty-five thousand people in our country, who love and think of Music as an Art enough to subscribe to a musical Art journal! Verily we are a musical people. The best musical journals in Germany, even, count their subscribers by hundreds, and not by thousands.

MAREZKE opened most brilliantly at the New York Academy on Monday night—at least so far as audience goes—for there was a rush of many more than could obtain entrance. The piece was Il Trovatore; the principal singers Mme. LAGRANGE, Mlle. VENTALDI (as the Gipsy), AMODIO and BRIGNOLI. On Wednesday evening TIBERINI, the new tenor, lately from Havana, of whom great things were said beforehand, appeared in Lucia di Lammermoor. The N. Y. Times says he is about equal to BRIGNOLI. . . . The New York Musical World informs us that "a German Opera troupe commences at Boston in September"; "said to be a large and most efficient company, and will give German, Italian and French operas." This is too good news to have reached us here, where Boston is, and we are all eager to learn particulars. . . . Still another new psalm book!—making six this season. This last goes right up to the stars, calling itself "The Celestina"; it is the production of a tuneful swain rejoicing in the name of VIRGIL CORYDON TAYLOR.

HENRY B. SQUIRES, the American vocalist (tenor) will shortly return from Naples. . . . VESTVALI is at Hoboken, getting up her wardrobe for her opera in Mexico, and her brother is in Europe, forwarding singers for the troupe. . . . Our young townsman, Mr. NATHAN B. CLAPP, the pianist, who has been studying for two years at the Musical Conservatorium in Leipzig, is now on his way home to his native city, (if he has not already arrived,) bringing very high testimonials from his professors, Moscheles, Plaidy, Richter, and others. We believe he intends to establish himself in Boston, and trust that he will find patronage, and strengthen the cause of true Art in our community. At least we are encouraged to hope this by the kind of interest he has shown in music while abroad, (see notices of private concerts, &c. in Leipzig in our columns during the last winter.)

A concert for the benefit of the French sufferers by the late inundations was given on the 14th ult. at Baden-Baden; with grand orchestra and chorus, conducted by BERLIOZ, and with Mlle. DUPREZ and Mme. VIARDOT, from Paris, and Herr GRIMMER, from Karlsruhe, as solo singers. . . . Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was recently given at Geneva by more than seven hundred performers. . . . BORDOGNI, the famous singing-master, died recently in Paris.

German journals mention that Prof. Cornelius, the painter, has lately been appearing as an amateur composer of music, in the shape of sacred works and Lieder,—and announce that the Duke of Saxe-Coburg is engaged on a fifth opera, entitled 'Diana,' . . . The Gazette Musicale of Paris states that five MS. Quartets for stringed instruments, by Donizetti, have been for some time in the hands of Signor Piatti; and that on being tried by him and three Italian partners they proved to be of "a magnificent beauty." . . . Mr. White, a young artist of color, the other day carried off the first prize for violin playing, in an arena no less ambitious than that of the Paris Conservatoire.

The London Athenæum has some pertinent remarks upon a point to which we have before called attention, and which we hope will some day be practically considered by our music-publishers. It says:

A musical friend throws out a suggestion, the importance of which needs no word of ours to commend it.—"Why," says he, "is published music never dated?" The complete works of a writer like Dr. Spohr (to give an instance) may stretch over half a century. It is true they are numbered, for the most part—but their number represents the order of composition, not of publication. A time comes when original editions are exhausted—and when from the dispersed mass of the master's works, unequal in value, some professor or publisher shall select and re-issue that which is of permanent value. In this re-issue of course the numerical sequence may be broken, and the guidance of a date would be most welcome. The suggestion of our friend was called out in reference to the republication of the best among Clementi's hundred and six Sonatas, making four-and-thirty works (vide Fétis). Few who examine the new series, and who remark the numerous examples of imitation or of resemblance to the works of other writers which Clementi's Sonatas contain, will not wish to ascertain how far certain ideas have been anticipations, coincidences, or recollections. As matters stand, however, precise information on the subject is hardly attainable.

Advertisements.

SINGING AT SIGHT.

A Sight Singing School will be opened by D. U. MARTIN, at the Christian Baptist Church, corner of Kneeland and Tyler Streets, on Monday Evening, Sept. 23, when Prof. H. W. DAY, A. M., the well-known inventor of the method, will deliver a free opening Lecture.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE

Has the honor to announce that she will re-open her MORNING and AFTERNOON CLASSES for the instruction of YOUNG LADIES on the PIANO-FORTE, on MONDAY, Sept. 23, and on WEDNESDAY, Oct. 1. Terms, Fifteen dollars for Twenty-four lessons. Applications to be made, for classes or private lessons, at Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE's residence, No. 55 Hancock St.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

Is now ready to receive pupils. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, at Richardson's Musical Exchange, Reed's Music Store, or at his residence, No. 86 Pinckney Street.

Sig. BENDELARI's class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, will commence on Tuesday, Oct. 6th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., in the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, where the exercises will be continued every Tuesday and Friday afternoon, at the same hour.

For the benefit of those members of the class of last year, who may wish to continue their practice, the lessons will be resumed in the course of October.

A Magnificent Edition of Beethoven's Sonatas.

Printed from Engraved Plates. For Six Dollars.

The 32 Sonatas, complete, 524 pages of Music, in two volumes, with portrait, light binding. Price $6. The same, superbly bound in cloth, embossed and lettered, price $7.

Desirous of placing the best musical works within reach of the great mass of the people, the undersigned presents, as first of the series, the above celebrated compositions, and would direct special attention to the SUPERIORITY of this EDITION OVER ALL OTHERS. It is printed from new, engraved music plates, each note being clear and accurate in its outline, rendering each page remarkably distinct. The copy employed has been the latest German edition, and an unusual amount of labor and expense has been bestowed on the work, in order to avoid typographical errors, however minute. Reliance can therefore be placed upon this edition as being in every particular an exact reprint of the best German, while superior plates, paper, press-work, binding, and general appearance render this American edition vastly preferable to all foreign copies, especially when the latter are printed upon type used for common Psalmody, &c.

In continuance of this series of Classic Musical Compositions will be issued in rapid succession, and sold at the same extraordinary low rate of additional prices, Piano-forte works of Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart and others.

The great expense attending the publication of these works and the low price at which it is proposed to furnish them, can only be met by large sales; and it is hoped that all those favoring the circulation of an advanced style of music, and a consequent cultivation of a fine musical taste throughout our country, will so far aid the enterprise as to become purchasers of this edition of BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS, as also of the works that may follow.

Published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

NEW MUSIC BOOK!

THE HOSANNA:

A New Collection of Psalm and Hymn Tunes, Anthems, Motets, Sentences and Chants, for the use of Choirs, Congregations, Singing Schools and Musical Associations. Arranged and Composed by LEONARD MARSHALL, Director of Music at the Chambers Street Church, Boston, Editor of "The Harpsichord," &c.

The publishers respectfully call the attention of parties in want of a new music book to "The Hosanna." The most eminent professors who have examined it, pronounce it the very best book, taken in all its details, ever published.

Prof. B. F. Baker says:

"I am much pleased with the spirit and general character of the musical compositions and arrangements for 'The Hosanna.'"

Prof. E. Bruce and L. O. Emerson say:

"We have examined with much care 'The Hosanna,' and can with confidence recommend it to the public. We predict for it an extensive circulation."

Prof. J. Sherwin says:

"'The Hosanna' will be one of the best books now in use. I shall give it my cordial approbation."

Prof. S. B. Ball says:

"Please send me copies for my choir. I most cordially recommend the work to those in want of a really good collection of Church Music."

Prof. G. W. Copeland says:

"It is the best collection which has been issued from the American press."

Prof. W. H. Guilford says:

"It is the best American collection of Church Music I have yet seen. I think it peculiarly adapted to the present wants of our churches."

"The Hosanna" is a handsomely printed volume of 384 pages. A specimen of the work will be sent gratis, or copies will be mailed post-paid, on receipt of 75 cents.

WHITTEMORE, NILES & HALL,
PUBLISHERS,

114 Washington Street, Boston.

TO PIANO-FORTE PLAYERS.

THE undersigned would call the attention of all who desire to possess the works for piano-forte solo by the greatest masters, to a new, correct, and elegant stereotype edition now issuing from the press in Germany. Depending upon a very extensive sale of this edition, the publisher has put his prices so low that no one who really desires to carry the practice of the instrument beyond the performance of a few songs, polkas, quicksteps, and the like, need be deprived of complete sets of the grandest and most beautiful works yet composed for the Piano-Forte.

The edition already extends to the following works, which are ready for delivery:—

THE PIANO-FORTE SONATAS OF BEETHOVEN, 32 in number, in two volumes, comprising over 450 pages of music.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF MOZART, for two and four hands, in two volumes: Vol. I. containing 19 Sonatas for two hands; Vol. II. containing 22 pieces, consisting of Rondos, Fantasias, Adagios, Minuets, Variations and the like, for two hands, together with four Sonatas and several other pieces for four hands.

THE COMPLETE PIANO-FORTE WORKS OF JOSEPH HAYDN are in course of publication, also in two volumes, consisting of 84 Sonatas, four books of Variations, a Fantasia, a Capriccio and an Adagio.

An Additional Volume of BEETHOVEN'S PIANO-FORTE WORKS for two hands, is also in preparation, which is to contain his Variations, and smaller works generally, not included among the thirty-two Sonatas.

The undersigned proposes to visit Germany again in the course of the ensuing autumn, and would be happy to receive orders for any or all of the above works. The publisher of this Journal has kindly consented to receive and forward to him all such orders, and also to receive and distribute the volumes when forwarded from Germany. It is possible to import these works at the prices given below, only upon the plan of a subscription; nor can any be ordered until a sufficient number of subscribers are obtained to bring the expenses arising from transportation, duties, exchange, &c. within reasonable limits. The works will be delivered at the publishing office of this Journal, on the following terms—provided that a sufficient number be ordered:—

Beethoven's 32 Sonatas, (over 450 pages of music,) 2 vols...$8
additional volume of smaller works.....$8
Mozart's Piano-forte Works, 2 vols.....$8
Haydn's " " 2 vols.....$8

A set of the Beethoven Sonatas, as a specimen, may be seen at this office. ALEX'R W. THAYER.

THE EIGHTH
GREAT EXHIBITION

....OF....

AMERICAN MANUFACTURES AND MECHANICAL ART,

UNDER THE DIRECTION OF

THE MASSACHUSETTS

CHARITABLE MECHANIC ASSOCIATION,

WILL COMMENCE AT

FANEUIL AND QUINCY HALLS,

....ON....

Wednesday, Sept. 10th.

JOSEPH L. BATES,
Secretary.

EDWARD L. BALCH,

Novello's Cheap MUSIC,
(Imported from England)
389, Broadway, N.Y.

NOVELLO'S LIBRARY
FOR THE DIFFUSION OF
MUSICAL KNOWLEDGE.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY:

VOLUME 7.

Berlioz's Treatise on Modern Instrumentation
and Orchestration,

Containing an exact table of the compass, a sketch of the mechanism, and study of the quality of tone (timbre) and expressive character of various instruments; together with a large number of examples in score, from the productions of the greatest Masters, and from some unpublished works of the Author. Super-royal octavo, bound in whole cloth, price $3.

VOLUME 8.

Dr. Crotch's Elements of Musical Composition,

With the musical examples properly combined with the text. The Musical Examples revised by Thomas Pickering.—(Former price $5.25) In paper wrappers, $1.18. By mail, $1.20.

Volumes of this Series already issued:

- Vol. 1. Cherubini's Counterpoint and Fugue.....$1 68
- " 2. Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.....1 68
- " 3. Fétil's on Choir and Chorus Singing.....88
- " 4. Mozart's Succinct Thorough Bass School.....21
- " 5. Catei's Treatise on Harmony.....68
- " 6. Albrechtsberger's Collected Writings on Thorough Bass, Harmony and Composition, for Self-instruction. Vol. 1. Harmony and Thorough Bass, price 88 cents. Vols. 2 and 3. Guide to Composition, 88c. each. Three vols. bound in one complete, cloth boards.....2 68

J. A. NOVELLO,

Sacred Music Store, No. 389 Broadway, New York,
And at 69 Dean street, Soho Square, and 24 Poultry, London.

JOB PRINTING neatly and promptly executed at this Office.

THE CASTLE IN THE WILDERNESS.

THIS beautiful Art novel, by MME. GEORGE SAND, just completed in the Journal of Music, for which it was expressly translated, has been reprinted in a neat pamphlet, and may be had at this office, and at the periodical and bookstores. Price 15 cents. Copies sent by mail post-paid, for 18 cents.

GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN,
ORGANIST OF ST. PAUL'S CHURCH,
ALBANY, N. Y.

TO MUSIC TEACHERS.—A Professor of Music, well established in one of the most desirable cities in the Middle States, wishes to remove to Boston, and would like to exchange situations with some competent and gentlemanly teacher here, who, on account of health or other reasons, might prefer to live in a more Southern climate. Application may be made at this office.

J. M. MOZART,
BASSO.

RESIDENCE, 9 MARION STREET, BOSTON.
Address Richardson's Musical Exchange, 282 Washington St.

OTTO DRESEL

Gives instruction on the PIANO, and may be addressed at Richardson's Musical Exchange. Terms, $50 per quarter of 24 lessons, two a week; $30 per quarter of 12 lessons, one a week.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
PATENT ACTION
GRAND AND SQUARE
PIANO-FORTES,
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

WAREHOUSES,
MASONIC TEMPLE,
TREMONT STREET,
BOSTON.

Apr 29 BOSTON. if
MUSIC AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

J. C. D. PARKER,
Instructor of the Piano-Forte, Organ & Harmonium.
8 HAYWARD PLACE.

JOB PRINTING
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION NEATLY AND PROMPTLY
EXECUTED AT THE OFFICE OF
EDWARD L. BALCH,
No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

NEWS'
PATENT AMERICAN ACTION
PIANO-FORTE,
Manufactory, 379 Washington Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

P. F. DODGE,
MANUFACTURER OF PIANO-FORTE HARDWARE,
10 Beach St. Boston, and W. Cambridge, Ms.
PIANOS FOR SALE OR TO LET.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
HAVE REMOVED TO
No. 769 BROADWAY, corner of Ninth St.
NEW YORK.

J. TRENKLE,
TEACHER OF THE PIANO-FORTE.
Residence No. 56 Kneeland Street.

CARL HAUSE
OFFERS his services as Instructor in Thorough Bass and in the higher branches of Piano playing. The attention of Amateurs, Professional Teachers, and others who may wish to accomplish themselves for public concert playing, or teaching, is respectfully requested.
Mr. Hause may be addressed at the music stores of Nathan Richardson, 282 Washington St., or G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row.

C. BREUSING,
IMPORTER OF FOREIGN MUSIC,
701 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Dépôt of Erard's Grand Pianos.
CIRCULATING MUSICAL LIBRARY.
Constantly on hand a complete assortment of American Publications.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.'S
Dépôt of Foreign and Domestic Music,
19 S. NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
(East side,) PHILADELPHIA.
A catalogue of our stock of Foreign Music, and of our own Publications, has just been published. Music and Music Books imported to order, as heretofore, from Germany, Italy, France and England.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature,
Published every Saturday, at 21 School St. Boston.
Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.
Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished.—Address J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School St. Boston.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

First insertion, per line.....10 cts.
Each subsequent insertion, per line.....5 cts.
For one column, (128 lines) first insertion.....$12.00
do do each subsequent.....$6.00
Special notices (headed), each insertion, per line 20 cts.
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

WHOLE No. 232.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1856.

VOL. IX. No. 24.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

TERMS: By Mail, $2 per annum, in advance.
When left by Carrier, $2,50

J. S. DWIGHT, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, No. 21 School St. Boston.
By NATHAN RICHARDSON, 232 Washington St. "
" GEORGE P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row, "
" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
" C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 789 Broadway,
" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE & CO., 19 South Ninth St. Philadelphia.
" JOHN H. MELIOR, Pittsburg, Pa.
" MILLER & BBACHAM, 181 Baltimore St. Baltimore.
" W. D. ZOGBAUM & CO., Savannah, Ga.
" W. F. COLBURN, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

[Translated from the German for this Journal.]

The Life and Characteristics of Beethoven.

BY DR. HEINRICH DÜRING.

(Continued from page 179.)

Such blissful moments were his compensation for many a bitter experience. Nothing so stirred up his sense of justice as to find himself deceived in the character of a man with whom he had long stood in friendly relations. The lawsuit, in which he became involved with a brother artist, the court mechanic, MAELZEL, in Vienna, ended in a sort of compromise, whereby Beethoven let the case drop, but was obliged to pay half the costs. Beethoven's masterwork, the "Battle of Vittoria," which was to be performed during the Vienna Congress in the year 1814, was the occasion of this controversy, about which Beethoven expressed himself at length in a deposition prepared for his counsel, Dr. von Adlersburg.

"I had written for Maelzel," he says, "at my own suggestion and without reward, a battle symphony for his Panharmonica. After he had had this awhile, he brought me the score, from which he had already begun to engrave, and wished it arranged for full orchestra. I had before then conceived the idea of a battle music, which, however, was not applicable to his Panharmonica. We agreed to give this and other works of mine in a concert for the benefit of the soldiers. In the meantime I was in the most terrible pecuniary embarrassment. Forsaken by the whole world here in Vienna, in expectation of a change, &c., Maelzel offered me 50 ducats. I took them, and told him that I would return them to him here, or give him the work to take to London, in case I did not make the journey with him, in which latter case I would introduce him to an English publisher, who would pay him the 50 ducats. The concerts were approaching; and now for the first time Herr Maelzel's plan and character developed themselves. Without my consent, he had printed on the handbills that it was his property. Provoked at this, I made him tear down the bills again. Then he put on: 'Out of friendship, on occasion of his journey to London.' This I permitted, since I reserved to myself the liberty of choosing under what conditions I would give him the work. I remember there was a vehement contest during the printing of the bills. But I had not much time, and was still writing on my work. In the fire of inspiration, wholly absorbed in it, I scarcely thought of Maelzel more. Meanwhile, just after the first performance in the hall of the University, I was told on all sides, and by reliable men, that Maelzel had everywhere reported that he had lent me 400 ducats in gold. Immediately after the first concert, I gave back to Maelzel his 50 ducats, told him that, since I had found out his character, I would not travel with him, being justly indignant that he, without asking me, had stated in the bills that all the arrangements for the concert had been thwarted; and even that his bad patriotic character had manifested itself in several public expressions. I declared that I would not give him the work to take with him to London, except on conditions which I would make known to him. He now maintained that it was a gift of friendship, and had this expression put into the newspaper after the second concert, without asking me at all. As Maelzel is a coarse man, wholly without education, without culture, one can imagine how he behaved towards me during this time, and how he more and more provoked me. Who would make such a man a friendly present on compulsion? An opportunity occurred for me to send the work to the Prince Regent, afterwards King George IV., of England. So it was not possible for me to give him this work unconditionally. Maelzel now made proposals. He was told on what day he should appear, to receive an answer; but he came not; he travelled abroad, and had the work performed in Munich. How came he by it? Stealing was not possible. Herr Maelzel had some of the separate parts for some days at his house, and from these he got some low musical hack to put together a whole, which he is now peddling about the world. Herr Maelzel had promised me machines to help my hearing. To stimulate him, I arranged the Battle Symphony for his Panharmonica. His machines finally came to hand, but were not of sufficient use to me. For this little trouble Herr Maelzel thought, after I had composed the Triumphal Symphony for grand orchestra, that I should compose the battle in addition, and make him the exclusive owner of the work. Admitting that I felt under some obligations to him for the hearing machines, yet this is cancelled by the fact that he earned at least 500 florins in convention coin with the battle stolen from me or put together in a mutilated form. So he has made himself good. He even had the effrontery here to say that he had the Battle; nay, he showed it to several men in writing. But I did not believe it, and was so far right, since the whole was not by me, but put together by another. Besides, the honor, which he ascribed to himself alone, might in itself pass for compensation. The Councillor of War did not mention me; and yet all the music of which the two concerts consisted was by me."

Beethoven's uneasiness about such a dishonest proceeding, led him in a letter composed about the same time, July 25th, 1814, to acquaint the musicians in London with the matter, and to warn the English public of a fraud in the highest degree injurious to him and his artistic reputation. He wrote: "Herr Maelzel, who is at present in London, has on his journey thither brought out in Munich my triumphal symphonies and Wellington's 'Battle at Vittoria,' and will, in all probability, give musical concerts with the same, as he had a mind to do in Frankfort. This leads me publicly to declare that I have never and in no way ceded or made over the said works to Herr Maelzel, that no one possesses a copy of them, and that I have sent the only one with which I ever parted to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of England. The performance of these works, therefore, by Herr Maelzel is either a fraud upon the public, since, by the above explanation, he does not possess these works, or, if he does possess them, an injury to me, since he has got hold of them in an unlawful way. But even in the latter case the public will be deceived; for what Herr Maelzel brings out under the title: 'Wellington's Battle at Vittoria and Triumphal Symphony,' must plainly be a spurious or a mutilated work, since of these two works of mine he never received anything from me except a single part for a couple of days. This suspicion becomes certainty when I add the assurance of the musicians here, whose names I am authorized if need be to make public, that Herr Maelzel, on his departure from Vienna, informed them that he possessed these works, and that he had shown them parts (voices) of them, which, as I have already shown, could only be mutilated and not genuine. Whether Herr Maelzel is capable of such a wrong to me, is answered by the fact, that he announced himself alone in the public prints, without the mention of my name, as the undertaker of my concerts which took place here in Vienna, for the benefit of those wounded in the war, when only my works were performed. Therefore I exhort the musicians of London not to suffer such a wrong to me, their brother artist, as the performance there by Herr Maelzel of the 'Battle of Vittoria' and the 'Triumphal Symphony,' and to prevent the London public from being deceived by him in the way now charged."

In September, 1814, at the time of the Vienna Congress, these works, which had caused the composer so much vexation, were performed with great acceptance. Beethoven saw himself honored by many a distinction. The Empress of Russia made him a present of 200 ducats. A musical society in England sent him a costly piano-forte, made by one of the first artists there. The magistrate at Vienna conferred on him the honorary right of citizenship, and the Society of Friends of Music in the Austrian Empire made him an honorary member. Similar honors were extended to him by the Philharmonic Society at Laibach, as well as by the musical academies in Amsterdam and Stockholm.

So much the more was he surprised by the apparently indifferent reception of the "Battle of Vittoria" on the part of the Prince Regent, afterwards King George IV., of England. As we have already mentioned, Beethoven had sent the score of his work, with an inscription, to this Prince, through the Austrian ambassador. For a long time he heard nothing of it, except that the "Battle of Vittoria" had been performed with great acceptance several evenings in succession in the Drury Lane Theatre. Then he sent enclosed to his friend and pupil Ries, a letter in his own hand to King George IV., with directions to deliver it in person. But this method had its great difficulties, inasmuch as only persons of the highest rank, and only the select of these, were presented to the King. The very look of the letter was enough to frighten one, although Beethoven, whose hand-writing was for the most part illegible, may have tried to write more fairly and distinctly. Ries turned to the secretary of the Austrian legation, Herr von Bauer. But he replied, he could not possibly in his position hand the letter to the king; but he would try to have it reach the monarch's hands through some private person. This attempt, however, remained fruitless. Through a page, who was very fond of Beethoven's compositions, the letter was indeed handed to the king; but no gift nor word of thanks resulted. Of this Beethoven often bitterly complained, and this led him one day, in a letter to Ries, to make use of the humorous expression: "The king might at least have honored me with a butcher's knife or a turtle." Probably Beethoven had heard that the king was a gourmand; hence this allusion.

In striking contrast with this cold reception of one of his most eminent works, stands the memorable distinction shown him at an earlier period (179-) by a German prince. He never could forget his reception at the court of the King of Prussia, Frederick William II. In Berlin Beethoven composed and played two Sonatas with violoncello obligato, one of them for the first violinist of the king, DUPONT. On taking leave he received a golden snuff-box filled with Louis-d'ors. With satisfaction, he declared that it was no common box, but such an one as was given to ambassadors. Of the kapellmeister HIMMEL, with whom he had much intercourse during his stay in Berlin, Beethoven said: "He possesses a very clever talent, and his piano playing is elegant and pleasing; but he stands far below Prince Louis Ferdinand in this respect." To the latter Beethoven thought to pay a great compliment when he told him that he played not in a kingly or princely manner, but like a clever pianist. The friendly relation between Beethoven and Himmel, however, was of short duration. Himmel was weak enough to enter into a competition with Beethoven in improvising upon the piano. Beethoven, after listening to him for some time, offended him by saying: "You prelude a great while; when are you going to begin?" Himmel's vanity could never quite get over this wound, and there was ever after a coldness between him and Beethoven, in spite of an apparent reconciliation.

Regard for outward conventions, even where their demands seemed unconditional, was a thing impossible for Beethoven. Whatever belonged to etiquette, he had never known and would not know. His conduct often caused no little embarrassment in the immediate circle of the Archduke Rudolph. When he was instructed about the formalities which he had to observe, he promised to do better, but it always ended with a promise. One day, when they tutored him again, as he called it, he rushed in a state of extreme indignation to the Archduke, and declared unequivocally, that he cherished the deepest reverence for him and his person, but that strict observance of the prescriptions which they gave him daily was, once for all, no business of his. The Archduke smiled good-naturedly, and gave orders that thenceforth they should let him go his own way undisturbed; there was no help for it.

One of Beethoven's manifold peculiarities was his frequent change of lodgings. In the beginning of spring he went regularly into the country, and did not return to the city until late in autumn. When he composed his opera Leonora, he had for a whole year free lodgings in the theatre upon the Wieden. But this habitation did not content him long. He hired rooms at the same time in the red house, so called, on the Alster-Caserne, where his friend Stephen von Breuning also lived. When Summer came, he engaged a country residence in Döbling. After his return to the city, a quarrel with Breuning, before mentioned, led him to hire lodgings in the fourth story of the house of Baron Pasquillati, on the Mülker ramparts, commanding a very beautiful prospect. Thus he had four dwelling places at a time. From the last he moved out several times, but always came back again, so that the Baron Pasquillati used good-humoredly to say, when Beethoven moved out: "The rooms shall not be let; Beethoven is coming back."

The natural consequence of this frequent change of residence was, that not a little time was consumed in the transportation of his chattels back and forth, before any order was restored among them, especially among his papers. To his own manuscript works Beethoven attached little value. They lay for the most part, after they were once engraved, in an adjoining room, or on the floor in the middle of the room with other music. Scarcely put in order, his papers, if he looked for anything, flew into confusion again. Beethoven's dwelling betrayed no especial expensiveness; he had no fondness for it even in his dress, although it was always neat and he wore particularly fine linen. Of luxury and splendor of any sort he was no friend, and in his demeanor from youth up he was awkward and ungainly. As his friend Ries said, Beethoven seldom took anything into his hand, that did not fall or break. Many a time did he upset his inkstand into his piano, which stood near the writing desk. Ries adds: "How Beethoven contrived to shave himself, it is hard to conceive, unless one considered the frequent cuts upon his cheeks." He was utterly unsuited for the care of economical matters. In an already mentioned letter of an earlier period, 1801, to the kapellmeister Hofmeister in Leipzig, Beethoven himself confessed that he was anything but an accountant. For that reason his life and his own housekeeping were more expensive for him than for anybody else, notwithstanding that he denied himself almost every convenience. But he seldom complained of it, and did not willingly accept aid from friends who knew his situation.

He was particularly straitened through the depreciation of paper money. This he confessed in a letter to his friend Ries, which at the same time affords valid proof of how Beethoven's kind-heartedness, in spite of his embarrassments, was quite unable to withhold a helping hand from others. In that letter (Nov. 22, 1815) he confessed: "I have lost 600 florins yearly on my salary. At the time of the bank notes it was nothing. Then came the redemption bonds, and by them I lost these 600 florins. We are now at the point where the bonds are worse than ever the bank notes were. I pay 1,000 florins house rent. Imagine the distress which this paper money occasions. My poor, unhappy brother Carl has just died. He had a bad wife. I can say he had for some years consumption of the lungs, and I can safely reckon what I gave him, to make life easier to him, at 10,000 florins, Vienna currency. That now for an Englishman indeed is not much, but for a poor German, much more an Austrian, it is a great deal. The poor fellow had altered a good deal in his last years. From my heart I lament him, and I rejoice to be able to say to myself, that I have in nothing fallen short of my duty in regard to his support."

While the death of his brother, as Beethoven confessed in a letter to Ries, Feb. 18, 1816, "worked deeply on his mind and on his works," he experienced a new and not less sensible loss. His countryman, the before-mentioned famous violinist Salomon, born like himself in Bonn, died in London, where he had lived many years, on the 25th of November, 1815. As a member of the Philharmonic Society he had been of great service in diffusing there a taste for Haydn's music, and also in regard to Beethoven, whose compositions, especially his symphonies, he had brought out in several public concerts. In a letter of the 28th of February, 1816, to Ries, who was then in London, Beethoven said: "Salomon's death pains me much, since he was a noble man, whom I remember from my childhood. You have become his executor, and I at the same time guardian of the child of my poor dead brother. You will hardly have had as much annoyance as I have from this death. But there remains to me the sweet consolation of having rescued a poor innocent child from the hands of an unworthy mother."

The straitened condition in which he then was, and which he has described in a forgoing letter, was ill calculated to put Beethoven in a cheerful humor, to say nothing of the oft-returning attacks of sickness which robbed him of it. He often found himself in pecuniary trouble. "Of the ten ducats," he wrote on the 8th of March, 1816, to Ries in London, "not a farthing has arrived as yet, and I begin already to believe that the English too are only generous abroad. So I found it with the Prince Regent, from whom I have never even received the cost of copying for my 'Battle of Vittoria,' nay, not even a word of written or of oral thanks. My income amounts to 3400 in paper; I pay 1100 for house rent; my servant with his wife costs me 900 florins; you can reckon what remains. Besides, I have my little nephew wholly to provide for; until now he is at the Institute; that costs me as much as 1100 florins, and a bad arrangement at that, so that I shall have to commence regular house-keeping, and take him home with me. How much one has to earn, merely to be able to live here! And yet there is no end of it—for—for—for—you know already. Then, too, my dear pupil Ries must set himself to work and dedicate something clever to me, to which the master must respond, and offset like with like." Beethoven closed his letter with the words: "All that is beautiful to your wife; alas! I have none. I have found but one, and her I never shall possess; but I am no woman-hater for all that."

That Beethoven never was without a tender passion, and for the most part deeply smitten by it, appears from the unanimous testimony of his friends. The first object of his youthful inclination was a young lady of Cologne, JEANNETTE D'HONRATH, who often passed some weeks in the von Breuning family in Bonn. She was a handsome, lively blonde, of agreeable culture, who took a lively interest in music, and sang quite gracefully. Her favored lover and afterwards husband was an Austrian officer in Cologne, by the name of CARL GRATH, who died as field-marshal lieutenant and commandant of Temeswar on the 15th of October, 1827. After this, by a sort of Werther's love, Beethoven was for some time enchained to a Fräulein von W—, also distinguished by her beauty and her culture. In Vienna also he had formed several love relations, and sometimes made conquests which would have been difficult, if not impossible, to many an Adonis. Even in his later years, he liked very well to look upon beautiful young faces. When he met a charming maiden in the street, he turned round, surveyed her sharply through his glass, and smiled when he saw that any one observed it. But his loves were only of short duration. He openly confessed once to his friend Ries, who joked him on the conquest of a beautiful lady, that she had enchained him the most deeply and the longest, seven full months.

"One evening," says Ries at a later period, "I went to Beethoven at Baden near Vienna, where he often stopped, in order to continue my lessons. There I found a handsome young lady sitting by him on the sofa. As it seemed to me that I came malapropos, I was on the point of instantly retiring, but Beethoven held me back and said: "Play a little while." He and the lady remained sitting behind me. I had already played a long while, when Beethoven suddenly exclaimed: 'Ries! play something that has love in it!' Then again soon: 'Something melancholy!' Then: 'Something passionate!' and so on. From what I heard, I could conclude that he had perhaps offended the lady in some way, and now wanted to make it right by humors. Finally he sprang up and cried: 'Those are mere things of mine!' I had, to be sure, always played movements out of his own works, strung together merely by some short transitions, which, however, seemed to have caused him satisfaction. The lady went away, and Beethoven, to my great astonishment, did not know who she was. I then heard that she had come in just before me, in order to make Beethoven's acquaintance. We soon followed after her, to ascertain her residence, and thereby afterwards her rank. We saw her still in the distance, since it was bright moonlight; but suddenly she vanished. We kept on walking and conversing upon various matters for about an hour and a half in the beautiful vale adjoining. As we went away, Beethoven said: 'I must contrive to find out who she is, and you must help me.' Long afterwards I met her in Vienna, and I now discovered that she was the loved one of a foreign Prince. I imparted my information to Beethoven, but have never, either from him or from any one else, heard anything more about her."

With these rapid changes of his feelings and outward impressions, Beethoven's absent-mindedness and forgetfulness were naturally connected. For some variations in A major on a Russian air, he had received from Count Browne in Vienna a present of a fine saddle horse. He rode it a few times, but soon forgot all about his fodder. Beethoven's servant, soon observing this, used his master's forgetfulness for his own profit. He let out the horse, but for a long time handed in no accounts for fodder, so as not to awaken his master's attention. At last Beethoven received all at once a large bill, which suddenly recalled to memory his horse and his own negligence. In many other cases Beethoven's distraction showed itself. When the charms of nature, which he loved from his youth up, enticed him into the open air, he forgot, to the great distress of his hired housekeeper, to return at meal time. He ate in any chance eating house, while many a friend, whom he had invited to dine with him, vainly awaited his return. It often happened, when he sat down upon the grass, that he got up suddenly and hastened on, without remarking that he had left his hat lying on the ground. Not seldom did it occur, that after staying out a long time in the most frightful weather, he came home shivering and bare-headed, with the rain dripping from his gray hair.

[To be continued.]

Farewell to Robert Schumann.

[Translated from the Kölnische Zeitung for Lond. Mus. World.]

Yesterday evening we conducted Robert Schumann to his last home!

The young minstrel brothers of the Concordia bore the simple coffin, which was decorated with a wreath of laurels. Joachim, Brahms, and Dietrich, so intimately connected with Schumann during his lifetime, went first, then came the clergyman, and near him, the burgomaster of Bonn, accompanied by a considerable number of worthy men. Solemnly echoed the tones of brass instruments, and brazen melodies, those chorals, which for centuries have glorified so much joy and so much suffering. Solemnly did the procession wind through the streets of Bonn, while the inhabitants seemed to follow it with sympathizing looks. When it reached the cemetery, a circle was formed around the open grave. The coffin was lowered into it—from the dense crowd the gentle form of a woman glided forward, here and there, and let a nosegay, or a chaplet, fall from her hands upon the bier beneath—it did not last longer than the time to shed a tear. The pastor Wiseman took a spadeful of earth, and, throwing it on the coffin, pronounced the old, time-honored words: "Ashes to ashes, dust to dust," followed by a prayer. He then spoke a few and fervent words concerning the fate and fortunes of the deceased, and the singers of the Concordia sang a mournful song. Again did a solemn choral resound—and each of us took a handful of earth and scattered it on the coffin—a last, poor, cold offering of love! Meanwhile the sun had set, and everything was dissolved into undefined masses and shadows—and the crowd, which had hitherto been held together by a common object of interest, dispersed, just as everything else quickly breaks up when the connecting power ceases to work, when the fashioning germ has fallen a victim to annihilation. Poor Schumann!

And yet there was a time when kings might have envied thee! With a golden sceptre didst thou sway a magnificent world of tones, creating and working in it with strength and freedom. Many of the best men joined thee, surrendered themselves up to thee, inspired thee with their own inspiration, and rewarded thee by the most profound partiality. And what love decked out thy life! A wife, crowned with the beaming crown of genius, stood by thy side, and thou wast for her as a father for a daughter, as a bridegroom for a bride, as a master for a pupil, as a saint for a believer. And when she could no longer remain at thy side, and clear every little stone from out thy path, then didst thou feel in the midst of thy dreams and thy sufferings, her protecting hand from afar off, and when the Angel of Death had compassion on thee, and approached thy anguish-tortured soul, in order to raise it once more to light and liberty, in thy last hours thy glance met hers, and, illuminated by love, thy weary spirit winged hence its course!

Thy wearied spirit! Yes; for thou hadst required of it too much. Thou asked'st from it, every moment as a right, that which falls to the lot of him who thankfully receives only in the hour of inspiration. As in the orange-groves of Italy, blossoms and fruit are displayed in constantly successive luxuriousness upon the same branch, thou would'st have had thy genius lay its golden apples in one uninterrupted course of budding, blooming and ripening at thy feet. Long did it willingly obey—and who can ever say how disunion between thee and it was brought about? Ah, perhaps it was but a short quarrel, such as occurs between the best of friends, appearing only to our weak eyes as strife, while you are, perhaps, on the best terms again, and smile at all we are now saying of you—while you smile gently and forgive us!

But I fear no smile from bad or good spirits, dear Schumann, when I speak of the elevation of thy efforts, and of their veracity and truth. Thou wast a real artist, and but few know how much sturdy, incorruptible will, devoted activity, and persevering courage is expressed by this. And thou wast gentle and good, and just towards others, as much as it is given to a mortal to be. Out of thy melodies gleams the grace of a sweet soul—out of thy melodies gushes the warmth of a loving heart. Silently didst thou sit and listen to the singing and heaving sounds within thee, and all the wonderful harmonies which lived there like the flowers at the bottom of the sea, but thou wouldst not listen to the whisperings of petty vanity, which only too often are mixed up with the melodies and chords in a musician's soul—perhaps they did not even strive to tempt thee, for they knew it would be in vain!

But thy works have become a so much greater ornament, and will deck thy name better than marks of distinction granted by others could ever have done. Around the resting-place which the city of Bonn has selected for thee in her beautiful cemetery, so rich in great recollections, five young plane trees are planted. May the luxurious shade which they will cast in after years around the mound over thy grave, be a picture of the results of thy creations; and mayst thou, O admirable master, now repose, if repose is the lot of immortal spirits, and rejoice at the great amount of what is good and beautiful that thou hast produced in word and tone, rejoice at all the love and respect which blooms for thee in so many hearts in the great German Fatherland.

FERDINAND HILLER.

Cologne, 1 August, 1856.

Marriage of Caroline Duprez.

(Translated from L'Artiste.)

The most interesting romance of the week is the marriage of a young, rich, and popular vocalist—Mlle. Caroline Duprez—with a young, poor, and almost unknown musician—M. Van den Heuven. Opportunities of decrying the artist-world are so eagerly caught, that when a chance is presented of showing it in an admirable light, we are too glad to lay hold of it. Besides, the heroine of our story, both as a woman and an artist, enjoys everybody's good wishes. Why, then, should not the story of her noble action be related to the public—if only to prove that romance can be allied to common sense, that apparent impossibilities may sometimes happen, and that honesty is not always of necessity deprived of the charm of adventure?

The prestige of Parisian actresses, it is well known, implies all sorts of extravagance. But if some who are twenty times lost, faded, in debt, without talent, and ugly, find magnificent alliances, what pretensions must those have who are irreproachable, young, opulent, talented, beautiful! By the double illustration of her name, by her brilliant position, Mlle. Caroline Duprez could not be supposed to deny herself any satisfaction arising from vanity. Her every ambition was gratified, and yet she has given a rare example of spirit in marrying according to her choice; she might have espoused a Russian highness, a French marquis, a veritable millionaire; she has chosen a simple accompanist at the opera. Moreover, what attracted Mlle. Duprez towards her future husband is worth recounting. M. Van den Heuven is one of those rare young men who sacrifice their youth to their family, as if in obedience to a vow of filial love; we never see them expend upon themselves any part of their modest income, nor devote to their own pleasures a single hour of their time. They have the strength to resist temptation, and spend their lives in this kind of devotion. This it was which won the heart of Mlle. Duprez; who wished at once to recompense self-denial and add one to the list of the happy. She herself was fortune, and she had but one word to say to realize the metamorphosis. Her name is now Madame Van den Heuven. M. and Madame Duprez entertained, it is said, the same generous sentiments as their daughter. They were only desirous of testing her affection by a single ordeal—that of time. A term was fixed; the term expired, and Mlle. Duprez found herself in the same mind, calm and decided. There was a party at the house of M. Duprez; M. Van den Heuven was a guest. Mlle. Duprez, in the most graceful manner, took the young musician by the hand, and presented to the guests her future husband.

The other evening, listening to Mlle. Duprez, in an opera as exquisite as herself—Les Diamants de la Couronne—it seemed to us as if she was acting her own history. A queen marries a poor gentleman: Mlle. Duprez herself might have been taken by M. Scribe for his charming plot.

XAVIER AUBRIER.

Letters from Cologne mention that Herr Hiller is preparing a new oratorio, "Saul," against Whitsuntide, 1857, by which time the restorations of the Gürzenich Hall will be completed, and when a grand solemnization of the Lower Rhenish Musical Festival will take place.

Madame Vestris.

By this well-known name—and not by that which for eighteen years she has legally borne as wife to Mr. Charles Mathews—must we announce the death of one of London's favorites, which took place at the close of last week. Her decease has been, for the Lady's self, a release, for her illness was a long one, accompanied with increasing physical agony.

The Morning Post gives fifty-nine as the age of Lucia Elizabeth Mathews, born (as the French would say) Bartolozzi. She came on the stage early—some forty years ago or more—and after singing awhile at the Italian Opera, was tempted to leave it for illegitimate drama and vaudeville on the English stage. Her character-hit (we are reminded by our contemporaries) was made in 'Giovanni in London.' Her song par excellence was 'Cherry Ripe.' After filling the print-shop windows and making a fortune for ballad composers for some halfscore years, Madame Vestris established herself as a manager at the Olympic Theatre five-and-twenty years since. There she remained for some seasons of brilliant success, during which she may be said to have worked out a new style of entertainment,—in conjunction with such skilled writers as Messrs. Planché, C. Dance and Oxenford. There, too, she married Mr. Charles Mathews. Her subsequent career, as engaged in the managements of Covent Garden and the Lyceum Theatres, ended by a fatal malady, needs not be followed.

In theatrical annals Madame Vestris will be remembered for sumptuousness of fancy and taste in detail, rather than for any intellectual subtlety or high artistic finish as an actress. She may possibly have owed to her foreign origin those instincts which marked her career. As a girl, she was rarely bewitching if not faultlessly beautiful—endowed with one of the most musical, easy, rich contralto voices ever bestowed on singer, which retained its charm to the last;—full of taste and fancy for all that is luxurious, decorative and gorgeous; but, perhaps not willing, perhaps not able, to learn beyond a certain depth. Thus, with every requisite for setting the opera "town" on fire, Madame Vestris never gained a very high place as singer in a musical theatre. Thus, with a public eager to praise whatever she said, smiled, or sang, Madame Vestris must be said to have sat at Comedy's "second table"—to have been inapprehensive in dialogue, flat in repartee, slow in conceiving character, as apart from costume,—and hence not to be remembered by any comic creation or impersonation. Thus, despite her remarkable personal fascinations, she cannot rank among the great mimes—with Pallarini, or Elssler, or even Leroux,—women who, without speaking, have presented beings of the mind which will live in the annals of Drama. It was a certain instinct, we repeat, that saved Madame Vestris, and kept her for so many years in the full blaze of public favor. She managed to bring every incomplete gift into such play, that few cared to ask what, and how, was the spell that kept its owner "swimming" when more sterling folk were swamped. Without having mastered the singer's art, she charmed by her singing—the parts that she could not act she dressed superbly. She was unequal to the utterance of Shakspeare's poetical fancies—not elegant enough for Congreve—not sufficiently piquant for Sheridan,—but in extravaganzas, burlesques, musical farces, she was so accomplished, sprightly and graceful, that the charm by which she held her public was hardly felt to be third-rate while she was in presence. Her taste in decoration of every kind was lavish, fantastic, but always harmonious. She was imperious, extravagant, exigent, in no common degree,—like one who from her girlhood had been used to suit and service,—the gratification of whose every idea of luxury had been encouraged, not balanced by prudential considerations. That she was considerate and kindly in her managerial rule and governance many an obscure person could now testify. She was tended in her long and weary illness by affectionate relatives and steady friends; and though she leaves behind her no great name in Drama, she leaves one which, by reason of its peculiarity, will not be forgotten.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sharps, Flats and Accidentals.

FLORENCE, Mass., Sept. 6, 1856.

MR. EDITOR—Every paper, now-a-days, has its watering-place correspondence; why should not you? So, if you admit gossip into your staid and sober Journal, I have no objection to transmitting to you and your readers sundry musical odds and ends which I have lately picked up. For although you may, by glancing at the date, have rashly flattered yourself that you were about to read a letter from the original "beautiful Florence," the point from which I write is no more nor less than one of the most genuine of watering places, viz.: a water-cure establishment. Do any of you know what it is to belong to the "Cold Water Folks" or to take the "treatment"? Have any of you been initiated into the mysteries of the "pack, sitz bath, douche, plunge," etc.? But whether you have or not, these do not belong to our present subject. To get back upon the right road to that, we must glance at the amusements provided for the patients and at the patients themselves. Thus by degrees we shall arrive at the source of enjoyment which at present concerns us most closely—Music.

We find ourselves in a neighborhood which is musical by memory and association, but much less so in reality. We are within a few miles of Northampton, around which JENNY LIND once shed a musical halo, but upon which, alas! her mantle has not fallen. It is so seldom that a concert takes place in this good village, that the people require a special rousing and stirring up before taking the trouble to go to one. Last Tuesday night, however, thanks to the efforts of a few Art-lovers, a very fair audience (for Northampton) was assembled to listen to the sweet strains of one of your songsters, Miss LUCY A. DOANE, assisted by her friend and teacher, Mr. KREISSMANN, also your townsman, and a young pianist, fresh from the Conservatory at Leipzig, Mr. LEONHARDT. I will not enter into detail, except to say that everything went off well. The programme exhibited, to be sure, a strange mixture of names—Beethoven, Mozart, Handel, Caraffa, Franz and Chopin alternating with Donizetti, Abt, Dempster, etc. It will seem almost inconsistent with my former remarks about the Northamptonians when I tell you that almost the only pieces encored were Handel's beautiful "Angels ever bright and fair," a duet by Caraffa, and Franz's "Willkommen mein Wald," to which Mr. Kreissmann did full justice. I cannot explain it.

Miss Doane has for some weeks been "one of us," and has become a general favorite, through her amiable manners, and her constant readiness to oblige us by letting us hear her beautiful voice. Her singing, too, proves her to have had a really good teacher, while her taste in music is the best. We were thus well prepared to like Mr. Kreissmann when he came among us for a few days, with his joyous, earnest temperament, his long experience in music, and his exquisite voice. We gave him in return, what we could—the green fields, the dark woods, the purling brooks, and all the music which Nature makes with her thousand voices, and the delicious quiet of one of the loveliest rural spots. I am not sure but that he also took a taste of the water-cure; but that was his own choice and the doctor's doing.

Previous to this last "solemn opportunity," (to use a Quaker phrase,) our halls were filled with music nearly every night. Besides Miss Doane, there were among our number several amateur performers, both vocal and instrumental, who relieved and accompanied her, and from one of these, a young lady who was quite a proficient in both branches, and one of the "appreciative" ones, I heard a ludicrous story of her experience. She had been requested to play, and had responded by some light, pleasing pieces which she had at her finger's ends, when a lady from Texas inquired: "Don't you play any of Beethoven's (pronounced according to the strictest English rules) music? I like him better than any one else," &c. Our fair friend, surprised that anything so good could come out of Texas, was finally beguiled into a belief that she had stumbled upon a kindred spirit, and, having before promised a friend to play one of the Sonatas when there should be a good chance, took this opportunity to do so. The exclamations: "Elegant! lovely!" etc., from the Texan lady, somewhat damped the ardor of the enthusiasm to which the glorious composition was raising her; but when, all excitement and inspiration, she let the last chord die away, no "douche" could have given her a greater shock than the words of her neighbor: "That is very pretty. Do you play any of Verdi's music?" Speechless at first, our friend finally gasped out: "No!" "But I have an air from Trovatore; if I get it, won't you try it?" "No—I can't play Verdi after Beethoven;" soon after which the appreciative young lady, vainly endeavoring to recover from the thunderbolt which had thus fallen upon her. In the evening a cold shudder came over her as she saw the Texan lady approaching her, and heard her say: "Can't you play another of Beethoven's Sonatas?" She excused herself on the plea of the parlor being too full, and then was treated to an account of the state of music in Houston, Texas, which was certainly amusing? Among other things, she was informed that, among the many Germans residing there, there was a daughter of "Professor von Hofenbach, the great composer, who composed the Midnight Waltz." I am not very well posted up in musical biography and history; perhaps you can enlighten me with regard to this distinguished gentleman.

One more item, and then I will close this letter, which, as coming from a stranger, I fear you will already consider too long. I saw an excellent joke in a German comic paper the other day, which must not be lost to your Journal. It ran thus: "No one could deny that if Mozart were to hear most of the modern instrumental music, he would surely turn in his grave. Now, as it had hitherto been impossible to ascertain the exact spot in which the great composer was buried, it was proposed that a grand orchestra should be placed in the churchyard where he is known to rest, and made to play some of the above-mentioned music, by Verdi, or other writers of the same school, while a man should be stationed as listener at every grave. The noise made by the turning of the body would leave no more room for doubt as to Mozart's last resting-place." The cut which accompanied this proposal, with the grand orchestra playing away for dear life, the leader making the most fearful contortions, and the expectant, anxious and awed faces of the men at the graves, was exceedingly ludicrous.

HYDROPATHOS.

Music Abroad.

London.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.—(From the Musical World, Aug. 9.)—The twelfth concert yesterday se'night brought the series to a close with brilliant éclat. The attendance was again immense, and the music room was filled with a dazzling array of rank and fashion. The programme was as follows:

PART I.

Overture (Leonora),.....Beethoven
Aria—"Ah, per sempre," Sig. Graziani,.....Bellini

Aria e Coro—"Possenti numi," Herr Formes and Chorus,.....Mozart
Swiss Echo Song—Mlle. Rosa Devries,....Carl Eckert
Madrigal—"Down in a flow'ry vale,".....Fesca
Romanza—"Una virgine," Sig. Gardoni,....Donizetti
Quartetto, "Ecco quel fiero istante," Mesdames Grisi and Didiée, Signors Mario and Ronconi,.....Costa
Valse—"Ah! che assorta," Mad. Bosio,....Venzano Finale—"Qual cor tradisti," (Norma),.....Bellini

PART II.

Overture (Guillaume Tell),.....Rossini
Cavatina—"Qui la voce," Mad. Grisi,.....Bellini
Duet—"Una dama," Mlle. and Sig. Gardoni, Rossini
Cantata—"Adelaida," Sig. Mario,.....Beethoven
Duetto—"Quanto amore," Mad. Bosio and Sig. Ronconi,.....Donizetti
Romanza—"Una furtiva lagrima," Sig. Neri Beraldi,.....Donizetti
Aria—"Il segreto per esser felice," Mad. Nantier Didiée,.....Donizetti
Finale—(Fidelio),.....Beethoven

The overture to Leonora was wonderfully played under the direction of Mr. Costa. Sig. Graziani sang the slow movement of the air from I Puritani extremely well. Herr Formes was ably supported by the chorus in "Possenti Numi," which was a solemn and impressive performance. Mlle. Rosa Devries was encored in the Swiss Echo Song, originally written for Madame Sontag. Another encore was awarded to Fesca's Madrigal, which immediately followed. Sig. Gardoni sang the romance from the Favorita with genuine feeling; and Mr. Costa's flowing and melodious quartet was given to perfection by the singers. A tumultuous "bis" was bestowed on Mad. Bosio in Venzano's valse, which was repeated amid reiterated applause. The Finale to the last act of Norma was powerfully rendered by Madame Grisi, Sig. Gardoni, Herr Formes and chorus.

The overture to Guillaume Tell was loudly re-demanded, as indeed its performance by the band fully warranted. Grisi's peculiar charm of voice and her irresistible mezza voce were displayed to great advantage in the cavatina from I Puritani. The lovely duet from Conte Ory was perfectly given by Mlle. Marai and Sig. Gardoni. Sig. Mario was encored in "Adelaida," a compliment which his exquisite singing richly deserved. Mr. Costa's orchestral arrangement of the piano-forte accompaniment in this scene was much admired. The three succeeding pieces were re-demanded and repeated. The duet from the Elisir d'Amore delighted and amused the audience vastly, so much animation and spirit was thrown into their singing by Mme. Bosio and Sig. Ronconi; Sig. Neri Beraldi displayed a very pleasing voice and nice taste in the romanza from the same opera; and Mad. Nantier Didiée, who seems to sing better every time she sings, dashed off the famous brindisi with irresistible entrain. A more brilliant termination to a brilliant series of concerts could hardly have been desired, than the finale to the last act of Fidelio, in which the solos were sung by Mme. Bosio, Mlle. Marai, Sigs. Gardoni, Beraldi, Polouini, and Herr Formes.

ROYAL SURREY GARDENS.—(From the same.)—Among the novelties lately produced in the musical department must be named the Zouave trumpeters, who appeared for the first time on Tuesday night with extraordinary success. Strictly speaking, the Zouave trumpeters play no tunes. They have the "revil," the "retraite," the "alarme," the "roll-call," the "bivouac," and other calls, such as to march, to fire, to cease firing, exactly as our regimental buglers have; only instead of the bugle, the Zouaves use a brass trumpet—a clarion—and are wonderfully expert. M. Jullien has made precisely the same use of them as previously he had done of the National Guard drummers. The appearance of the Zouaves wrought no little in favor of their success; and directly the well-known costume was perceived in the orchestra, the audience welcomed them with a shout that might have been heard at Sebastopol.

To introduce them to the public, and to display their talent to the best advantage, M. Jullien composed a new quadrille, entitled "The Zouaves," in which all the various calls of the trumpeters are introduced with remarkable effect. The success of the trumpeters of the Second Regiment of Zouaves was indisputable, and the new quadrille was admired for its ingenuity and its brilliant orchestration.

On the same evening the programme, among other things, contained the overture to Egmont, allegro from Mendelssohn's A minor Symphony, largo from Beethoven's Symphony in D, and grand operatic selection from Il Trovatore, with which the mob has become violently enamored, owing to the fine performance of MM. König, Lavigne, Reichart, and Hughes on their respective instruments. A solo on the violoncello, by M. Ernest Demunck, a very young performer, and son of the celebrated Belgian violoncellist, was greatly admired and applauded with enthusiasm. Mad. Rüdersdorff was encored in "Robert, toi que j'aime," which she sang with unusual fervor; and Miss Kate Ranoë produced a marked sensation by her simple and unpretending manner, in the graceful "Evening Prayer," from Mr. Costa's Edi. Signor Ferrari was put down for Mercadante's "Ella piangea," and Fräulein Jessy Rolls for the grand scena from Der Freyschütz. The attendance was enormous, both in the gardens and the music-room.

Aug. 16.—On Saturday there was an excellent selection of madrigals and part-songs, which was so successful, that a night in every week is for the future to be set apart for the same kind of music.

On Wednesday the first Mendelssohn concert was given. The programme was full of interest. The concert began with the "Military Overture" in C major, composed for wind instruments. The stringed basses, on this occasion, were additions to the score—but scarcely, we think, improvements. The symphony in A major was played entire, and in a style which conferred infinite credit upon M. Jullien and his orchestra. There was also the first movement (without the "repeat") of the early quintet in the same key, for two violins, two tenors and violoncello, Op. 18, executed by MM. Kettenus, Sighicelli, Schreurs (brothers), and Vieuxtemps. It is curious that a tranquil piece of chamber music should be heard so well in so vast a building. Two of the part-songs—"Oh hills, oh vales," and the "Vale of Rest"—and the finale to the unfinished opera of Loreley, in which Mme. Rüdersdorff was the principal soprano, afforded an agreeable contrast to the instrumental music. "Oh hills, oh vales," was encored. The whole performance was thoroughly appreciated by the most crowded assembly we have seen in the Surrey Gardens since the inauguration of the new music hall. We should have stated that the band was enlarged for the occasion, and that Mr. Willey led. Mr. Land directed the chorus.

The Zouaves pursue their prosperous career, and the "Zouave Quadrille" is certainly one of M. Jullien's greatest hits.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—On Monday evening last, this society gave the second concert for the summer season in the lower room of Exeter Hall. The music consisted of Spohr's Last Judgment and Beethoven's Engedi—an adaptation of the Mount of Olives. The vocalists in the Last Judgment were Miss S. Gilbert, Miss M. Wells, Mr. Donald King, and Mrs. Lawler. Miss S. Gilbert and Mr. Donald King were encored in the duet "Forsake me not." The principals in Engedi were Miss E. Hughes, a pupil of Sir George Smart, Mr. Donald King, and Mr. Lawler. The band, led by Mr. H. Blagrove, although not numerous, was efficient. The trebles, tenors, and basses were pretty well up to the mark, but the altos were weak. Mr. Surman was at his post as conductor. The audience was select, and consisted of the subscribers to the concerts for the summer season, which are to include works not now performed in the large hall.

